Mr. WEEKS. That is true. The reason why so many Senators seem to have come to the conclusion that there is a monopoly in our coastwise service is on account of the report made by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives, in which it was stated that 92 per cent of the ships engaged in line service—that is, service between definite points on the Atlantic coast—were either owned by railroads or by two large combinations—those two large combinations being the Atlantic Coast & West India Co., which includes the Clyde and Mallory Lines, and the Eastern Steamship Co., which operates from Boston to the eastern coasts, principally to Maine coast points. It is true that 92 per cent of that kind of service on the Atlantic coast is either owned by those two companies or by the railroads; but that is only 10 per cent of the total coastwise shipping of the United States. Ninety per cent of the coastwise shipping is owned and controlled by a great variety of citizens.

As an indication of diversified ownership, I am going to open a list of the ships of the United States engaged in the coastwise trade and read from one page of it. I have not looked at this page and do not know anything about what names I shall find. The first vessel whose name I see is the Pennsylvania, of the Pacific Mail Steamship Co.; then the Colin C. Baker, owned by Asa E. Coleman, of Bath, Me.; the Richmond, owned by the Atlantic Coast Lumber Co.; the Stephen J. Watts, owned by W. H. Wyman, of Jonesport, Me.; the Emma McAdam, owned by Margaret M. Robbins, of Calais, Me.; the Annie Gus, owned by Ira J. Kelley, of Pembroke, Me.; the Charles W. Alcott, owned by George E. Hammond, of Greenport, N. Y.; the Henry P. Hallock, owned by James Murray, of South Norwalk, Conn.

I have read about one-sixth of one page, and there are over 40 pages containing the list of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, and it will be found by anyone who wants to take the trouble to investigate the matter that those ships are owned by hundreds of individuals; that there are 361 different owners of vessels engaged in the coastwise trade who own two or more vessels, while the monopoly that is being talked about is controlled by half a dozen railroads and two steamship lines. The fact is there is not a more diversified or more country-wide controlled business in the United States than is the coastwise shipping.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Are they in competition?

Mr. WEEKS. They are absolutely in competition with all other coastwise ships.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, will the Senator permit me to interrupt him there?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Is there not a wide difference between the question of diversity of ownership of the shares and the question of whether or not, after all, they are not in a combination by which they control, by agreement, the charges?

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, there is not a syllable of testimony—at least I do not recollect a syllable of testimony—taken by the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House of Representatives which indicates that there is any collusion or any cooperation or any combination in making rates for the service performed by these independently owned vessels.

Mr. CRAWFORD. My recollection is that Prof. Johnson, in his testimony before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, referring to the report of the House committee, made the statement that by this sort of agreement they charged all the traffic would bear, and that a sort of general agreement did exist among them. As to the question of ownership, that, of course, is a different proposition.

Mr. WEEKS. Let me ask the Senator from South Dakota this question: If 10 vessels were in the port of Boston waiting for a cargo and there was only cargo enough for 5 of them, what does he think would happen as to rates? Of course, the rates would be cut indiscriminately. I will make the assertion here and now that there is not a scintilla of evidence to show that the tramp steamers or the tramp sailing vessels engaged in our coastwise trade have any arrangement whatever as to rates.

Mr. CRAWFORD. If the Senator will permit me, my recollection of Prof. Johnson's statement is also that he undertook to claim that, as a rule, liberal dividends were paid on investments in coastwise vessels.

Mr. WEEKS. I should like to point out some opportunities for investments in coastwise shipping at less than its original cost available to anyone who thinks the industry is very profitable. We built less tonnage last year than for many years, showing that the trade is well supplied with tonnage.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I am quoting from an expert witness before the committee.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. LANE. I wish to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that quite frequently, where there are a large number of vessels in competition, some of the best carriers are kept tied up at the dock. They are subsidized or paid a certain sum per annum to remain idle. This happened out on the Pacific coast quite frequently in the past during my memory.

There is another thing which I would like to call to the attention of the Senator, and that is, in relation to the Hawaiian-American Line of vessels, 26 in number, as the Senator said. I am told that line favors the payment of tolls through the canal, and that they are using their influence in behalf of the passage of the bill that is now under consideration, stating that they prefer to pay tolls, although they have vessels, each one of which would have to pay $4,000 in tolls for a single passage, or $8,000 for the round trip. Just why they should be in favor of paying tolls when they have so many vessels is something I do not understand; and that is one of the reasons why I concluded, after having carefully considered the matter without prejudice, to vote against the repeal of the exemption clause.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, that line of steamers sails from Honolulu to the Mexican coast, transfers its freight to the Tehuantepec Railroad Co., which retransfers it on the Atlantic side. If they are in favor of tolls—I do not know anything about whether they are or not—but if they are in favor of tolls, it must be that they have an arrangement with the Tehuantepec Railroad which will enable them to get their freight to the Atlantic coast, or vice versa, at a lower rate than they would be able to get it by paying tolls; and, therefore, their competitors would pay the higher rate, and they would get the advantage. I do not know that that is the case; but that would be the only solution I could offer for any such proposition. I doubt if the suggestion that vessels tie up, and are paid to do so, occurs frequently. I do not remember any testimony indicating such a pooling on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. LANE. That would be a physical impossibility; they could not do that.

Mr. LODGE. Mr. President, if my colleague will allow me, their contract with the Tehuantepec road has a proviso which ends the contract if the toll exemption remains on the canal.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield, the American-Hawaiian line is a regular line. It sails on schedule time. Is it not possible that, being a regular line, tolls might be of greater advantage to it, because they would be a great impediment to the tramp?

The tramp vessel that might be in port seeking cargo could find a load, possibly, from San Francisco to New York. It would make the lowest rate. That always happens. The tramp is the regulator of sea rates. Staring in the face of that tramp, however, is this toll of $6,000, if it is a 5,000-ton ship, which is a net expense that it has to meet; and so it has to get a full cargo or have an enormous tax put upon the tonnage that it carries. So it will be greatly handicapped in the use of the canal, because it could not pick up two or three thousand tons and make the trip at any profit. That will militate in favor of the line that makes regular sailings, and in that way cut out the effective competition and the effective rate reducer of the ocean.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, it is understood that the New Haven Railroad, which owns the New England Steamship Co. and the Merchants' and Miners' Transportation Co., will be ordered by the Interstate Commerce Commission to sell those lines of steamers. I do not know whether that will be done, but under the terms of the Panama Canal act the New Haven Co. will quite likely be obliged to make a sale.

Mr. LEWIS. Mr. President, may I interrupt the Senator to ask him a question for information?

Mr. WEEKS. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS. I have just been discussing with a couple of colleagues certain testimony in the RECORD presented by the address of the able Senator from South Dakota [Mr. CRAWFORD], and I think I recall an address on the subject by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], where reference is made to the fact that some one testified to 92 per cent of the coastwise ships of the United States being in one consolidation. Does the Senator from Massachusetts know from whom that came and to what it referred?

Mr. WEEKS. It comes from the report of the House Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries, and the 92 per cent refers to vessels engaged in regular transportation between two definite points. It includes the Eastern Steamship Co., the New England Navigation Co., the Merchants' & Miners' Co., the Atlantic, Gulf coast, and West Indies steamship lines, which include the Clyde Line, the Mallory Line, the Ward Line, and the Porto Rico Line. It also includes the Reading Railroad Co. barges.

Incidentally, the Reading Railroad Co. owns more vessels than any other owner engaged in the coastwise service—more vessels, but they are entirely engaged in transporting coal from the terminus of the Reading Railroad to the point of shipment.

Substantially speaking, those are the lines which are referred to as controlling 92 per cent of the Atlantic coastwise trade; but it is really only 8 per cent of the total traffic; and these lines are operated in different sections. They do not run to the same points, except that they center in New York, with the exception of one line, but go in different directions. That is the basis of the generally accepted charge that there is a monopoly, controlled by one general interest, which covers 90 per cent of the Atlantic coastwise business.

Mr. LEWIS. I thank the Senator for allowing the interruption.

Mr. WEEKS. I have suggested that the New Haven Railroad will probably be compelled to sell its steamship lines. I have here statements of two of those lines, which I wish to submit to the Senate, because they indicate the condition of this trade.

One of these lines covers practically all of the Sound steamship lines running from Fall River, Providence, and other points to New York. It is really a part of the New Haven system, and has been for many years. This arrangement is of advantage to the shipper, because those steamers have their New York terminus at different points down town in New York. If the freight from New England to New York all went by rail, it would have to be transported from the uptown district, where freight is generally received; but going by boat, it is landed at convenient points down town, near the point where it is to be used, and therefore the arrangement is of material advantage to the shipper.

The Merchants & Miners' Line was purchased by the New Haven Railroad a few years ago, and includes steamers which run from Boston and New York to Philadelphia and Baltimore. The New Haven Railroad paid $3,750,000 for 25 000 shares of this stock, which was very much more than the control of the company; in fact, as I recall, it is five-sixths of the shares of the company. That stock is now selling, whenever there is a market for it, at 30 cents on the dollar; so that the 25,000 shares would sell for one-fifth what the New Haven Railroad paid for them.

Let us examine the reason for this, what are the results of the operation of the Merchants & Miners' Steamship Line. Last year it earned from freight $4,590,000; from passengers, $643,000; and all its other revenues were sufficient to make a total operating revenue of $5,347,000. Its operating expenses were $5,029,000, which, taking out taxes, left a total net income of $250,596. The interest on the bonded debt of this company was $239,000. The charge for rents, wharfage, and other charges which the company had to pay was $177,000, making a total of $417,000, or a deficit in the operations of the company of $166,000 for the year. In other words, the New Haven Railroad did not get any return on its investment and the company lost $166,000 for the year.

If there is anyone who wants to go into the coastwise steamship business and thinks it is a rich field for adventure, he can buy the Merchants & Miners' Steamship Line for probably not more than one-half what it cost the New Haven Railroad Co., and very much less than it would cost to duplicate the property, notwithstanding the fact that the company has a good name and a well-established trade.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, was that without writing off anything for deterioration?

Mr. WEEKS. They wrote off for deterioration $143,000. The steamers are carried at very much less than cost and I judge by looking over their ages that there has been a reasonable write off during the life of the company, though not sufficient, in my judgment, to bring the steamers down to their actual value to-day.

The New England Steamship Co., as I have said, covers all of the Sound lines of steamers centering in New York. The freight revenues from these steamers last year were $2,483,000. The passenger revenues were $2,065,000. Other revenue brought the total revenue from operation up to $4,916,000. Taking out the operating expenses of $4,361,000 and taxes of $32,000 there was a total income from operation of $581,000 for the year. The interest on the bonds and the rentals and wharfage and other charges paid by the company aggregated $936,000, or it left a deficit of $335,000, and no dividends were paid on the stock of the company.

The present steamers of this line cost originally $12,422,000, and they have been written down to $8,319,000, which I think is a fair write off.

I will add that the earnings of the Atlantic, Gulf & West Indies Line were not sufficient to pay any dividends on the stock; that the earnings of the New England Steamship Line, which covers all of the coastwise traffic between Boston and the Maine coast, showed for the year 1912 a surplus of $6,095, and for the year 1913 a deficit after paying wharfage and interest on the bonded indebtedness, no dividends being paid on the stock either year.

In other words, as far as those four great lines are concerned, which are practically the passenger lines of the Atlantic coast, if we combined their net earnings for the past year they would show a deficit, without paying a dollar of return on the stock.

What nonsense it is to talk about a grinding monopoly on shippers, when the earnings of these companies are not sufficient to pay their fixed charges without paying anything by way of a fair return on the capital actually invested in the stocks of the companies.

Mr. President, I do not care to take any further time of the Senate to discuss this question. I have two or three matters relating to subjects I have touched which I should like to have permission to include in the RECORD. Generally speaking, however, the reasons why our shippers can not compete with foreign shippers, and why if we should remove this restriction on our coastwise trade our coastwise shipping would be sold to foreign owners at once, and would immediately fly a foreign flag, are as follows:

We have established a better standard of food for American sailors. That is one of the navigation laws which Senators talk about repealing.

We have a higher standard of pay for American sailors. That is another one of the navigation laws which they talk about repealing.

The requirement that ships sailing under the American flag shall be constructed in American shipyards by American workmen, who are paid American rates of compensation, is the third very important reason why we can not compete with foreign shipping.

There are other reasons, however. The high cost of labor, which is from 50 to 100 per cent more in this country than in rival countries; the high cost of material, which is at least 25 per cent higher than in rival countries; the high rate which money commands in this country, at least 1 to 2 per cent more than money in foreign countries; the high cost of wages and salaries in the United States; the high cost of fuel; the high cost of repairs; the fact that a freight rate established by an American line can not be changed under 30 days, while the foreign craft will make any kind of rate to get a cargo on a return trip. These are some of the many reasons why we can not enter into active competition with foreign shipping.

If this amendment should prevail, Mr. President, I will make the prediction that inside of one year not one-tenth of the coastwise shipping which is now flying the American flag would still be under that flag. It would be controlled by foreign concerns flying foreign flags, and the rates would be marked up to correspond to other shipping rates which are made by the combinations which actually control our foreign trade to-day.

If Senators want to find a real combination in the shipping business, let them read the report of the Committee on the Merchant Marine and Fisheries of the House. They will find there a clear-cut statement of the combinations which are burdensome to our American foreign traffic which is being carried almost entirely by ships sailing under foreign flags. Why try to destroy our small coastwise shipping for the benefit of our foreign rivals? On the Atlantic coast we have less than 5,000,000 tons, and yet there are 30,000,000 tons of foreign shipping engaged in our American trade—16,000,000 tons controlled by Great Britain, 4,000,000 tons by Germany, and the balance by the other commercial nations of Europe. Does anyone think that inside of the shortest possible time this enormous foreign tonnage would not be diverted into the coastwise trade of the United States, taking the place of the service which is being furnished now, and in many cases furnishing the kind of service which is furnished by tramp steamers, without any corresponding reduction in rates? If that is done, we will have real combinations, and foreigners will be the beneficiaries.

I can not express my surprise that there should be a deliberate proposition to repeal the laws which have been in force in this country for a hundred years, which are similar to those which obtain in all other countries, and which have been instrumental in building up this traffic without any proposition whatever to replace them if the amendment should prevail.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

Mr. WEEKS. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Does not the Senator think the argument which he has made in reference to the difference in cost of our labor here and labor in Europe should be a very strong argument in favor of unrestricted immigration to this country.

Mr. WEEKS. Mr. President, I believe in maintaining an American standard of labor, of wages, and of every other condition. That is what the Republican Party believes in. That is what we are trying to do in this coastwise trade. It has not been different in the shipping industry than in the course followed in all other protected industries of this country.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, before the Senator sits down, I wish to ask him a question for his opinion.

I am not in favor of an amendment like that offered by the Senator from Missouri; but I have thought that so far as our overseas trade is concerned, possibly instead of giving subsidies we might see the American flag flying on vessels engaged in the overseas trade if we should permit American capital to buy ships wherever it sees fit to buy them, instead of being required to get them in American shipyards, and employ sailors just as the owners of foreign vessels employ sailors, at wages the same as they pay, and employ them to work under conditions such as sailors on board foreign vessels work.

I admit we can not furnish high-class table fare, shower baths, and a separate basin and towel for each sailor; eight hours a day shifts in the lookout, in the pilot house, in the engine room, and all that sort of thing; buy all the material from American producers; buy ships made in American yards; and then go out and compete with the owners of vessels who buy them everywhere and anywhere and employ Japanese and Chinese and give them Jap fare and Chinese fare and work them 12 hours or 16 hours or 18 hours a day. We can not compete under such conditions as those; but if we were to throw the door open, allow American capital to go out on an absolutely equal footing with foreign capital and remove these restrictions, would we not then have our flag floating in overseas trade?

Mr. WEEKS. I am only in favor of floating our flag under conditions which will give the people engaged in the trade the protection and the good conditions which prevail in our American life.

I will say to the Senator that if he were given the best ship in the world, with an obligation to run it under the American flag under the conditions provided in our navigation laws, he could not afford to accept the gift if he had to run the ship 20 years in competition with foreign ships of the same class.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Just to put it bluntly and plainly, then, are we not face to face with a situation where we must either see our ambition to have the American flag float in over-seas trade unfulfilled, or we must wipe out the differences I have suggested? What other alternative is there except to grant subsidies?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not discussing alternatives at this time under these conditions, but I will say to the Senator that if I were the general manager of the United States I would transport in American ships the goods of the United States, not only to South America and the Orient but to Europe; I would not allow it to be carried by our commercial rivals. It might cost me more in the beginning than the immediate conditions would seem to warrant, but it would be doing what every business man does when he attempts to establish trade. He spends money to get it, and when the trade is once controlled he ordinarily gets a return which warrants his attempt. That is what the United States ought to provide for by law.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The Senator would have it through a bounty?

Mr. WEEKS. I would have it through a subsidy or some form of subsidy.

Mr. CRAWFORD. And there is no other way, unless we unshackle the conditions?

Mr. WEEKS. I am not in favor of unshackling conditions. I am in favor of a subsidy.

Mr. CRAWFORD. We might as well face the situation. It is one or the other.

Mr. WEEKS. I am willing to face the situation. I would like to do it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (at 6 o'clock p. m.). Mr. President, we have been in session continuously since 11 o'clock this morning and I think we are entitled to a short rest, time enough to go home and get our dinner. I move that the Senate take a recess until 8 o'clock.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Utah. [Putting the question.] The noes have it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON] and vote "yea."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. He is absent and I withhold my vote.

Mr. THORNTON. I am paired for a while this afternoon with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] and vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). I transfer my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON]. I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (after having voted in the negative). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], which I transfer to the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. MARTINE] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. I transfer that pair to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and vote "nay."

Mr. THORNTON (after having voted in the negative). The Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE], to whom I transferred my pair, having since entered the Chamber and voted, I withdraw my vote.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 46, as follows:

YEAS—28.

Borah	Colt	Lodge	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate refuses to take a recess. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] to the amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I do not desire to protract the discussion, but I intend to vote against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and I desire briefly to state my reason for voting against it.

This legislation which has been engaging our attention for the last two months was induced by the request of the President that we repeal the exemption clause of the act of 1912 for the reason, as claimed by him, that it contravenes the provisions of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I do not know that his statement in that respect is based on any opinion that he entertains himself with respect to the controverted questions of the treaty. I do not know whether he formed that opinion himself or whether he accepted the opinion of others on that question. If this bill is to be enacted, we are now carrying out his views and acting upon the opinion then conveyed by him to the Congress of the United States.

Since the passage of this bill in the House, in order to make it more palatable to the American public various amendments have been proposed. If I did not entertain a very high respect for the author of the amendment before us, I would say its only purpose was to throw dust in the eyes of the American people. I would say it was designed only to make them believe that the Congress of the United States was not surrendering vital national rights.

Unpalatable concoctions frequently are sugar-coated. So it is with this particular piece of legislation. It is proposed by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina to couple with the enactment the declaration that we are not waiving any rights that we may have and that we are not surrendering our rights of sovereignty over the canal. We may have our own views in this body to-day as to the interpretation that ought to be placed on the language of this proposed amendment. It is not impossible that we might be in accord as to its legal significance, but it should be remembered that all our diplomatic relations with Great Britain from the beginning of our Government have been marked by controversy and dispute and contentions as to the meaning and intent of the various treaties into which we have entered from time to time. We are now, after a space of 64 years, engaged in a dispute as to the meaning of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. After 13 years there is a sharp dispute in this body, as well as outside this body perhaps, as to the true meaning and intent of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty of 1901.

I can entertain little doubt that if the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina should be adopted it will be the source of infinite controversy and dispute in the future. Verbal gymnasts and intellectual acrobats will split hairs over it in the future. We have a right to look forward and anticipate what will be the attitude of Great Britain years hence—perhaps in 3 or 4, perhaps in 10 or 15 or 20 years—as to what significance is to be attached to the action of the American Congress in passing a statute repealing the exemption in the Panama act at the instance and because of the protest of Great Britain. Of course it would be said, if this amendment be adopted, that the Senate incorporated by amendment the declaration that we were not waiving any rights that we have, but reference will then be made to the declaration of the President of the United States at this time that we had no rights and therefore we are waiving no rights. Reference will be made to the declaration of the distinguished Senator from North Carolina on the floor of the Senate that we are not surrendering any right in passing this bill. The same thing will be said with reference to the attitude of the distinguished Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH].

It will not avail us to remind the representatives of the British Government at that time that the views of the President and these two Senators and the views of other Senators were but their personal views. It will not avail us to say that in 1912 these Senators expressed themselves upon the floor of the Senate with every confidence that the exemption of the coastwise vessels did not constitute a violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. Of course they have changed their views, and with a becoming modesty from one or both we have the statement that perhaps if the third opportunity be presented they may revise their opinions and entertain other views. That is not extraordinary. Men change their views with respect to the meaning of legal instruments. They have a right to change those views in questions of doubtful interpretation. But that emphasizes the need of precision at this time in enunciating our attitude and declaring the reasons why we, the Congress of the United States, are willing, if there be a majority so inclined, to repeal this exemption. In my judgment the only declaration that will meet the hope and the prayers of the American people to-day is that contained in the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. Those who insist upon a repeal should couple with the enactment of the repeal the emphatic declaration, in substance, that we make this change and reverse our policy because of economic reasons, not that we entertain any doubt as to our legal and our moral right under the treaty to discriminate in favor of American ships.

Much of the confusion in the past, much of the confusion now prevailing, has been due, in my judgment, to a tendency on the part either of the American Government or of the American Congress to resort I will not say to subterfuge, but to compromise in verbal expression when there should be a strong, vigorous, determined effort by the use of the direct, unambiguous language to safeguard the rights of the American people. Those rights in this critical situation, if this repeal is to be enacted into law, can at best be but partially safeguarded by the declaration that we assert our legal rights to grant such exemption as we see fit at any time to American ships.

It is for this reason, Mr. President, that I shall vote against this compromise measure, which is now fathered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. I hope it will be defeated; and I hope, if this repeal bill unhappily should pass, that it will have coupled with it the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. When he was leaving here he advised me that he wanted to release me from the pair and to allow me to vote on all the amendments except the Simmons amendment, which he did not mention; but I have since seen a telegram from him, in which he asked me to observe the pair with respect to the Simmons amendment, and stating that if he were here he would vote for it. In view of that statement I observe the pair and withhold my vote.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair as on the former vote; but I wish to state that I have made an arrangement with the Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], who is paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], to transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from New York, so that both the Senator from Colorado and I may vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], which I transfer to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. CATRON], and vote "nay."

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. My understanding is that if he were here the Senator from New York would vote as I shall vote upon this amendment. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], if present, would vote "yea."

Mr. THORNTON (when his name was called). Upon this question I am paired with the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. VARDAMAN (when his name was called). I have a pair on this vote with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the two Senators from Arkansas, both of whom are paired and both of whom, if here, would vote "yea" on this roll call.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). Has the senior Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] voted, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Minnesota has not voted.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have a pair with the Senator from Minnesota, which I transfer to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—50.

So the amendment of Mr. SIMMONS to the committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I offer as a substitute for the pending amendment the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Utah offers an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The SECRETARY. As a substitute for the amendment just agreed to it is proposed to insert the following:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be considered as denying or abridging the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, the amendment which has just been adopted as a substitute for the original Simmons amendment, as it seems to me, is most inadequate. That amendment reads:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaties, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

Mr. President, the Senate has been engaged for the past two months in discussing the question whether or not the United States has the right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt the vessels of its citizens from the payment of tolls. That is the question which we are called upon to determine. I venture to say that during this entire debate there has not been one one-hundredth part of the time devoted to the discussion of the economic aspects or of any other aspects of the question other than the right of the United States under the treaty to make this exemption.

Now, Mr. President, after having engaged in that debate, it must follow that every Member of the Senate has made up his mind one way or the other upon it.

That being so, the Senate owes it to itself and to the people of the United States, whose trustees we are in this matter, to declare in unmistakable terms one way or the other upon this subject. If I believed as Senators upon the other side believe upon this question, I would have the courage of my convictions, and offer an amendment to this bill declaring that the United States had no right to make any exemption. I would not content myself, if I believed the United States had no such right, by assenting to a pitiful and dodging proposition such as is this amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I would declare one way or the other upon it.

Now, I undertake to say, and I think it can not be successfully contradicted, that a majority of the Members of the Senate have become convinced that under the treaty with Great Britain we have the right to exempt our coastwise ships, and our other ships for that matter, from the payment of tolls. If that be true, why should we hesitate to declare ourselves? Are we afraid of somebody? Are we afraid of offending the President? Are we afraid of offending Great Britain? Have we not the courage of our convictions upon a matter of this kind? Is it not a question of importance? Why should the Senate of the United States, a majority of whose Members believe and are convinced beyond any doubt in their own minds that under this treaty we have the right to do this thing, hesitate to declare it in positive and unmistakable terms? That, Mr. President, is what the amendment that I have proposed does.

Let me analyze for a moment the amendment which has just been substituted.

That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have.

Why, Mr. President, in this very first phrase of the amendment we have thrown discredit upon our own position. We have said "any right the United States may have," thereby implying plainly the converse of that—that the United States may not have any right at all. Why should we, believing as we do that we have the undoubted right under this treaty to exempt our coastwise shipping, be willing to cast discredit upon that claim by adopting this kind of an amendment, which expresses not our convictions but our doubts? Let us have the courage to declare not that the United States "may have," but as most of us believe, that the United States "has" this right.

Again, the provision is, after reciting the treaty with Great Britain—which, by the way, is not correctly described in the amendment, because it says "under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February," when, as a matter of fact, it was ratified, as I recall, on the 16th of November. At any rate, it was not ratified upon that date; that was the date upon which it was proclaimed; and the same thing may be said with reference to the recital of the treaty with the Republic of Panama, which was not ratified on February 26, as is here recited, but was proclaimed upon that date. The provision is:

Or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States from the payment of tolls.

We do not assert that the United States "may have" a right to discriminate in favor of its vessels, but we limit even that hypothetical right by confining it to the single method of "exempting" them from the payment of tolls.

The treaty which we have upon this subject, in the third article, provides that:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

What we undertake to do, or what we ought to undertake to do, is to negative that whole provision. We ought to declare that we have the right to discriminate in favor of our ships not only with reference to tolls but with reference to the conditions of traffic as well. We have limited even this hypothetical claim, this doubtful claim with reference to the matter, by saying that we may have the right to discriminate in favor of our coastwise vessels by exempting the vessels from tolls, thereby conceding, if language means anything, that we have no right whatever, and that we concede that we have no right whatever, to discriminate in favor of our vessels in any other respect.

The amendment which I have proposed recites in the very language of the treaty the provision of it which we intend to negative—

Nothing herein shall be considered as denying or abridging the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

There we have asserted our right to discriminate in favor of our ships not only in respect to the matter of tolls, but also in respect to the conditions, which may be quite as important. The amendment which has just been adopted as a substitute leaves out that very important point.

As I have said, if the Members of the Senate who believe as I believe with reference to this treaty will vote their convictions, we can put this amendment, which means something, on the bill. How can the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] afford to vote against this amendment? He said, in the course of discussing this question in the Senate a short time ago, on May 5:

I speak not now of any question of power or policy, but only of our naked right under the treaty to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls exactions. More than that, I was equally convinced that the United States had the right under the treaty to exempt not only our coastwise trade vessels from the payment of tolls, but also to exempt our oversea vessels from the payment of tolls. That was my conviction in 1912, and it is my conviction to-day.

If that is the conviction of the Senator from Missouri to-day, as it undoubtedly is, then it seems to me that he can not afford to vote against the amendment which I have suggested.

Mr. STONE. That is my conviction to-day.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Undoubtedly it is the Senator's conviction.

Mr. STONE. I have not departed a hair's breadth from it. I think, however, that the amendment adopted upon the vote cast a few minutes ago sufficiently preserves any right the United States has. It holds safe the thing that I contended for, namely, the right of the United States to pass its ships, coastwise or otherwise, through the canal, giving them preferential rates. I think we could do that easily, though I am opposed to exemption from tolls.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Missouri think that we may have the right to exempt our ships, or does he think we have the right to do it?

Mr. STONE. Why, I think we have the right.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has voted for an amendment which says that we may have the right. I have presented for the consideration of the Senator from Missouri an amendment which says that we have the right. Why will the Senator not vote his convictions upon it?

Mr. STONE. I have voted my convictions. I voted my convictions when I voted for this amendment.

If the Senator will permit me just a word, I do not think any of these amendments are vitally necessary or very important. I think the claim which has been made here in the Senate during this debate, that we were surrendering some part of our sovereignty and our control over the canal, is absolutely unwarranted. I think the vote cast in 1912, when that was an acute question, settled it for all time. I think the amendment the Senator is offering, and those that others who take his position generally on the bill have offered and will offer, are to imperil the passage of this measure; and I am not going to vote for them, for I want the bill to pass.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should be glad to do anything I could to imperil the passage of this bill.

Mr. STONE. I think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I should be very glad to do anything I could to prevent its passage.

Mr. STONE. I think so.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I have not offered the amendment with that view, however, because I realize that the bill is going to pass. I have offered it because I think the bill is going to pass, and I do not want the United States to stand before the world in the attitude of admitting through one branch of its Government, the executive branch, that it positively has no rights whatever, and by another branch of the Government, the legislative branch, that it may have some rights; but that that branch of the Government doubts it very much.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I yield to the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Does the Senator favor the repeal with his amendment added?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No, Mr. President; I do not. I shall vote against the bill, whatever amendment is adopted, as far as that is concerned; but I repeat that I am quite sure the bill is going to pass, and so long as we are confronted with that evil certainty I want to stand before the world in the attitude of having asserted the right, whenever in the future the time may come to act upon it, to deal with our coastwise shipping as we please.

This amendment further says that it—

> Shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain.

Any right which the United States has to exempt coastwise shipping is not under the treaty with Great Britain. It is a right which exists independently and in spite of the treaty with Great Britain.

It has been said by the Senator from Mississippi that arbitration will follow the passage of this bill. I hope it will. I am heartily in favor of arbitrating this question, and I shall do whatever I can in the direction of promoting that notion, whatever may be the fate of this measure. But, Mr. President, we are not going to enter into an arbitration for the purpose of satisfying our own minds. I think no matter what may be the result of the arbitration, no matter what may be the judgment of the arbitrators upon it, most of us will remain in pretty much of the same mind upon the question as we now are. We are submitting it to arbitration, if we do submit it, for the purpose of settling the question.

What a ludicrous attitude we shall present, going before an arbitral board with a statement from the President of the United States first of all positively declaring that we have no right whatever, and then this half-hearted statement from the Senate of the United States and from Congress that we doubt whether we have any right to exempt our coastwise ships!

Why, Mr. President, if two parties were engaged in ordinary litigation before a court, and a complaint were to be filed by one of the parties to the transaction declaring that he had some doubt about his rights, but that he might have some rights, and asking the court to investigate the matter, he certainly would not put himself in a very advantageous position to have his rights determined by the court. People who go before courts assert their rights, and we ought to assert them here. We are not judging of the question. We are simply one party to this transaction, and we assert a right upon the one hand, and Great Britain asserts that we are mistaken upon the other hand, and that presents a question which the board of arbitration can take hold of and effectually deal with.

I think I have said all I care to say upon this amendment. I hope Senators like the Senator from Missouri and like the Senator from Mississippi and like a number of other Senators whose names I might mention upon the other side of the Chamber, who believe that under the treaty we have the right to exempt our coastwise shipping, will vote their sentiments upon the question.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate less than five minutes.

The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] openly declares that if his amendment were added he would still vote against repeal. It is rather dangerous to have a man who intends to vote against your final measure show you how to perfect it. The truth is the suggestion of the Senator from Utah was expressed a few minutes before by the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN], who also intends to vote against the repeal bill, even if the amendment were added to it.

What is the real object of this amendment? What would be its practical effect? To divide the forces that are in favor of repeal. The men who are against repeal would put on an amendment, if they could, and then vote against repeal; but by their amendment they seek to divide those who favor repeal.

It is well understood that those in favor of repeal can be divided into two classes. Some of them believe that under the treaty we can not give a discrimination even in favor of our coastwise vessels. Some of them believe we can; but because, as a matter of economic policy, they are opposed to giving this benefit or subsidy to the coastwise vessels they favor repeal. If the Senator from Utah can attach to the repeal bill a declaration that we assert the right to discriminate, then he drives off Senators like the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], and a number of other Senators who could not vote for repeal if it were coupled with the declaration that we had the right to discriminate in favor of coastwise vessels. It would simply defeat the repeal. I would say that was the purpose, but I understood the Senator from Utah to say it was not the purpose.

The Senator from Utah says the amendment we adopted a few moments ago was a meaningless thing. I take issue with him. It is an express declaration that we reserve every right that the United States has under the treaty. The Senator from New York said that it would be the subject of construction. If there had been no such proviso added, it might have been the subject of construction. The object of this proviso was expressly to declare that we did not waive but reserved every right we had, and there is nothing left for construction. It gives the opportunity for every Senator to vote his convictions that the repeal should take place, whether he believes under the treaty we could discriminate or whether he believes under the treaty we could not discriminate.

If the amendment of the Senator from Utah were adopted, you would drive from the proposition of repeal those who believe we have no right to discriminate, while those who are opposed to repeal would vote against repeal even after they had added the provision which the Senator offers.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. Mr. President, I have carefully refrained from taking any part in this debate from the beginning, for two reasons: First, because I knew that it would be handled by those who are accustomed to debating, and second, because I really wanted to inform myself, and the vote was really the important thing.

My position on this question has been outlined with a good deal of severity, although unknown to that Senator, by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. SMITH] in his last remarks. I shall vote for the amendemnt of the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. It was certainly unintentional, because——

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. It was entirely unintentional, because I had made no expression of my position.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. I never meant to be severe on my friend from Wyoming.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. I shall also vote against repeal, even if that amendment be added. I shall vote for the amendment, because if the majority forces this country to go to the un-American doctrine which this repeal inculcates, I want to do as little damage as possible. Therefore, if this repeal must go through, as I think it ought not, I want to see it go through with the saving American clause that we sacrifice none of the rights which we have under the treaty.

That is the reason I shall vote that way; and it is not a matter of logrolling. I voted against the amendment which has just been adopted because it is not only a meaningless thing, but it is worse. I do not believe in writing any more conundrums into our laws.

We have been debating here for two months over the meaning of language. We have been debating here for two months earnestly, by the best intellects of this Nation, as to what the written word means in a treaty. It is agreed by everybody that the amendment that has just been adopted means one thing to this man and another thing to that man. It is safe to say that that is the reason the amendment is adopted; and the Senator from Georgia intimates that that is the case.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. Oh, no, Mr. President; I did not.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming. The Senator said you had to have an amendment in the bill that would keep in line those who were in favor of repeal as an economic policy and those who were in favor of repeal, because they thought the existing law violated the treaty. You had to have an amendment there that would keep both of those in line; otherwise your bill would fail.

I do not care to go into the argument. If you are going to repeal the existing law, I want it repealed so that the whole world will understand exactly what we mean. I do not want to see this law written on the statute books with an apology at the end of it which says to one man, "Interpret it your way," and to another, "Interpret it your way." I would rather see your bill go through naked, as it was introduced here and as it came from the House, than to have it tied down with this ambiguity, which is going to afford only field for disagreement in the future; and I think that is the manly course that ought to be taken in this respect. You ought either to assert the right as the amendment of the Senator from Utah asserts the right, or you ought to take the naked repeal and pass it without any compromising addenda.

I make these remarks simply for the purpose of indicating my views in brief and the reason for my vote.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I expect to vote for the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I am going to vote for it because it means something. There is no equivocation, there is no double meaning, there is no doubt about what it means.

I voted against the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] for the reason that I regard it as the acme of diplomatic dissimulation. It really, Mr. President, means nothing. It preserves no rights over the canal to the American people which they would not have without it. I think the time has come when we should deal candidly with the American people, when we should say what we think and try to think what we say.

If the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah should be adopted, our right of sovereignty over this canal will never be questioned again.

Personally, as I said a few days ago, I am not interested at this moment about the economic principle involved in this controversy. That is not the issue. The vital, paramount question involved in this controversy is the right of the United States Government to own and control the canal. If we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, we have got nothing. It is meaningless—an outrageous abandonment of the rights of the Government of the United States and an affront to candor. If we adopt the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah, all doubts as to our rights are eliminated and the American people will know what we have done. The world will know the position we have taken, and all question will be removed.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I am for the amendment of the Senator from Utah provided the words "in the domestic coastwise trade" are inserted in line 5, after the word "canal," so that the proviso will read:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be considered as denying or abridging the rights of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships and commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal in the domestic coastwise trade, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, let me say to the Senator from Nevada that the danger of such a change in the amendment as that would be that we would then assert that we had the right to discriminate in favor of one class of our ships, and that would be equivalent to an admission that we did not have the right to discriminate in favor of the other class of ships. I think we have the right to discriminate in favor of both. I think that our right to discriminate in favor of our ships engaged in the foreign trade is just as clear under the treaty as our right to discriminate in favor of the coastwise ships.

I could not assent to any amendment which would declare in favor of one class and thereby carry with it an implication that we have no right to discriminate in favor of the other class.

Mr. NEWLANDS. Mr. President, I believe that we have a right only to discriminate as to ships engaged in the coastwise trade. I believe that the treaty requires that all international tonnage passing through the canal, including our own, shall pay the same rates. I believe, however, that the treaty, according to the Olsen case, according to the fixed policy of the Nation, ought not to apply and does not apply to purely domestic commerce, which alone can be conducted upon purely domestic ships. I believe that the treaty settled the question as to international tonnage, over-seas tonnage, as distinguished from purely domestic coastwise tonnage, and that such portion of our tonnage as is borne by vessels of the United States engaged in foreign commerce is subject under the treaty to the tolls. Therefore I can not vote for this amendment in its broad form. Later on I may offer an amendment, if the amendment of the Senator from Utah is lost, which will cover my contention.

In this connection, Mr. President, I must say that I object to the use of the term "discriminate" in this proviso. I do not think that the United States, in providing tolls exemption for domestic vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, is discriminating against England. I do not think this treaty has anything whatever to do with our domestic coastwise transportation and that we do not discriminate against England when we provide for tolls exemption. As to the tonnage of domestic ships engaged in the coastwise trade, we simply exercise a right of legislation regarding a purely domestic concern not covered at all by the terms of the treaty.

Let me say briefly, further, that I believe this amendment, if it contains the amendment which I added, should also provide as follows at the close:

Provided, however, That the charges imposed on international tonnage shall be only such proportionate part of the total upkeep and interest charge of the canal as such international tonnage bears to the total tonnage passing through the canal.

I wish to give England clear evidence that when we exempt our domestic ships from tolls we do not seek to impose the burden from which we relieve them upon international tonnage, but that we propose to apply to that international tonnage only its proportional part of the upkeep and interest charge of the canal.

I deem it a matter to be regretted that in the original legislation we did not make a specific declaration to this effect, stating that our purpose was not to impose an additional burden upon international tonnage but simply to pursue the traditional policy of the United States for the last century, which has been for the full development of our waterways, both natural and artificial, at the expense of the United States Treasury and not at the cost of the traffic borne upon such waterways.

Mr. President, we have expended over $500,000,000 upon our domestic waterways, including canals connecting such waterways. We have highly artificialized the Ohio River so that to-day from Pittsburgh to Cairo it is simply a canal divided by dams and locks, and slack-water navigation can be pursued from Cairo to Pittsburgh. This has been done at a cost of $65,000,000. There has not been a suggestion that any part of the maintenance or the interest charge of that expenditure should be imposed upon the tonnage borne upon the waters of the Ohio.

So it has been throughout the history of the Republic. In the early days we had toll roads and we had toll canals. We have drifted away from that narrow and contracted policy. Roads are now constructed at the expense of the taxpayers, and canals and waterways are developed at the expense of the taxpayers in the interest of commerce.

It is an outrage upon the Pacific Coast States, it is an outrage upon the Gulf Coast States, it is an outrage upon all the ports of the Atlantic that have traffic borne to the coast from the ports of the Pacific and vice versa, that they should be charged with a toll imposed by a purely domestic waterway constructed from the funds in the Treasury of the United States with a view to the reimbursement ultimately of such funds when the domestic traffic of all other ports upon the Atlantic coast with each other, upon the Mississippi River and its tributaries with each other, upon the Pacific coast waterways and their tributaries with each other, goes untaxed and uncharged.

By this action of imposing tolls we discriminate against certain sections and certain commercial areas of the United States instead of dealing out to all that just and equal legislation that becomes a great Nation.

Now, so far as I am concerned, I want to bear evidence to the world that our purpose is not to impose upon international traffic an unfair burden, that having expended $400,000,000 upon this canal and having to meet a certain interest charge and upkeep we can, if we choose, allow that charge so far as our domestic traffic is concerned to stand as the traditions of the Republic require against the Treasury and not against the tonnage carried; but that, on the other hand, so far as international traffic is concerned a charge shall there be imposed upon the tonnage because that is the only way we have of collecting it.

I would gladly see put into the Panama Canal act a declaration that the tolls of the vessels belonging to the various nationals shall be paid by the nationals themselves instead of by their citizens. If we were to do that, we would then have a statute that would deal fairly with all. We could then impose by this statute that proportion of the charge of the upkeep and interest of the canal properly chargeable against domestic ships upon the Treasury, as has been the custom throughout the history of the Republic, and we could also provide that foreign Governments could, if they chose out of their treasuries, pay the tolls exacted from their citizens.

I am in favor of no discriminating legislation. I want the rule of equality and justice both international and domestic, and the course which I advocate will, in my judgment, best secure it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, purely in the interest of the economy of the public time and the economy of the time and the health of Senators, I move to lay the amendment of the Senator from Utah on the table.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Mississippi moves to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President, I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Washington makes the point of no quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	O'Gorman	Smith, S. C.
Bankhead	Gronna	Overman	Smoot
Borah	Hollis	Page	Sterling
Brady	Hughes	Perkins	Stone
Brandegee	James	Poindexter	Sutherland

Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	Works
du Pont	Myers	Smith, Ga.
Fletcher	Newlands	Smith, Md.
Gallinger	Norris	Smith, Mich.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The question——

Mr. BRISTOW. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remind the Presiding Officer that the motion pending is the motion to lay the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] on the table.

Mr. GALLINGER. The motion to adjourn takes precedence of that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. A motion to adjourn has been made by the Senator from Kansas [Mr. BRISTOW].

Mr. BRISTOW. On that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STONE. That would seem to be a pretty clear case of filibustering.

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], who is absent, and on that account I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the announcement made by me upon the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the negative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN] and will let my vote stand.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I am paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. LODGE. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is unavoidably absent from the city. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. VARDAMAN (after having voted in the negative). I have a pair with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON]. As I do not know how he would vote on this question, if present, I withdraw my vote.

Mr. CRAWFORD. The junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS] asked me to say for him that he was temporarily unavoidably absent from the Chamber.

The result was announced—yeas 22, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—22.

Borah	Colt	Jones	Smoot
Bristow	Dillingham	Perkins	Warren
Burleigh	du Pont	Poindexter	Works
Catron	Gallinger	Ransdell

Fall	Oliver	Stephenson	Weeks

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I remind the Chair of the fact that the motion to table the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is pending. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. What is the motion, Mr. President?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion is that of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] to lay on the table the amendment offered by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but I understood from him that I was released with reference to this amendment. I therefore take the liberty, with his permission, of voting. I vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I make the same announcement as to my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] which I made on the last roll call. I transfer that pair to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). On this question I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], who, if present, would vote "nay." I transfer that pair to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and vote "yea."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and on account of his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]; but I am informed that if he were here, the Senator from New York would vote as I shall vote. I therefore vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating my announcement on the previous roll call, I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. JAMES. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS], which I transfer to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK], and will allow my vote in the affirmative to stand.

Mr. SIMMONS (after having voted in the affirmative). I transfer my pair with the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] to the Senator from Nevada [Mr. PITTMAN], and will let my vote stand.

The result was announced—yeas 49, nays 33, as follows:

YEAS—49.

Bankhead	James	Overman	Stephenson
Brandegee	Johnson	Owen	Sterling

So Mr. SUTHERLAND'S amendment to the amendment was laid on the table.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I intend presently to offer an amendment to the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina, but I will take the liberty before I send it to the desk of explaining what it is and what it seeks to accomplish.

I desire to strike out in the second line of the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina, which is now the pending amendment, as I understand, the word "any" and insert in lieu of it the word "the." I desire also to strike out from line 3 the words "may have" and insert in lieu of them the word "has." I also desire to strike out from lines 7 and 8 the words "discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting" and insert the word "exempt," so that when amended, as I hope it will be, in accordance with this suggestion, it will read:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of the right the United States has under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise to exempt the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaties, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

Mr. President, I voted against the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina not because, in my opinion, it is not a better expression than the amendment proposed by the committee, but because it seemed to commit me to the proposition it contains. I know that the motives of the Senator from North Carolina, who proposed it, are good; I know that the motives of those who voted for it are good; I know that they believe it to be the pure metal, but I think that its only effect will be to "gold-brick" the people of the United States and to delude and deceive them with respect to the actual conditions which now confront us.

The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] says with the utmost frankness, as is characteristic of the Senator from Mississippi, that this is but a prelude to the arbitration between Great Britain and the United States of the dispute with regard to our right to exempt our vessels from the payment of charges in the use of the canal. I have not a word to say against that effort to prepare the way for an arbitration, but this amendment as it passes into the bill, as I assume it will, will not prepare the way for an arbitration for the settlement of that dispute, and it can not prepare the way for any such arbitration or settlement. There can be no arbitration unless there is a controversy. It is impossible to conceive a settlement of a controversy without the existence of a controversy. If the bill passes as it is now proposed that it shall pass, what will be the controversy between Great Britain and the United States? A controversy involves the notion that one claims something that another denies, and that the dispute is submitted to an impartial arbitrator for settlement. Tell me what Great Britain claims that the United States denies if this bill shall pass.

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. POMERENE. Is it the purpose of the amendment to have the Senate place upon the treaty a construction to the effect that the United States has the right to discriminate?

Mr. CUMMINS. I want to be fully understood. I yielded to the Senator for the purpose of permitting him to ask me a question. He has asked the question and I answered it. I do not yield for any other purpose.

It is the purpose of the amendment which I shall presently offer so to modify the amendment presented by the Senator from North Carolina that it will constitute an assertion, a claim of our right to exempt the vessels of the United States and her citizens from the payment of tolls. It is not quite like the amendment of the Senator from Utah, because that amendment seemed to recognize that in so doing we were discriminating in favor of our vessels or discriminating against the vessels of other countries. I do not so believe. I think we can exempt the vessels of the United States and her people without any discrimination whatever, and therefore I have sought to eliminate those words from the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

I return, however, to my proposition.

What will be the controversy that is to be submitted to arbitration or to settlement in any other way? What does Great Britain claim that we will not have conceded when we have passed this bill in its present form? I grant you that there are two things—one, possibly, that Great Britain has claimed—that we do not concede by passing this bill.

First, she claims that we have no right to pass the vessels of Panama through the canal without charge. That will be left for arbitration. I wonder how many Senators want to submit that question to arbitration? That, of course, is a mere shadow. There is not a Senator here, there is not a citizen of the United States, who has any thought of submitting to arbitration a question of that kind.

Secondly, Great Britain claims that we have no right to exclude the railroad-owned ships of Canada or the Canadian railroads from the canal. That, I concede, will be open for settlement. Those, however, are the only questions that will be so open.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I wish to remind the Senator from Iowa of the fact that every arbitration treaty we have says that we shall leave to arbitration the interpretation of treaties. It says "in all cases," and then specifies certain exceptions; and one of the exceptions specified is where the interests of third parties are concerned. Therefore, of course, we could not submit to arbitration any question that affected Panama.

Mr. CUMMINS. Very well. I think that is true. That is the only question that is open so far as Great Britain is concerned, but that is one of the two questions now.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, suppose the Senator's amendment should be adopted, would there be anything more open to arbitration?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly there would be something more open to arbitration. The United States must in some fashion or other claim that we have the right to exempt these vessels from the payment of tolls before anything can be submitted to arbitration. The United States has made that claim in the passage of the canal act. Now, we recede from the claim we then made by the passage of that act and establish equality of tolls between all ships, including our own. Who will suggest the arbitration? Who will say to Great Britain that the United States claims the right to exempt her own vessels? The President can not say it. Even if constitutionally he might open the negotiation, we all know that he believes we have no right to exempt these vessels; and it would be an idle form, it would be a shameful mockery, for the President of the United States to assert to Great Britain that we had the right to exempt these vessels from the payment of tolls.

The only men who can make the assertion are the men who compose the Congress of the United States; and if we ever approach arbitration, we must do it, of course, through a treaty or an agreement with Great Britain; and before we can adopt that treaty the Congress of the United States will be compelled to say to Great Britain that we claim the right to pass these vessels through the canal without charge; and if we do that, how, then, will the Senators in this Chamber vote?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I think the Senator mistook my question a little. The doubt that I had in my mind—and I believe it is a real doubt that exists—is this: Is it possible to arbitrate a mere declaration?

My judgment would be that no declaration in this bill could be the cause of an arbitration. It would simply reserve our right and notify Great Britain that we reserve it; and upon some future occasion, if we desired to exercise that right, then the occasion for arbitration would arise.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not deny that. I do not deny that 10 years hence or 40 years hence or 100 years hence some Congress might pass a resolution claiming the right; but——

Mr. HITCHCOCK. No; that was not my point.

Mr. CUMMINS. But England has claimed her right.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I think the Senator still misunderstands me. My point is that whether the Congress passes the bill with the amendment that has already been adopted, or whether the Congress passes the bill with the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa, still in neither case would there be any occasion for arbitration until, at some future date, the right reserved in either of these two amendments was sought to be exerted by Congress. Then the occasion would arise for arbitration.

Mr. CUMMINS. On the contrary, England has already asked us to arbitrate this question; and, notwithstanding our sensitiveness about taking a position with regard to our own rights, England has taken her position through her duly constituted authorities. She has no hesitation in saying to the world how she construes the treaty, and she asks us to arbitrate. Now, we can not arbitrate if we conceded what she asks; and if we pass this bill in its present form there will be no longer anything left to arbitrate.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. I am not saying that Congress in the future might not review and reverse the action we now take, but I think the Senator from Nebraska must feel sure that if we do this thing without asserting the American construction of the treaty there never will be arbitration, and we will be bound for all time, so far as one can foresee, to the course upon which we now enter.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Mr. President, I had not fully finished; and I am still unable to get the Senator's attention to the exact point I make.

It seems to me that Great Britain will not demand arbitration simply because the United States passes an act containing a clause reserving a certain right. Great Britain will demand arbitration only in the event that at some future time we proceed to enact legislation exercising the right which we are now asserting. If that is true, if I am correct in that position, then the amendment which the Senator from Iowa offers is no better occasion for arbitration, is no more certain reservation of our right, than the amendment which has already been tentatively adopted by the Senate.

I am making this statement, although I am rather inclined to vote for the Senators' amendment; but I doubt whether he is justified in the declaration that it will lay any more foundation for the assertion of our right and for the settlement of that right by arbitration than the amendment which has already been adopted.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not understand that we must have action. I do not understand that we must take the thing in dispute before we can submit the controversy to arbitration, but I do understand that we must assert our right, our title to the thing which is in dispute, before we can have or even yield to the arbitration.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. Then the Senator is of opinion, is he, that the mere assertion that we have the right would afford Great Britain an occasion for demanding arbitration?

Mr. CUMMINS. That always has been done. I think nearly every arbitration we ever had was based upon the assertion upon the one side of a right which was denied upon the other.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. I can not recall any occasion when arbitration was demanded except when action was either being taken or threatened. A declaration is not action.

Mr. CUMMINS. How did we arrive at the settlement of the claims growing out of the course of Great Britain during the Civil War?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was a denial of the claims. There was a refusal to pay them.

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly. How did we arrive at the boundary line between the United States and Canada?

Mr. HITCHCOCK. We arrived at that because we were taking action to maintain our theory of the boundary, while Canada was taking the same action on her side.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely; but there was no collision, so far as possession was concerned.

Mr. HITCHCOCK. There was not actual war.

Mr. CUMMINS. It was simply an assertion of our right upon the one side, and the denial of it upon the other.

I now yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I desire to say before a motion is made to lay this amendment on the table, for fear I may never get a chance to say it again, that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa because I want to vote for all the amendments which make a positive assertion as to the right of the United States to send our vessels through the canal free; I want to vote for all assertions as to our complete, exclusive ownership of the canal and our right to dominate it and control it in the interest of the American Commonwealth as against the world; but I do agree in large measure with what the Senator from Nebraska has said as to the question of arbitration.

We are proceeding to repeal the law which was objectionable to Great Britain. We are proceeding to wipe out that which was offensive to Great Britain, and which seems to have been more offensive to some upon this side of the water than to those upon the other side of the water. What will Great Britain have to quarrel about? It is true there is found in the repealing act a harmless, insidious, wholly meaningless amendment, which says that while we are doing that which you want us to do, and all that you want us to do, we reserve our rights, if we have any, asserting at the same time that we have not any at all. Now, England is entirely too wise to ask for an arbitration when there is conceded to her all that she wants. She will permit the sleeping dog to sleep.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator deny that a case can be made up between two nations as it can be between individuals? Does the Senator deny that an abstract right under a treaty can be arbitrated just like a concrete offense of any description?

Mr. BORAH. I can imagine——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, then——

Mr. BORAH. Just a moment. The Senator has asked a question, and I want the Senator to permit me to answer it.

I can imagine two great nations engaging in what the boys do sometimes when they are studying law—a moot trial, in which there is nothing to settle, but for the mere purpose of going through the performance of having a judgment; but a practical nation, a far-seeing nation, as Great Britain is, will not ask to arbitrate, and take the possible event of a judgment against her, when she already has all that she asks.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Now, Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me one moment longer——

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. When we pass a resolution through the Senate asking the President to open diplomatic relations with Great Britain for the purpose of effecting an arbitration of the rights at issue under this treaty, that moment we have served notice upon Great Britain that "if you do not submit the matter to arbitration, then we have given you your day in court, and we have the right at any time to act." Now, Great Britain is a practical nation and not a mere theorist like the Senator from Idaho; and Great Britain, being practical, knows that just as long as the question is not settled we are apt at any time to renew the legislation—and she does not want it renewed—and in this very amendment we reserve the right.

Mr. BORAH. While the Senator from Idaho may be a theorist, he does not change his theory every 60 days at the dictation of somebody else.

Now, Mr. President, I was proceeding to say——

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to ask a question.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Of course I can not consume the time of the Senate in answering a mere gibe and fling that it would be unworthy of the Senator from Mississippi to reply to, whether unworthy of the Senator from Idaho to make or not.

Mr. BORAH. It must be very unworthy if it is unworthy of the attention of the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have yielded to the Senator from Idaho, and I will yield to the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. BORAH. I regret the wisdom of this body has now departed, and I do not know that I ought to discuss this matter any further, notwithstanding the circumambient and omnipresent wisdom of those who seem to have the judgment of the country and who have lately departed from the Senate Chamber.

Now, Mr. President, we stand in this position: We asserted a right in the act of 1912. We passed a law which was offensive to Great Britain. Great Britain protested. We proceed immediately to repeal the law, right or wrong, and we yield everything that that great country asks us to yield.

Mr. CUMMINS. And more.

Mr. BORAH. And more than she, the English Government on the other side of the channel, asks us to yield. And now we are said to proceed close to arbitration. To arbitrate what? To arbitrate the declaration that we reserve the right which we solemnly declared before the world we did not have. Imagine anyone except a driveling idiot going into court to try a case when he has announced solemnly to the judge, "I have no right upon which this judge can pass; I make no claim." Yet that is the attitude in which we are being placed to-night, the great Republic of the West talking about arbitration, and we have announced to the world that we have nothing to arbitrate.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield to the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], if he still desires to ask me a question.

Mr. NORRIS. I desired at the time I interrupted the Senator to ask the Senator from Idaho a question, but I have a question that I want to ask the Senator from Iowa also. The Senator from Iowa, in a colloquy with my colleague, called attention to the arbitration in regard to the line between this country and Canada in elucidating his idea that it was necessary to make a positive claim. I wanted to ask the Senator from Iowa—and I am asking the Senator for information, because I am not familiar with the fact—whether or not in the act which provided for arbitration with Canada we specifically defined in the act where the line was or where we claimed it was?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I can not answer the question, because I am not sufficiently familiar with the act. I answered to the senior Senator from Nebraska as I did because I did know that we had arbitrated a claim made on the one side and denied upon the other without the forcible possession of the disputed territory. Of that I feel sure, and it seems to me to be a perfect answer to the suggestion of the Senator from Nebraska that we must positively exact these tolls or positively pass our vessels through without tolls before we had a subject of arbitration.

Mr. NORRIS. I agree with the Senator that on that suggestion it was an answer. Since the Senator from Iowa is arguing that this amendment is meaningless and we ought to declare positively in the act just exactly what we claim, it occurred to me that it might be interesting to know whether, in the act passed providing for arbitration with Canada, we followed the rule in that case the Senator wants us to follow here. I am not sure but that we did.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. I do know that the United States must have claimed something and Great Britain must have claimed something, the two claims being inconsistent, before there could be any arbitration. We claim nothing here when we pass the act. We simply claim to Great Britain and the world that we have the right to exempt these vessels from charges. That is the claim. If the people of the United States do not believe that we have such a right, then we ought not to make it. If a majority of the Senators do not believe that we have such a right, then we ought not to make it. If they do believe that we have the right, they ought to say so in order that our claims can be put side by side with the claims of Great Britain. Great Britain has made up her claim. She has not been hesitant about it. She was not bashful or reluctant about asserting her claim.

Now, no matter what we do—it does matter what we do, but without regard to what we do, why do we not stand up like men and say to the world that we have a right either to pass our ships through or that we have no such right? We have been discussing this matter now for three months, that has been the burden of the debate, and the mind that has not been able to come to a conclusion upon that question can never reach a conclusion upon it. Somebody must act before this dispute is settled.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. The United States in some way, through somebody, through some function of organized society, must assert that right if we are ever to have it settled.

I yield to the Senator from Kansas.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, there are present now in the Chamber not to exceed 6 of the 50 Senators who were so exceedingly anxious to remain here to-night. I make the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. JOHNSON in the chair). The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Burleigh	Clark, Wyo.	Dillingham
Borah	Burton	Colt	Fletcher
Brady	Chamberlain	Crawford	Gallinger
Bristow	Chilton	Culberson	Goff
Bryan	Clapp	Cummins	Gronna
Hitchcock	McCumber	Pittman	Sterling
Hollis	McLean	Ransdell	Stone
Hughes	Martin, Va.	Shafroth	Sutherland
James	Martine, N. J.	Sheppard	Swanson
Johnson	Myers	Sherman	Thomas
Jones	Nelson	Shields	Thompson
Kenyon	Newlands	Shively	Thornton
Kern	Norris	Simmons	Vardaman
La Follette	O'Gorman	Smith, Ariz.	Warren
Lane	Overman	Smith, Ga.	White
Lea, Tenn.	Owen	Smith, Md.	Williams
Lee, Md.	Page	Smith, S. C.	Works
Lewis	Perkins	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Seventy-two Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present. The Senator from Iowa will proceed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I am afraid my friend from Kansas has accomplished little more than to impose some unwelcome exercise upon an already wearied Senate. However, I appreciate his motive and am very much obliged to him for the effort to furnish me with a larger audience. The truth is, however, Mr. President, that the question I am discussing has already been decided. I understand that perfectly, and I think we all understand it. But I am speaking to a larger audience, an audience of which there is always a quorum, an audience that never adjourns. I hope to convince that audience that when the Senate refuses to declare its opinion upon our right to exempt our ships from charges as they pass through the canal it has abdicated, deserted, and abandoned without any cause whatsoever one of its highest and most sacred duties. That is the question that I make in my amendment, and that is the question that will be discussed from one border of this country to the other. I state it again: Does the Senate believe that under the treaty we have a right to pass our ships free through the canal? If a majority of the Senators believe that we have such a right, we will be—I will not use the word that was on my tongue—we will disregard our bounden duty and we will forsake our clear responsibility if we do not say so, for that is the very question that has been argued here for three months, and the people of this country will want to know why we discussed for three months the construction of the treaty and then refused to say to them what the opinion of the Senate is.

If, on the other hand, there is a majority of the Senators who believe that we have no right under the treaty to exempt our ships, the same degree of courage requires them to say so and to cease masquerading before the world in mystery and in that twilight zone in which their figures can be discerned but in which their opinions are completely obscured.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. If anyone believes that we have no right to pass our ships through free, should he not only, as the Senator says, have the courage to say so, but ought he not in honest dealing with the parties interested in the treaty also say so?

Mr. CUMMINS. Unquestionably, Mr. President, there never was a more imperious demand upon a great legislative body for an answer to that question than now confronts us. It will be a miserable, inadequate outcome of this famous debate if we pass upon the subject without declaring our opinion respecting the very controversy that has raged here for three months or more. I never dreamed that there would be any hesitation in making a declaration. I honor a man who differs from me. I am very often wrong, and my opponents are often right, but there never was a time when I was not willing to say what my position is with regard to a controversy of this sort. If there is a majority of the Senate and a majority of Congress who believe that we have agreed with the world that our ships must bear the same charges as do the ships of other nations, for the peace and tranquillity of the public mind, for the honor of our country, why are you not willing to so declare? If, on the other hand, you believe that we have the right, but for reasons connected with a domestic policy or, if you please, for reasons connected with a foreign policy, you do not see fit to exercise it at this time, have the courage to say that.

I agree with the Senator from Mississippi that—I think he said it in colloquy with the Senator from Idaho—if we declare in the form of the amendment as it will be if my suggestion is adopted, that we have the right to do this thing, there is a controversy ripe for arbitration, and, upon proper representations, there will be no difficulty in entering into an agreement for the submission of that controversy to a tribunal, if an impartial tribunal can be secured. It is not necessary that we shall allow a single one of our ships to pass through free or that we shall charge a single one of our ships as she goes through the Panama Canal in order to create an arbitrable controversy. Nations are so careful, and properly so careful, of provoking actual collision that it has been their custom from time immemorial to arbitrate claims that are made upon the one side or the other before they ripen into either actual legislation or into actual collision; but when you pass this bill as it is, without declaring any such right, without asserting any such right, tell me where you will find the basis for arbitration?

Let me be fully understood. I do not claim that next year or the year after or 25 or 50 years hence a Congress could not assert the claim and create a basis for arbitration; but there will be no settlement of this dispute until Congress does act in that fashion. Suppose that a joint resolution or a bill for arbitration were now before Congress, or suppose the President of the United States was opening negotiations with Great Britain looking to a peaceful settlement of the controversy, what would he say to Great Britain? He could not say that he believed there was any dispute; he could not say that Congress believed there was any dispute; all that he could say would be that a few—I assume he would say "a few"—irreconcilable madmen throughout the country believed that we had the right to pass our vessels through, but that the country as an organization, the Government as such, had never asserted a claim of that sort.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, will the Senator from Iowa pardon an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think the Senator from Iowa will agree with me about this, that it requires no great wisdom to know that the same power which can repeal a statute can reenact it, that every man in America knows that, and that every practical statesman of Great Britain knows it, and that therefore Great Britain has as much interest as we have in having the matter determined and put out of question, because it may at any moment, upon a change of administration or otherwise, arise again.

Furthermore, I think the Senator will agree with me about this, that every one of our arbitration treaties says that questions involving the interpretation of treaties shall be arbitrated. That does not mean when the two parties are upon the verge of war about it and are quarreling that arbitration shall be resorted to; but, on the contrary, it means that in advance, if both sides are wise, before they have reached a critical stage at all, it shall be resorted to. The very language of the treaties themselves furnishes a ground for arbitration, and a right on the part of either party to ask it and the duty upon the part of the other party to grant it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not disagree with the statement just made by the Senator from Mississippi. I have no doubt that Congress next year could assert the right or at any future time could insist that we had under the treaty the lawful power to pass our ships through the canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. And the Senator from Iowa has also no doubt that the wise men in charge of the affairs of Great Britain are also aware of the simple fact that the same power that repeals a statute can reenact it, and may do it any day.

Mr. CUMMINS. But whenever we pass this proposed act without a declaration of that sort, we fasten upon ourselves the interpretation insisted upon by the President of the United States, and the likelihood of any Congress ever provoking a controversy with Great Britain over it, a controversy that would be, I think, vastly more offensive to Great Britain under those circumstances than the assertion of the right would be at the present time—these are the considerations which seem to me ought to require a declaration now. There will never be a Senate that will be better advised with regard to our rights under the treaty than is this. It is not at all probable that any debate over its construction will ever consume the time which we have consumed or will ever employ higher qualities of mind than has this debate.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I should like to ask the Senator just one more question, and then I promise not to interrupt him any more.

Mr. CUMMINS. I yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Suppose we were simply to pass a bill repealing the statute and did not say another word. We would neither be asserting nor denying the right, would we?

Mr. CUMMINS. We would be, however, in the eyes of the world and in the eyes of Great Britain morally estopped from ever insisting upon a different construction of the treaty.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator from Iowa will pardon me one more moment, that is where I think he differs with our ancestors. They passed some tax law, you remember, over in Great Britain, some stamp laws, and some other laws. They repealed them, and then afterwards they asserted the right to reenact them. There is where the Senator differs with two great parties in recent history.

Mr. CUMMINS. Precisely. And what followed? War. Does the Senator from Mississippi want war to follow our insistence upon that right at some future time?

Mr. WILLIAMS. No; that was in a case where there could not very well have been an arbitration, because we were a part of the same Government; we were British subjects, living on two different continents; and in that respect it is not analogous with this case between separate existing sovereignties; but I can give the Senator another case.

The Senator seems to think that where a concrete case or incident that may constitute the offense is once out of the way, there is nothing left for settlement. Remember that all that arbitration can do is to settle a thing which otherwise might be settled by war. At one time a prince of the house of Hohenzollern was invited to take the throne of Spain. A protest went up from the Emperor of the French against that, and the Emperor of Germany persuaded his young kinsman to refuse to take the throne of Spain. Then there followed a demand on the part of the Emperor of the French that a pledge should be given that no prince of the house of Prussia should thereafter ever occupy the throne of Spain. That was not in a day when Bismarck wanted to arbitrate. He was ready to conquer, and was going on to do it, but he had as much right to arbitrate and there was as much right to demand arbitration as there was to make war, yet war was made upon that simple proposition, although the particular concrete incident of offense was out of the way. The casus belli was an abstract right. That merely emphasizes the idea that abstract rights growing out of differences or alleged rights contended for upon each side, when they have not reached an acute stage, where they either demand or necessitate immediate arbitration or war, one or the other, are much more arbitrable even than when they have reached that stage. This case has already been made out; it is already down in the State Department; it has its declaration, its plea, its rejoinder, its surrejoinder, its rebuttal, and its surrebuttal, but it was concluded to let it alone awhile and see what Congress would do. I suppose it will be taken up at once after Congress acts. I think I can assure the Senator that; if not, it will be taken up upon the demand or request of the Senate.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, with much of the reasoning of the Senator from Mississippi I entirely agree. I do not think it requires the commission of an injury in order to create a cause of action between nations that should be arbitrated; but I reply in just a word—and then I will yield to the Senator from Utah—that we took action; the President of the United States declared that action in violation of our treaty, and he asked us to repeal or to reconsider the action we took, because it was in violation of the treaty; and whenever we recede under the circumstances that surround us we have said to the world that, in the opinion of a majority of Congress, as it is known to be in the opinion of the President, we did something we had no right to do. Any Senator who believes that we had no right to exempt our coastwise ships ought to vote against my amendment; his conscience requires it. But there are Senators who believe that we have the right to do it and who desire to reconsider our action because it is not in accord with the highest and best domestic policy. Now, those Senators ought to vote in favor of my amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS. How about the third class of men, who think that you have the right, but that you had not the right to do it at that time and thereby assume to settle the issue in your own favor?

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Mississippi has really answered himself. He said the other day, or possibly to-day, that we ought not to decide the case for ourselves.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I was asking the Senator's opinion on it; of course I know mine.

Mr. CUMMINS. That is true; and we can not decide it for ourselves—that is, we can not enter a final judgment if we are willing to arbitrate—but we can decide this matter in just the same way that Great Britain has decided it. She has decided for herself, and she has told the world what her decision is; and we, by asserting our right under the treaty to do what we did—to exempt coastwise vessels—decided for ourselves, and in that way the issue is created. I now yield to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I want to suggest to the Senator from Mississippi before he leaves the Chamber that I have not any doubt of our right to submit this question to arbitration, no matter what action the Senate may take, because the treaty of arbitration provides that we shall arbitrate, and we agreed to arbitrate differences as to the interpretation of treaties, and this is really a question as to the interpretation of a treaty; but the question I wanted to submit to the Senator from Mississippi was this: Does he think the American case would be strengthened before an arbitration board if we should go before that commission with a declaration from the President of the United States that we have no case at all, with the refusal of Congress to declare that we have a case, and with the adoption by Congress of an amendment to this bill which says that we have grave doubt about our right? Did the Senator from Mississippi ever hear of any nation asking for an arbitration under those circumstances?

Mr. WILLIAMS. In answer to that—and I am sorry to be taking up the time—candor compels me, of course, to say that the Chief Magistrate of the country having taken the position that the exemption clause is a violation of the treaty, our case would be weakened before a court or international tribunal by that fact, provided that evidence of that fact was relevant to the controversy in the slightest degree.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Does the Senator from Mississippi not think——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Let me finish and then I will yield—or that the action of the Senate is relevant to the controversy in the slightest degree. If the Senate, which ratified, and the President, who negotiated, this treaty had taken that position, then, in my opinion, in case of a patent ambiguity in the treaty itself, their utterances and their recollections of the intention in the hearts of both parties and the real thing concerning which their minds came to a meeting place could be brought before the arbitral tribunal to shed light upon the meaning intended to be given to the treaty, but certainly the opinion of a subsequent President or a subsequent Senate could not be introduced for that purpose.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Now will the Senator allow me?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Otherwise, of course, it would weaken the case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Suppose the Senator from Mississippi had a lawsuit pending before a court. Of course the opinion of the Senator's lawyer that he did not have a good case, or his opinion that he had a doubtful case, would not be admissible, but would the Senator think it would tend to bring about a decision in his favor if his lawyer said he did not have any case or expressed doubt about it and that opinion got to the judge and the jury?

Mr. WILLIAMS. That is again a different proposition. If in that case my lawyer proved untrue to me and let the jury and the judge know, or if my lawyer selected a judge who agreed with him and did not agree with me, his client, of course that would weaken the case very much indeed, probably lose it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. What I think the American people will do will be to change lawyers in this matter.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Well, then, if I did not have sense enough to get a lawyer who did agree with me about the case, I would be weakening my own case.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I think they will do that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But neither of those cases can be presumed here. It can not be presumed that the President of the United States is going to select men who are committed beforehand to the other side of the controversy. My own idea is that he will probably select two of the judges of the Supreme Court, regardless of their opinion. I say that, not because I have any reason to say it, but because that is what I would do if I were he; and I would suggest that the British side will probably select their greatest lawyers and let them sit upon the matter as great lawyers should on a question of legal interpretation.

The Senator and I know enough to know that lawyers have legal minds and take professional pride in the fact. When you ask a lawyer to give his opinion on a law point, regardless of his predilections, prejudices, or interests, he is going to give an opinion upon the law point, if he is a good lawyer, and he is going to prepare himself very thoroughly upon it before he comes to a final conclusion.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, the last suggestion is hardly relevant to the point I am trying to make. There can be no lawsuit without a claim. The United States is the client, and unless the United States declares that she has the right to do this thing there can be no arbitration. If I believed as does the Senator from New York, or the Senator from Georgia, or the Senator from North Carolina, or the Senator from Oklahoma, I would not vote for any arbitration of this controversy, for there is no controversy, so far as those Senators are concerned, and if a majority of the people of the United States felt as they do—and I use them simply as types or representatives—if a majority of the people felt as they do about this question, we never would have arbitration with Great Britain over it, and we ought not to have arbitration with Great Britain or any other country over it.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President——

Mr. CUMMINS. It is dishonorable for any country to insist upon arbitrating a claim in which the country presenting it does not sincerely believe; and the only way in which the people of this country can speak is through Congress and the President together. Therefore, if a majority of the Members of Congress honestly believe that we have no right such as I have been insisting upon under this treaty, they will foreswear themselves if they suggest arbitration and insist that Great Britain shall secure, at the end of a long dispute or controversy, what they in their hearts concede Great Britain in the beginning. It is only in the event that a majority of the people of this country—because this is a question of doubt; everybody must concede that—honestly and sincerely believe that we have that right under the treaty, and express that opinion through their chosen representatives, that we have either the legal or the moral right to call Great Britain into arbitration with us.

Does the Senator from South Dakota desire to interrogate me? If so, I yield.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Mr. President, because I have the same opinion as that held by the Senator from Iowa, as to the right of the United States, under the treaty, to exempt its coastwise vessels, I am inclined to vote for this amendment; but I wish to suggest to the Senator that after all, if this law is repealed with the amendment attached to it that the Senate has already adopted, offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and 5 years from now or 10 years from now Congress should enact a law exempting vessels from the payment of tolls, and the matter should then be brought into controversy as a plain violation of the treaty, does not the Senator think the United States would be in much better position by having placed in the repealing act the language of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina than it would have been had it simply passed a flat repeal with no such language in the act?

Mr. CUMMINS. I am inclined to think that is so.

Mr. CRAWFORD. Does not the Senator also think that in view of the fact that there is such a sharp conflict of opinion among men whose opinions we are bound to respect, and who are manifestly sincere, we ought to take the attitude of so presenting the question that it will fairly express the issue, so far as a majority of men so differing can present it, and that it is legitimate to place it in the best form upon which the majority can agree and have a reservation in the bill, rather than to insist that it shall express the view of those of us who hold as the Senator does, and as I really hold, with reference to this treaty?

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not see very much to dissent from in the suggestion made by the Senator from South Dakota. Of course, I have no way of ascertaining the exact views of every Senator in this body. They are known to all of you as well as to myself. I believe, however, that a very considerable majority of the members of this body construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as I do; or, rather, I construe it as they do. I believe a very considerable majority of the members of this body believe, or think, or hold the opinion that the United States has the right to exempt, if it cares to do so, these vessels from the payment of tolls.

Mr. PITTMAN rose.

Mr. CUMMINS. I will yield to the Senator in just a moment. There is in the law—and the Senator from South Dakota is a lawyer of long experience—a doctrine known as laches. There is a doctrine known as a disfavor toward stale claims. I instance those two principles of law, although they are really one, in order to suggest that if we now fail to make this declaration, and years pass on, while we may be legally able to make the claim in future years, it will lose much of its force and persuasiveness as compared with the claim made at the present time and under the conditions which now surround us.

I now yield to the Senator from Nevada.

Mr. PITTMAN. I understand that the Senator from Iowa asserts by his amendment the right of the United States to exempt all of its vessels from tolls in passing through the Panama Canal.

Mr. CUMMINS. He does; all the vessels of the United States or its citizens.

Mr. PITTMAN. It is apparent from this debate that some of the Members of this body believe as the Senator does, that the United States has the right to exempt all of its vessels, while there are others who believe that the United States has the right to exempt only its coastwise vessels, while there are still others who believe that it has not the right to exempt any of its vessels. I want to know whether the Senator from Iowa thinks that a Senator who believes, for instance, as does the Senator from Nevada, that the United States has a right to pass only its coastwise vessels through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls without a violation of the treaty could conscientiously vote for his amendment?

Mr. CUMMINS. If I understand the Senator from Nevada, he asks whether a Senator who believes that under the treaty we may pass coastwise ships through free, but can not pass ships engaged in the foreign trade through free, can vote conscientiously for my amendment. I do not think he can; but the Senator who can not do it can not escape his responsibility by simply voting against my amendment, for there will be abundant opportunity for him to vote for an amendment that applies simply to coastwise ships, asserting a reservation with regard to ocean-going ships. My amendment appeals only to those Senators who think that we have the right to deal with our own shipping as we please, who believe that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty does not include the vessels of the United States or of its citizens, and that simply emphasizes what I have already said.

When this amendment is voted down, if it is voted down, it will be a declaration to Great Britain and a declaration to the world that the United States does not controvert the English claim that we must impose upon our vessels engaged in international trade the same charges that we impose upon foreign vessels engaged in international trade. I simply want Senators to have clearly in view what their vote means in this respect.

One word more, and I shall have concluded my suggestions.

I understand that the other day the Foreign Relations Committee reported a joint resolution looking to arbitration of this very controversy. The joint resolution is now pending before us. It is now on the calendar. As it seems to me, every Senator who votes against this amendment of mine must, if he is conscientious, vote against the joint resolution so reported by the Committee on Foreign Relations; for there is nothing to arbitrate—it is utterly impossible to erect an arbitration—if this bill is passed in its present form, without an assertion of some right that Great Britain denies. It would be as futile as a bull against the comet. It would be absurd as an endeavor to foretell the opinions of the people of the United States a century hence. If we now grant to Great Britain all that she wants, we must defer any suggestion of arbitration until the American people are restored to their common sense, and restored to their patriotic instincts, and are in a frame of mind to assert a right which is denied by Great Britain. Then, and then only, can we call into exercise the high tribunal whose jurisdiction will be invoked under the resolution proposed by the Committee on Foreign Relations.

One word more. We are here not only conceding everything that Great Britain has asked, but we are conceding vastly more than she has asked. It is precisely as though my friend upon my right here had a note against me for $100, and presented it and insisted upon payment, and out of my magnanimity, my generosity, my desire to be honorable among men, I insisted upon confessing judgment for a thousand dollars. I might convince that friend that I had a high sense of honor, but I would convict myself at the same time as a fit candidate for the madhouse; and it seems to me that is about the situation in which we are placed if we proceed to pour out into the lap of Great Britain a great privilege that she has not yet suggested belongs to her under the treaty.

Mr. President, I offer the following amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment.

The SECRETARY. Amend the substitute adopted by the Senate as follows:

In line 2 of the substitute strike out the word "any," before the word "right," and insert the word "the"; in line 3, strike out the words "may have" where they appear and in lieu insert the single word "has"; also strike out, in lines 7 and 8 the words "discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting" and insert the word "exempt," so that if amended it will read:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of the right the United States has under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise to exempt the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal—

And so forth.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, on the amendment just offered I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. CLAPP and others. Oh, no.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make that motion.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask the Senator from North Carolina not to make it.

Mr. CUMMINS. I have asked for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Iowa demands the yeas and nays on his amendment, and the Senator from North Carolina has moved to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. If we are going to have a vote, I will not make the motion, of course.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know how the Senator has any right to make the motion when I have asked for the yeas and nays.

Mr. GALLINGER. No time will be gained by moving to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. SIMMONS. I move to lay the amendment on the table.

Mr. NORRIS. I hope the Senator will not make the motion at this time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I rise to a point of order. I ask for the yeas and nays, and that is equivalent to a motion that the vote be taken by a roll call, and it is not in order to move to lay the amendment on the table until at least the Chair has decided whether the motion for the yeas and nays has been seconded.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that, pending the request of the Senator from Iowa, the Senator from North Carolina addressed the Chair, and the Chair recognized the Senator from North Carolina, not knowing for what purpose he arose. Is the request of the Senator from Iowa for the yeas and nays seconded?

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina now insist on his motion?

Mr. SIMMONS. If we can have some understanding that the debate will be closed in half an hour, or something like that, I will not press the motion.

Mr. BRISTOW. If the Senator will yield to me, I desire to say he will not hasten the passage of the bill by cutting off debate on amendments that many Senators think are important. The Senator will hardly move to lay his own amendment on the table, and that would therefore be open to debate. There has been no disposition here to unduly delay the disposition of the bill, but some of these amendments we believe are important, and we intend to consume sufficient time to present our views upon them, after they are laid on the table if not before.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the view of the Senator from Kansas very well. I am not at all deterred by the threat of the Senator from Kansas in the course that I have proposed to pursue, but the request of the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] and the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] does appeal very strongly to me. If I thought the debate could be foreclosed in half an hour or three-quarters of an hour, I would have no sort of objection.

Mr. CLAPP. Will the Senator pardon an interruption?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. CLAPP. Personally I am not so concerned, because the remarks that I intended to make will be applicable to the final motion for the adoption of the Senator's amendment, but I would make a suggestion to the Senator. This debate has proceeded with a degree of cordiality and lack of friction and with a want of undue hostility that, I think, is unequaled perhaps in the history of this body since I have been here. It does strike me that when near the end, as we are now, for those who are in control of the bill to take the position that they will move to table every amendment is rather drastic and is hardly warranted by the former course of the debate.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, with reference to what the Senator from Minnesota has said, I have only to say that we have been now several months discussing the bill, and it seems to me, and it seems to a great many other Senators here, that we have exhausted the various phases of the controversy. Yet if the Senator from Minnesota desires to speak, I feel that I do not wish to cut him off, and I would not wish to cut off the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS].

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to suggest to the Senator——

Mr. SIMMONS. But I do not want it to lead to an interminable discussion.

Mr. NORRIS. There have been an hour and a half or two hours taken on this amendment, and all on one side. I do not know that any further debate will change anyone's vote or whether the debate which has taken place has changed anyone's vote. I am just as anxious to finish the discussion as anyone, but it seems to me that when we are debating amendments we are properly legislating. We have wasted an entire day several times in speeches that were far afield, but the debate to-night is on the proposition immediately before the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator desires himself to make a speech——

Mr. NORRIS. I intend to make an argument against the amendment either now or afterwards.

Mr. SIMMONS. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that this amendment is, in effect, the same as the amendment we have already voted on.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that it is in effect about the same as the amendment of the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I tried to get recognition upon that amendment to discuss it, but there were so many seeking recognition that the Chair always recognized some one else. That amendment was finally laid on the table, after apparently those who desired to speak had been heard and I did not get an opportunity to be heard.

Mr. SIMMONS. I will temporarily withdraw the motion I made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws the motion.

Mr. SIMMONS. I withdraw it for the present.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from North Carolina withdraws his motion to lay on the table the amendment of the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I want to say, to begin with, that it seems to me it is a sad commentary on the Senate of the United States that it can never pass any important item of legislation unless it must be had after a test of physical endurance. In ancient times, before the people were civilized, there were questions of great importance decided by a test of strength. Later on, when courts were established, the judges were in the habit of locking up juries and denying them anything to eat or any rest until they had agreed on a verdict. Of course the strongest man will eventually succumb to physical treatment that humanity can not stand up against. Everyone here knows that the real debate on this question and all other great questions that have finally been settled by the physical-endurance test takes place when we come to the actual offering of amendments and their consideration.

I will go probably further than some—it may not be quite as far as others—and I am quite willing at any time to so amend the rules of this body that interminable debate can not take place. I should like to see it limited. But after some Senators have talked from three to four and five and six hours apiece, a great portion of the time talking about something entirely irrelevant from the consideration of the question, to insist on a test of physical endurance when we come to a time when we are debating the real questions at issue is not right, it is not fair either, and we should not now, when we are about to vote on the various amendments, resort to methods that are relics of barbarism.

There ought to be a reasonable, sensible, and manly way of limiting debate, so that such occurrences could not take place as always have occurred in the last several years at the end of a very great piece of legislation. You can not get the best there is in men by holding them in continuous session. You can not get the best legislation by compelling men to be subjected to a physical test, to see how long this one or that one can endure the fatigue that is brought on by such a test.

Now, Mr. President, to get to the question. The amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] under ordinary circumstances would not be objected to by me. I have no personal objection to it. I do not believe it improves the bill. It does not make it any worse. If it were not that I believed the adoption of the amendment would endanger the passage of the bill, I would not turn my hand over whether we adopted the amendment or whether we rejected it.

Bearing upon that subject, I want to take up the several parts of the amendment. There are three different divisions. I want the Senate to notice particularly that one part of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, independent from the others, strikes out in lines 7 and 8 the language "discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting" and inserts in lieu thereof the word "exempt." If that amendment were adopted, this proposition would then be in the identical terms in which it was originally when the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] first offered his substitute amendment. The Senator from Iowa has offered an amendment the effect of which would be to put back the amendment in the exact form in which it was introduced. Now, let us see.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. All that is quite true. The vice of the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina was not in the omission of the word "discriminate," but in the failure to assert that we had any right at all.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes; I understand that.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not believe in saying that we have a right to discriminate, because I think that the exemption of these vessels is not a discrimination.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly. I understand the Senator's position perfectly. As I said, I would just as lief have it in that form as in this form, but let us see why that form was changed. There were other Senators here who said: "If you do not put something in to show that we have the right to discriminate, we will not support either the amendment or the bill." Here is the argument. They said as it was originally introduced and as it would be if the Senator's amendment were adopted it would read this way: "To exempt the vessels of the United States or its citizens." The argument was made, "Of course you can exempt the vessels of the United States or its citizens if you exempt all the vessels of the world." "I will not stand for that," said several Senators; "we think it is a loophole by which it can be said that it does not mean anything, because, of course, you can exempt vessels of the United States; we must make a declaration that we have a right to exempt vessels of the United States and impose a toll upon the vessels of foreign nations; that we have a right to 'discriminate' in favor of American vessels." The very language that was put into the bill by the Senator from North Carolina was suggested by those Senators. So we come to this position now: Several Senators, in the first place, objected to the language which the Senator from Iowa wants to have inserted, because, they said, it was not a proper statement of the case and would leave a loophole by which it could be said, "Of course, you can exempt the vessels of the United States if you exempt the vessels of everybody else, and we insist on putting in this discrimination." I did not think it added anything to it, and I do not believe that an ordinary citizen in considering this language would give any different construction to it. Everybody knew what it meant, I think. I had no objection to its going in. I thought it would satisfy those who would otherwise be opposed to the bill. But as soon as it is put in, here comes the Senator from Iowa, and he insists that it shall go out. But I do not understand that the Senator from Iowa will vote for the bill even if it does go out.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not regard the latter amendment as the vital part of it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am taking up one thing at a time. I am going to get to the other part of the Senator's amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from Nebraska knows the amendment can be divided and we can adopt the first part and not the last.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, yes. The Senator does not get my point. I am illustrating that on one side some Senators say that if you do not put this in it will not express the proper American idea and another set of Senators say if you do put it in it is a surrender to Great Britain. The reasons were identically the same given by some who wanted to put it in that are now given by others who want to put it out. I am only speaking of it to illustrate that point. I do not think it is important either way. I would support the bill with this amendment attached just as quickly if the entire amendment of the Senator from Iowa were adopted as I would without it. I am going to tell it to the Senate frankly. I am going to tell it to you just as I see it and as I believe it to exist. If it is not good, if it is foolish, if we be characterized, as has been almost intimated by several Senators who have debated this question, as fit subjects for the insane asylum if we support this amendment, and you think that that is your right, I am not going to criticize anybody who votes for the amendment as being overzealous, unfair, or as trying to put anything in the bill that would defeat the bill, although I believe it would.

Now, let us see. There are some Senators here who believe that under the treaty with Great Britain we have a perfect right to exempt the vessels of the United States and its citizens from paying tolls at Panama. Everybody concedes that. There are other Senators who believe that we have no right under the treaty to exempt the vessels of the United States and its citizens. Who denies that? There is the contention as far as the international question is concerned.

Now, here are Senators again who are opposed to the exempting of these vessels from tolls as going through the canal for economical reasons, believing that it is a bad economical policy. That is another class of Senators. Some of those Senators believe that we have a right to exempt our vessels if we want to, and some of them believe we have no right to exempt our vessels under the treaty.

There is another class who believe that we have a right to exempt one class of American vessels and not another class. There are two classes, both included in the law and in the treaty. One is American coastwise vessels; the other class is American vessels engaged in foreign trade. We repeal the act as to both of them. One of them by existing law is made absolutely free, and the other it is within the discretion of the President to make practically free if he wants to do so. Some Senators think that under the treaty we have a right to exempt the coastwise vessels but that we have no right to exempt all over-sea vessels of the United States and its citizens. Nobody disputes that.

Now, there are three or four propositions that I have just laid down that are admitted by everybody. Nobody denies that those Senators and people outside of the Senate, at least a large number of them—and, as far as I am concerned, I am willing to admit that all of them—are honest in those convictions; but for the sake of argument, at least, we ought to be fair enough to concede that they are all honest, and I am conceding it.

I am one of the Senators who believe that we have a right to pass anything we want to through the Panama Canal, either the coastwise American vessels or American vessels engaged in the foreign trade; but I do not believe it is a good economical policy. I am not going into that now. I went into it at length and gave reasons for my faith, being convinced in my own mind that the policy of passing our ships through there free is wrong, that it ought not to be done; that we ought to charge tolls on all vessels, and therefore I, of course, would be in favor of repealing the law.

A great many Senators here believe that it is a wrong economic policy. I believe that a large majority of the Senate believe that. You want to repeal the law, therefore. Now, to get the law repealed we have to have a majority of the votes of the Senate.

On the other hand, let us pause right there and take up the other question. I do not want to take any action here that will take away from the United States Government any right on earth that she possesses under the treaty. I believe she is supreme in that respect. Other Senators, and many in this country and abroad, some of the ablest minds of the present age, do not agree with me in that proposition. I do not believe I am bound, as some of these Senators said, that if you believe we have a right to pass our ships through free of tolls then you must say so, and if you believe you have not the right to pass them through then you must say that, and there is not anything to arbitrate and no dispute. If that theory is right, then, of course, I am wrong.

Now, here we come to the amendment. To my belief and my conscientious convictions it would not frighten me. No matter how severe we made this amendment I should like to couch it in respectful language. I do not want to be disrespectful to anybody here or anybody abroad, but as far as declaring our right is concerned I am willing to go to any length in a respectful way to do it. But we are confronted with this proposition: There are quite a number of Senators in this body, some on this side of the Chamber and some on the other side, who believe that we have no right under the treaty to exempt American vessels from tolls for passing through the Panama Canal. What are you going to do with that class of Senators? Shall we say they are foolish? Shall we charge them with lack of courage, as has been intimated? Is not the fair and honest and honorable way to admit, as every man in his heart knows, that those Senators are honest in their belief, and that they have as good a right to their opinion as I have to mine? Many of the Senators who believe this would be opposed to this bill if it should be amended as suggested by the Senator from Iowa. We must have the votes of at least a portion of that class of Senators to pass this bill. That is what moved me to agree to this kind of an amendment, although I would not have agreed to it if I believed it sacrificed any right that we possessed. Unless we get those votes this bill will fail. I have talked with enough Senators on both sides of the Chamber who, if they vote as they said they would vote, would defeat this bill on its final passage if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] were adopted. So I think we are confronted with a proposition right now as to whether or not we are going to have any legislation at all. Mark my word, if the amendment of the Senator from Iowa is adopted the death knell of this bill is recorded.

Believing, as I do, that the law ought to be repealed, that it is a subsidy, that it is a wrong and mistaken economic policy to exempt our coastwise vessels at Panama from the payment of tolls, I do not see why I am not consistent in voting against this amendment, which will jeopardize the passage of the bill, if at the time I do so I am convinced that the amendment for which I am standing meets all questions that can be fairly and honestly met, or that should be met. Let us see whether it does. The Simmons amendment now provides:

> That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have—

And so forth.

I have not yet heard a Senator indicate a single, solitary right that would be jeopardized if we adopted that language. I should like to have any Senator tell me now of a single instance, with that language in force, where we would sacrifice or lose any rights that we possess under the treaty. Is not that enough? Is not that all we want?

I wish right here to say that I am not finding fault with Senators who are opposed to this bill for supporting this amendment; I think their action is perfectly consistent. I do not want anyone to get the idea that I think Senators are supporting this amendment simply because they think it will defeat the bill. I do not know of any such Senators. I concede, however, they would have a right to do that, and I would not find fault with them, if they were opposed to the bill, if they did so.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from California?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. Senators like the Senator from California, for instance, conscientiously can support this amendment, because I know, according to his idea, it puts the bill in better shape than it would be if it were not adopted; and he feels that if we must repeal the law, although he is opposed to that, and will vote against the proposition, as I understand, anyway, yet we ought to make it as good as we can. I am conceding that all other Senators are in that same class; but that does not do away with the fact, Mr. President, that if we drive from the support of this bill those Senators who are willing to vote for it in its present shape, but who would be opposed to it in the form that the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would leave it, there is grave danger, if not a certainty, that the bill will be defeated.

Now I yield to the Senator from California.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I do not want to allow the statement of the Senator from Nebraska that the Simmons amendment protects all of our rights to go unchallenged.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to have the Senator point out one right now which it does not protect.

Mr. WORKS. I do not think it does protect them; but I am not going now in the time of the Senator from Nebraska to discuss that question. Directly, when I have an opportunity, I am going to offer an amendment with the object of strengthening the amendment already adopted by the Senate, which was offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS]. When I do that I shall undertake to explain to the Senate the particulars in which I think the Simmons amendment is inadequate and insufficient to protect entirely the rights of this Government, if it has any rights. I shall not offer an amendment that the Senator from Nebraska can object to on the ground that it will prevent any Senator who believes as he does from finally voting for the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from California that if he offers an amendment which I believe is in accordance with what he has suggested it will get my vote. I should like to vote for everything that is proper, that will more fairly place the Government of the United States in what I believe to be the proper position.

But now, Mr. President, take Senators who believe that we have no right under the treaty to exempt our vessels from the payment of tolls, and let us see if they are consistent—I believe they are—in their statement when they say, "We shall vote against the bill if an amendment similar to the one offered by the Senator from Iowa is adopted." Let us see why they are willing, as they say, while they are firm in their belief that we have no right—they are just as firm as some of us are that we have such a right—they concede that the controversy over the treaty is an honest dispute, and in order to protect it they concede to those who believe we have that right the right to protect by proper amendment to this bill any right which the Government of the United States may have; but they say, "When you ask us to vote positively for statements such as the amendment would be in the form in which the Senator from Iowa would put it by his amendment, it is putting us in a position where we can not vote conscientiously for that kind of a statement, as we believe it would be a falsehood." And from the standpoint of those Senators it would be; and we can not blame those Senators for feeling in that way.

I would not be in favor of compromising on the proposition, even though I believed that a lack of it meant defeat of the bill, if I did not believe that fairly and honestly the amendment now protects every right which we have or that we can possibly acquire that the ingenuity of man can think of or invent. I do not see how it can be broader. It says "any right the United States may have."

The Senator from Iowa said, "Why, suppose we were going to arbitration, they would get this law and say, 'You have not made any positive assertion.'" I hope the Senator from Iowa does not think that in making up pleadings before an international tribunal the Senate or the House of Representatives would make them up. Great heavens, Mr. President, if the Senate of the United States had to agree on pleadings before a court or other tribunal, we would all die of old age before we could possibly reach an agreement; it would be a physical impossibility to do so. If we have any arbitration, proper men representing the United States, after the necessary correspondence and diplomatic arrangements have taken place and been made by the State Department, will be employed for that purpose. They will represent us. There is no reason, in my humble judgment, for any man to say that the Simmons amendment sacrifices our rights, and that we are giving up anything. On the other hand, we are claiming everything by it.

Mr. CUMMINS and Mr. BORAH addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from Nebraska yield?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. CUMMINS. Does the Senator from Nebraska think we ought to go into an arbitration with Great Britain over this treaty, hire lawyers to represent us, and simply say to those lawyers to make such claims under the treaty as they thought ought to be made, or does he think——

Mr. NORRIS. Well, let me answer one question at a time.

Mr. CUMMINS. Or does he think that the responsible Government of the United States, represented in Congress, must assert the right which it is desired that those lawyers shall maintain before the tribunal?

Mr. NORRIS. I will answer the two questions the Senator has asked me, Mr. President. If we are to arbitrate this question with Great Britain it will not be until a treaty of arbitration has been agreed upon between this Government and Great Britain, and when that is agreed upon it will be after the Senate of the United States, as part of the treaty-making power, has passed upon it and we will, if necessary, make the proper stipulations or claims. We will not be bodily present as a Senate before the international tribunal, if one is appointed to decide the question, but we will be represented there by attorneys, and I presume they will take the necessary steps, if pleadings are necessary in the agreement that is made, to protect every right which we in this act are asserting that we have. We want every right and any right that we may have, whether we know what it is or whether we do not; we are claiming everything. It could not be broader, and it seems to me, Mr. President, when you take into consideration——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I want to ask the Senator what question there will be to arbitrate when this bill shall have been passed?

Mr. NORRIS. That is a question that we ought to have settled by having two of the opponents of this bill, namely, the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH], have a joint debate upon it. The Senator from Iowa argues that we can in this way go on and have an arbitration, even though we repeal the law; he concedes that; while the Senator from Idaho, another great lawyer, does not concede that, as I understand, but he says before we have an arbitration we must in some way do some act that somebody else claims is a violation of the treaty.

Mr. VARDAMAN. There must be some question of difference between the two nations.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Now, if you remove it, what is there to arbitrate? What is there to settle?

Mr. NORRIS. I am not going to determine the question as between the Senator from Iowa and the Senator from Idaho and the Senator from Mississippi, all of whom are opposed to this bill and none of whom agree on that proposition. I do not know why they should question me about that. I am willing to tell you what I think. I believe——

Mr. VARDAMAN. The point I make is this——

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator will permit me, I believe that we can have this question arbitrated whether we repeal the exemption clause or not. I do not have any doubt about that, and I want to say to the Senator from Mississippi that I have an amendment, which I propose to offer at the proper time to this bill, stating in substance that we regard the question in dispute between the two nations as a proper subject for international arbitration.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, if the bill before the Senate should become a law, all questions of difference between the two nations are settled.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. But our "right" to discriminate is still in dispute.

Mr. VARDAMAN. And there is nothing to arbitrate.

Mr. NORRIS. All right.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The United States has conceded to England all that she wants, and that settles it.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take that position; of course I do not agree with the Senator, but let us for argument's sake assume that that is right. That is the position of the Senator from Idaho. Suppose it is true that when we pass this bill there is not anything left to arbitrate. Then what becomes of the importance of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa? It falls to the ground with everything else; it is all tomfoolery like the other amendments. There is not anything to it. If you take that position, the whole thing falls, and I will concede that whether you adopt the amendment of the Senator from Iowa or any other amendment will not make a particle of difference.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa should be adopted, it would leave this question to be settled. That amendment contains an affirmative declaration of our right over the canal.

Mr. NORRIS. But we repeal the law, and——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Oh, that is another matter.

Mr. NORRIS. Therefore there is no wrong done and there can be no arbitration. That is the argument of the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The question of repealing the tolls-exemption clause has nothing whatever to do with the question of our sovereign right to control the canal. That is a mere bagatelle in this discussion; it is a triviality. The economic question involved is comparatively not worth considering.

Mr. NORRIS. Then we have wasted a good deal of time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the amendment of the Senator from Iowa shall be adopted, then the issue will be made between the two Governments as to whether the United States is supreme.

Mr. NORRIS. Now, Mr. President, I myself believe that the United States is sovereign down there; I do not doubt that at all.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the Senator feels that way——

Mr. NORRIS. I have never doubted it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, is it not incumbent upon the Senator, if he feels that way, to vote that way?

Mr. NORRIS. I will vote that way at every opportunity; but I will not vote for an amendment that does not add anything to what we already have, in my judgment. I will not vote for an amendment that does not do any good and that will drive somebody else away from the support of this bill.

Mr. VARDAMAN. As a matter of fact, nothing is secured under the Simmons amendment except what is secured without it.

Mr. NORRIS. Technically speaking, I presume that is true; and that is true of any other amendment. I suppose, speaking in a strictly technical sense, the simple repeal of the tolls-exemption clause without putting in any saving clause, without any amendment setting forth our claims, would not be a surrender of our claims; but as a moral proposition I believe the world would believe, unless we did something of that kind, that we had given up the right, for the reason that we believed we did not possess it, especially when you take it in connection with the message of the President of the United States, and that is the reason why I want to put in a saving clause.

Mr. VARDAMAN. But you are not putting in a saving clause.

Mr. NORRIS. I concede the Senator has a right to his opinion; but, in my opinion, we are putting in a saving clause.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I yield to the Senator.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I merely want to say that when you adopt the Simmons amendment you simply announce that you have the rights you have; that is all; you do not express any opinion as to what your rights are; but if you adopt the Cummins amendment, then you proclaim to the world the fact that you think you have some rights and what those rights are.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not have any objection, as I have said several times, to doing that; but there are Senators who do not agree with the Senator from Mississippi and with me on that proposition.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then, let them disagree.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly, and thus get no bill through and allow the present law to stand. As one who would like to repeal that law, which I believe to be wrong as a fundamental proposition for our Government, I am not willing to take that course, especially when I believe that in supporting——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will take it.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not willing to take that course, especially when I believe that in supporting the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina I am saving every right that my country possesses, and I do believe that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator is willing to sacrifice our sovereignty over the canal in order to get the bill passed.

Mr. NORRIS. Oh, the Senator can not put me in that predicament.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator from Nebraska will allow the Chair——

Mr. KERN. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is impossible for the Senator from Nebraska to yield to the Senator from Mississippi and also to keep on talking at the same time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the point of order the Senator from Indiana makes?

Mr. KERN. My point of order is that Senators in all parts of the Chamber do not desire to lose any part of this illuminating dialogue, but they can not understand it while both Senators are talking at the same time, in violation of the rules.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. NORRIS. I presume Senators will at least have the opportunity of taking their choice as between the two evils.

Mr. KERN. We can not take any choice; we can not hear either Senator.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Mississippi? Only one Senator can occupy the floor at a time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska yielded to the Senator from Mississippi, and then there ensued a continuation of the colloquy. I did not know that the rules of the Senate required that after finishing a sentence I should again get permission of the Chair or permission of the Senator to ask another question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The difficulty the Chair had was that, if the Senator from Nebraska yielded, he could not speak at the same time the Senator to whom he yielded was speaking.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Mississippi that the Chair is finding fault with me and not with the Senator from Mississippi; and I am not finding fault with the Senator from Mississippi or the Chair.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will not permit the blame to be put upon the Senator from Nebraska. [Laughter.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, it seems to me the unreasonableness of those who are on the other side of this proposition is illustrated by what the Senator from Mississippi has said and what the Senator from Iowa has said in their positive statements, without giving anybody else any latitude anywhere to stand on the earth with a different opinion. They say, as the Senator from Mississippi has just said, "But you are not retaining anything." Now, he may be right. I may be wrong. I am not claiming that he, at least, does not believe he is right, or that he may not be right; but I am just as satisfied that I am right when I believe that there is not a right possible under the treaty that our Government possesses that is not protected by this amendment. Believing that, I can do nothing, it seems to me, but oppose any change in the amendment that would endanger the bill itself, which I am very anxious to have passed.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. As I understand, then, the Senator from Nebraska contends that the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and adopted, is a positive assertion of a right upon the part of the United States to exempt vessels going through the canal from the charge of tolls?

Mr. NORRIS. The amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina admits, from its very nature, that there is a dispute between the two Governments.

Mr. BORAH. Does the Senator——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me follow that for just a moment, and then I will yield to the Senator. I wish to make this clear. In the amendment that I prepared, and which I withdrew when I compromised on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina, I felt as though that principle ought to be recognized; that while I did not believe her claim was right, I conceded that she was making it honestly, and that I ought to use language that would be respectful, and so I used the word "claimed." I said in my amendment that the United States claimed a right. I spoke of it as the right claimed by the United States to exempt its vessels.

Some Senators, several of them, criticized that language, and thought it was not quite diplomatic with Great Britain. It seemed to me, though, that it was fair. It conceded that there was a dispute and that it was honest. If we ever arbitrate, as a matter of course, we must concede that; otherwise, there can be no arbitration. On the other hand, it seems to me that the language the Senator wants is practically saying—I will say to the Senator that it does not affect me in that way, but it does a good many Senators who would vote against the bill if it had that language in it—that we will submit to no arbitration. As they have said to me, "Why, if such language is put in the bill we might just as well write another clause in it and say, 'We will not arbitrate this matter with anybody on earth. We make this assertion, and will permit no one to controvert it.'" Senators who believe that we have no right, under the treaty, to exempt our vessels, object to any statement in the law which makes, in unequivocal language, a positive assertion that their position is wrong. They are willing to admit that there is an honest dispute on the question, and that therefore they may be wrong. In that belief they are willing to compromise and agree to words that protect every right which our Government can by any possibility be entitled to. The language used is, "Any right the United States may have." To me that covers everything, and we have no reason to ask more. It seems to me that is fair. I do not believe the language suggested by the Senator from Iowa would be any better or give us a single additional right or a particle more of protection. The language suggested by the Senator from Iowa to take the place of the words I have just quoted is, "The right which the United States has." Either phrase would suit me, but when the adoption of one would defeat the bill I can have no choice but to support the other.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I think that is the difference between the two propositions. One, in my judgment, is just as good as the other; and if it were not for that fact driving men away from the bill, I would not turn my hand over, no matter which you used.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska believes that we have a right under the treaty to exempt our vessels from tolls? Is that correct?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. And the Senator from Nebraska, in voting for this amendment, believes that he is voting according to his conviction as to the interpretation of the treaty?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes. I think I am protecting all the rights we have. Does the Senator think that I am not?

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator tell me what one right we lose? Where is that right?

Mr. BORAH. Well——

Mr. NORRIS. Point it out to me.

Mr. BORAH. I want to settle this question for just a minute, and then I will answer that question. The Senator from Nebraska is voting, as he believes, for an amendment which asserts the right of the United States to pass its vessels through the canal free?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I am not being cross-examined on the witness stand. I think I have answered the Senator's question. He is repeating it. I have told him distinctly my understanding of the matter.

Mr. BORAH. Yes; but——

Mr. NORRIS. If that is not satisfactory, I can not make it satisfactory. I will repeat it, however.

I believe that the Simmons amendment concedes from its very nature that there is an honest dispute between the two Governments. Other people who are opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Iowa believe that his amendment does not make that concession, and that we ought not to put it in the law. Now, that is my position.

Mr. BORAH. Exactly; but what I want to know is whether or not any Senator voting for the Senator's amendment is willing to assert here upon the floor of the Senate that he votes for it believing that the amendment asserts the positive right of the United States to pass its vessels through the canal free.

Mr. NORRIS. I think you might put it in language that would assert it more positively. I believe, however, that it protects and saves every right we have. It says so in so many words. If the Senator does not believe that, he is welcome to his belief; but since the Senator from Idaho has interrupted me, I should like to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that he thinks we can not have an arbitration, for instance, unless there is first a statute passed that somebody says is a violation of the treaty. Is not that right?

Mr. BORAH. I do not know how the Senator got that idea.

Mr. NORRIS. I got that idea from the Senator's statement to me in the time of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS].

Mr. BORAH. Oh, no; I did not say that. What I said was that we were dealing with a very practical nation, to wit, Great Britain, as 100 years of experience with that country has demonstrated to a moral certainty; and I said that having repealed the law to which Great Britain made objection, as a practical nation they would not ask for arbitration.

Mr. NORRIS. There is the point, exactly.

Mr. BORAH. Wait a minute, until I get through. I said that there would be no occasion for her to ask for arbitration, everything that she asked for having been conceded.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BORAH. The time might arise when she would ask for it if we should change our position, but the law having been wiped out, the obstacle having been removed, and her rights having failed to be impeached any longer, there would be no occasion for Great Britain to ask for arbitration.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator said the same thing before.

Mr. BORAH. I might agree with the Senator from Mississippi that you could arbitrate an abstract proposition; but there will be no occasion for Great Britain to desire an arbitration under such circumstances.

Mr. NORRIS. I have a great deal of respect for that opinion. I am not sure but that it will turn out that way. The Senator from Idaho, however, ought to be as fair as I have been and admit that, if that is true, the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Iowa would not change it one iota, because we would have repealed the law just the same.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator from Nebraska will remember that I stated that I was not voting for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa because I believed it enabled us to get more expeditiously to arbitration. I do not want any arbitration at all. I think this is a matter of most vital concern, and I am opposed to arbitration. Arbitration is out of my mind entirely; but I am willing to vote, any time I get a chance, for a positive assertion and declaration that that canal belongs to the United States and that we have a right to use it as against the whole world for the advancement of our commerce, treating all users of the canal on an equal basis. [Manifestations of applause in the galleries.]

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not think the Senator from Nebraska quite grasps the issue or meets the point suggested by the Senator from Idaho. I do not understand that there is any difference between his view and mine. He says that if we repeal this law Great Britain will not be desirous of an arbitration; that there will be nothing to arbitrate. That is true; but if we pass this law with the amendment for which the Senator from Nebraska is now standing we can not ask arbitration, whereas if we pass it with the amendment which I have proposed, while Great Britain will not ask arbitration, the United States can ask arbitration. She can not ask it under what is known as the Simmons amendment.

Now, just one word more for an inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. Very well. I thought the other was an inquiry.

Mr. CUMMINS. No; the other was a statement.

Mr. NORRIS. I have an inquiry from the Senator from Idaho also.

Mr. CUMMINS. The other was a statement. The Senator from Nebraska ought not to desert his pupils.

My amendment was fashioned upon the thought of the original amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska. I was led by him very largely to believe in the justice of that amendment. His amendment as it was originally proposed and as it is printed contained a claim on the part of the United States to the right to pass these vessels free through the canal. It said "the right claimed by the United States." I was in favor of his amendment. I think he will remember that I so stated to him upon more than one occasion, and I was overwhelmed with surprise when I found his amendment, which contained a positive, unequivocal claim to this right, merged into the vague and meaningless amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina.

If the Senator from Nebraska will propose just what he originally proposed—which, as I understood, was a claim made by the United States—he will have accomplished just what I hope to accomplish by the amendment I have offered. I have come just as near the amendment originally suggested by the Senator from Nebraska as I could, having due regard for the general language contained in the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina.

I wanted to say that because I do not want to be put in the position of having brought forward here an idea that has no value in it, and that is entirely baseless. I had assumed that there was a good deal of difference between making a claim and attempting to reserve a right, if we have any right.

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Iowa repeat the question that he started to ask me? I have forgotten it.

Mr. CUMMINS. The question is, Why did the Senator from Nebraska relinquish or abandon the ground which he originally occupied in regard to this subject?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I do not believe I have abandoned any ground. I withdrew, as I stated at the time, my amendment that was before the Senate and that I had drawn, in which, as I said a while ago, I used the word "claimed," because I believed that by so doing there would be more of an assurance of placing in this bill the idea that I believed ought to be placed in it, and that I had tried to express in my amendment. I could not have done that with the amendment that I had offered. I thought this method would get more votes for a proposition which at the time I introduced my amendment was being laughed at by a great many Senators who are seriously opposing this amendment now and who said it was foolish to try to get it adopted. I took the course that to me seemed proper to engraft on this law the idea that all the rights of the United States in the future to exempt her vessels as she sees fit should be properly protected.

If in my ignorance I have done something which is foolish, that is a different proposition. If the Senator's argument is right, we have no way, he says, to arbitrate if we pass this amendment; but if we put in his amendment, then we can suggest to Great Britain that she should arbitrate.

That is a positive statement made by the Senator from Iowa. I do not know upon what he bases it. Personally, if it were not made so positively, I would have made the other assertion; but I do not want to get into the difficulty of being driven, as it was intimated a while ago those who favor the Simmons amendment should be driven, into the insane asylum. I contend that the words that are in the Simmons amendment, namely, to reserve "any right the United States Government may have" under that treaty, are sufficient to enable the United States to take the initiative with Great Britain to bring about an arbitration of our rights, whatever they may be; and it is a broader statement and includes more than if we say "the right." We may have several. There may be one right as to American foreign-going ships and another as to coastwise ships. There are Senators who believe that. If that is true, the words "the right" would not be the proper words to designate it. There may be a dozen rights. If there are a hundred, the compromise amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina protects everyone. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa concedes there can be but one.

Now, I want to get back to the Senator from Idaho. By the way, Mr. President, he did not answer my question to point out any particular right that we would lose by this amendment.

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator will give me an opportunity, I shall be glad to do so.

Mr. NORRIS. I will give it to the Senator right now.

Mr. BORAH. The right which we lose is by reason of the failure to assert that we have any right at all. It would be calculated to forfeit or impeach all rights. It is just like going into court, admitting, as a pleader, that we have no right, and at the same time asking the court to pass upon it. I do not say that there is one right protected under the amendment and another right lost, but it is the general principle that we have failed to assert any right whatever under it.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BORAH. If the Senator from Nebraska will bear with me for a moment, when I asked the author of this amendment to-day if he believed that we had any right at all, he said no.

Mr. NORRIS. Well, I am not responsible for those who do not believe with me in regard to our rights in Panama.

Mr. BORAH. No.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not be held accountable for that; but I think the Senator from Idaho in good faith ought to concede to the Senator from North Carolina that when he believes that way he is going quite a way toward a compromise to vote for an amendment that will protect any rights we may have; and he ought to concede that there is a pretty good reason, if the Senator from North Carolina could not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, because on his theory—not on mine, but on his theory—it would be a wrong statement of the facts as they exist.

Mr. BORAH. Does not the Senator see, right there, that the Senator from Iowa is entirely correct——

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. BORAH (continuing). When he says that his amendment means much more than the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, for the very reason that the Senator from North Carolina will not vote for the amendment of the Senator from Iowa? Why will he not do it? Why, because it is an assertion of a positive right. It puts him up against the position which he occupies in saying that there is no right; but the Senator knows that when he says we reserve "any right we may have," that is not in conflict with the position he has taken that we have no right.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, may I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I can not answer more than one at a time.

Mr. WILLIAMS. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. NORRIS. I do not like to prolong this debate, and when I yield for a question it invariably leads to considerable discussion. I am not referring to any Senator in particular; but every Senator who has interrupted me so far has made a 5-minute speech, and some of them 15-minute speeches.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I just want to ask if it is possible that the Senator from Idaho wants to assert any right which we may not have?

Mr. BORAH. The surpassing and scintillating wisdom of that remark has passed entirely over my head.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President——

Mr. NORRIS. I will not yield further to the colloquy between the Senators.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I think all wisdom seems to pass over the head of the Senator from Idaho.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska declines to yield.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have never known him to be so failing in wisdom as to-day.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Idaho has still failed to answer my question. I did not ask for a general answer. I asked him if he could tell me of a single right which we will lose. He has not pointed to one. There is not a man on earth who can, because we lose none. We expressly reserve and protect every one. He says that this Simmons amendment is a failure to assert our rights, but I say it is not a failure when we by our very language preserve and protect every right that we may under any conditions have. I do not see how it could be made stronger.

I want to call attention to the fact, in closing, Mr. President, that those who are the most anxious to make this change, a change that I would be willing to concede in a moment if I thought it would not endanger the bill, those who are fighting so earnestly to put this amendment on the bill, I believe, without exception, will be found when the final vote is taken voting against the passage of the bill.

Mr. BORAH. As far as the Senator from Idaho is concerned, that is true.

Mr. NORRIS. Exactly; and I say that is something those who believe in the passage of the bill ought to take notice of, and we ought not to try here to split hairs when the very life of the entire measure is at stake.

The Senator from Idaho says he would not arbitrate. Personally to me, I can not imagine how anyone could refuse to arbitrate this question. I have the greatest respect and confidence and friendship for the Senator from Idaho, and when he says he would not arbitrate this question I know that there are reasons that are sufficient to satisfy his conscience; but, Mr. President, to me, where a simple question about the construction of a treaty is at issue there can be given nowhere by anyone any reason why we should say to the world we will decide this question in which we are one of the parties without the interference of anybody else; we will refuse to submit this dispute to a disinterested tribunal. I do not believe——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. NORRIS. I yield.

Mr. POINDEXTER. Would the Senator submit to arbitration the question which arises, or is at least alleged to arise, under a treaty with Japan, as to the right of Japanese to immigrate to and to own land in this country?

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I decline to answer the question, when it has not anything more to do with this subject than "the flowers that bloom in the springtime."

Mr. POINDEXTER. The Senator stated a moment ago that he would arbitrate any question arising under a treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. I was speaking of this treaty, I will say to the Senator. I might under any treaty, but I am not going into a dispute about Japan. I do not think it has anything to do with the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I say I am willing to arbitrate this treaty, and right now I want to read——

Mr. POINDEXTER. If the Senator will yield just a moment. Where I differ from him in his statement is the assertion that any question arising, as he said, simply under a treaty, of course we ought to arbitrate, when as a matter of fact the most vital and significant questions concerning the Nation might arise under a treaty, and the fact that it arises under a treaty can not be the measure or the rule whether we should arbitrate or should not arbitrate it.

Mr. NORRIS. I think my friend from Washington ought to take into consideration what I said when he called my attention to the language I used. I said I am speaking of this treaty. I am not taking a position one way or the other on any other treaty. I would go a good ways in arbitrating almost any question.

I want to suggest language that I think ought to be added and that I am going to offer at the proper time as an amendment:

> The protest heretofore filed with the Government of the United States by the Government of Great Britain denying the right of the United States under the said treaty with Great Britain to exempt the vessels of its citizens from the payment of tolls when passing through the said canal is hereby recognized as presenting an international question suitable and proper for settlement by arbitration.

Mr. President, there is only this in dispute. Under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the British Government claims we have no right to exempt our vessels. Our Government claims that we have a right to exempt our vessels. That is all the dispute there is, and that is a proper subject, in my humble judgment, to arbitrate. Personally I can not see how any man can consistently vote against it.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. CUMMINS. Would the Senator from Nebraska consider an affirmative vote upon the amendment which he has just read as an assertion that we have the right to pass our ships through the Panama Canal free of tolls?

Mr. NORRIS. I have gone over that, and I do not want to waste any further time. My belief is that the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is a concession that there is a dispute existing between the two nations about tolls. The amendment of the Senator from Iowa is construed by those who are opposed to it—I am not opposed to it, but by those who are opposed to it—as denying that there is any dispute and denying that we should ever arbitrate the question that really is in dispute. That is the contention.

Mr. CUMMINS. But the Senator from Nebraska did not understand me, I am sure.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I did understand the Senator.

Mr. CUMMINS. I did not refer to the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina or to my amendment. I am asking the Senator from Nebraska if the Senate adopt either in the form of a resolution or as an amendment to this bill the arbitration suggestion which he has just read, would it thereby assert that the United States has a right to pass its ships free through the Panama Canal?

Mr. NORRIS. Yes; I think so. I desire also to apologize to the Senator. I did not understand his question.

Mr. CUMMINS. Therefore, the Senator from Nebraska is willing to assert that positively in an amendment which he proposes to offer, but he is not willing to assert it in the amendment that is now pending before the Senate.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to answer that, and I insist that the Senator shall permit me to make a reply while it is fresh in my memory, and then I will yield and the Senator can ask any further question. The Senator has stated it exactly right, as I understand the language. I would be willing to put it in this amendment and not in the amendment of the Senator from Iowa, because, as I have stated repeatedly, I believe it would make a condition that would lose votes for the bill on its final passage and probably defeat it, which I do not want to see done. That is my reason, and to me it is satisfactory.

Mr. CUMMINS. I understand that; but suppose the amendment that will be offered by the Senator from Nebraska, which he says is an equivalent assertion, is adopted by the Senate, what then would be the fate of the bill?

Mr. NORRIS. The fact is, Senators who believe that the Senator's amendment is obnoxious and who would vote against the bill if it should prevail, do not regard the arbitration amendment in the same light as the Senator has indicated it is and I believe it is. They do not regard it as an assertion which conflicts with their ideas of what should be in the bill. I know some Senators who tell me that they would vote against the bill if the Senator from Iowa succeeded in having his amendment adopted who are in favor of the arbitration amendment that I have drawn. They do not agree with the Senator from Iowa and myself that the arbitration amendment asserts such a positive claim of right that they can not support it. On the contrary, most, if not all, of them are most heartily in favor of submitting this controversy to arbitration. Personally I think it is an assertion of our right, and I think the Senator from Iowa believes so, from the very fact that he asked the question.

Mr. CUMMINS. I think so; but——

Mr. NORRIS. But other Senators do not think so. It can not endanger the bill, for the simple reason that if they would think that way they would vote it down and it would not be adopted; but, as I have said, I happen to know most of them are going to vote for it. So I have some hope of having it go in. Now I yield to the Senator. I hope the explanation will be satisfactory.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator has several times assigned me to a position on the final vote. I do not think that he has any good reason for doing so, for I say to him now that my vote upon the passage of the bill will depend upon the fate of an amendment that I intend to offer to the bill before it is finally disposed of. If that amendment is adopted, I will vote for the bill. If it is not adopted, I will not vote for the bill.

Mr. NORRIS. I accept the Senator's explanation.

Mr. CUMMINS. So the Senator from Nebraska could not have prophesied very correctly about my position.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not prophesied, although I know what the Senator's amendment is. He knows, the Senate knows, everybody knows, and God knows it will not be adopted. So he will be against the bill, and therefore I could reasonably prophesy with certainty that he would vote against the bill when the time comes.

Mr. CUMMINS. I do not know. Of course, I assume that God knows, but I hope that the Senator from Nebraska is wrong with regard to the knowledge of the Senate. I assume that Senators are waiting with open mind to hear the amendment and to hear the debate upon it, and that if it is found to be sound and wise it will be adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not arguing against the amendment that the Senator proposes to offer later on. Knowing what it is, I want to say to the Senator that, while I should oppose it now, it may be that after we have operated the canal a few years I should be as much in favor of his amendment as he is. I would not vote for it now, because I think it is premature. I believe we ought to operate the canal a while to see just how it is going to pay and whether we are charging too high tolls or too low tolls, or whether we can charge lower tolls to American vessels than foreign vessels, as the Senator proposes in this amendment. I am not opposing his amendment; it may be a very good idea to adopt it in the future; but it seems to me that now, when we do not know, when it is nothing but a guess as to what the income from the canal will be, it is premature to try to adopt it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS]. The yeas and nays have been ordered, and the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. LODGE (when Mr. ROOT's name was called). The senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] is unavoidably absent from the city. If present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], and on account of his absence withhold my vote.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. In view of the announcement just made by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] as to what the vote of the senior Senator from New York would be, I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair as announced on the previous roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and vote "nay."

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. KERN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], both of whom are paired.

The result was announced—yeas 37, nays 49, as follows:

YEAS—37.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. GRONNA presented petitions of sundry citizens of Kintyre and Rutland, in the State of North Dakota, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. CRAWFORD presented a petition of the congregation of the Trinity Lutheran Church, of Letcher, S. Dak., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented a memorial of Printing Pressmen's Local Union No. 13, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. SHIVELY, from the Committee on Pensions, to which were referred the following bills, reported them each with amendments, and submitted reports thereon:

H. R. 15071. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and of wars other than the Civil War, and to certain widows and dependent relatives of such soldiers and sailors (Rept. No. 587); and

H. R. 15504. An act granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Regular Army and Navy, and certain soldiers and sailors of wars other than the Civil War, and to widows of such soldiers and sailors (Rept. No. 588).

Mr. PAGE, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 11006) authorizing the disposal of a portion of the Fort Bidwell Indian School, California, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 589) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. LEWIS:

A bill (S. 5796) for the relief of James D. Vernay; to the Committee on Military Affairs.

By Mr. LODGE:

A bill (S. 5797) granting an increase of pension to Mary M. Calef (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. CLAPP:

A bill (S. 5798) authorizing the health officer of the District of Columbia to issue a permit for the removal of the remains of the late Lewis Bancroft from Glenwood Cemetery, District of Columbia, to Mantorville, Minn.; to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

By Mr. JOHNSON:

A bill (S. 5799) granting an increase of pension to John A. Patterson (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5800) granting an increase of pension to George W. Harding (with accompanying papers); to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. JONES:

A bill (S. 5801) granting a pension to J. H. Short; to the Committee on Pensions.

AMENDMENT TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. LANE submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

Mr. OWEN submitted an amendment relative to the claims of the Ponca Tribe of Indians residing in Oklahoma and Nebraska, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Indian Affairs and ordered to be printed.

Mr. JOHNSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $600 for one stamp deputy at Portland, Me., intended to be proposed by him to the legislative, etc., appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

OMNIBUS CLAIMS BILL.

Mr. BURLEIGH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the omnibus claims bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RECESS.

Mr. O'GORMAN. I move that the Senate take a recess until 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m., Wednesday, June 10) the Senate took a recess until to-morrow, Thursday, June 11, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 10, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rabbi Louis Stern, of the Eighth Street Temple, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

We earnestly and reverently invoke Thy blessing, O Heavenly Father, upon this representative body, its Members and officers; and we ask Thy special blessing upon the Chaplain of this House, absent to-day, who for years, day after day, has so faithfully performed the sacred office here. We thank Thee for his fervent words of prayer, for the sanctifying impressions they have created, and the ennobling influences they have wrought. We thank Thee for the lessons they have taught—lessons of lofty patriotism, of personal liberty, of civic righteousness, of true humanity. We thank Thee that out of the physical darkness enshrouding his vision there has shone forth continually the resplendent light of an undying faith, a cheerful, contented disposition, and a superb optimism. O God, bless Thy servant with health and long life, as a constant example and inspiration to the world around him, and more especially to the Members of this House in their daily lives and deliberations. We ask it for our common good and for the glory of Thy name. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

FRIDAY EVENING SESSION.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the adoption of the following resolution. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the resolution.

HOUSE RESOLUTION 538.

Resolved, That on Friday, June 12, the House stand in recess from 5 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m.; that a session be held from 8 o'clock p. m. until 11 o'clock p. m., for consideration in the House as in the Committee of the Whole of bills on the Private Calendar which are not objected to, commencing with No. 132 on said calendar.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this resolution?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, considering the slowness with which the House has been proceeding with the consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill, I can not agree that the House shall recess at 5 o'clock in the afternoon.

Mr. POU. I will make it 5.30 or 6 or whatever hour the gentleman suggests.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Make it 6 o'clock.

Mr POU. I ask unanimous consent that the House recess at 6 o'clock instead of 5 o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman modifies his resolution by asking unanimous consent to make the recess at 6 o'clock instead of 5 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. I will object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] objects to 5 o'clock, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects to 6 o'clock.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Make it 5.30.

Mr. MANN. In this kind of weather I do not think——

Mr. POU. I hope the gentleman from New York will not insist on his objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I must try to get the sundry civil bill through the House, and can not consent that we spend only five hours a day in its consideration. If the gentleman will couple with the request another request that we meet at 11 o'clock on Friday——

Mr. MANN. That would not do any good.

Mr. POU. I will agree to any order that we can get through the House.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me we shall have plenty of time to take up all the bills on all the calendars before we are likely to adjourn, according to present indications.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What is the request?

The SPEAKER. The request is that the House take a recess on Friday at half past 5 o'clock until 8 o'clock, and then have a session to last not later than 11 o'clock, and that at the evening session the House as in Committee of the Whole consider bills on the Private Calendar to which there is no objection.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] whether the bill No. 132, mentioned in the resolution, was the bill last taken up when we had a night session for consideration of private bills?

Mr. POU. We got to No. 132.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. GARNER. Reserving the right to object——

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the gentleman from Texas will not object.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from Texas is going to take care of himself, if the gentleman from Illinois will let him.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not desire to interfere with the freedom of action of the gentleman from Texas in the least, but I do want kindly and earnestly to request him not to object.

Mr. GARNER. It was not the intention of the gentleman from Texas to object; but the gentleman from Texas would like to ask the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. POU] why it is that we can not take up these bills on the Private Calendar as they stand now on that calendar? I happen to have a bill on the Private Calendar to which I do not think there will be any objection, but under his proposed order it could not be reached.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman that we commenced at the beginning of the Private Calendar and got down to No. 131 on the last occasion. To go back over the calendar and begin at the beginning would give the bills up to No. 132 a double opportunity, whereas from 132 to the end of the calendar the bills have had no opportunity whatever for consideration.

Mr. GARNER. After you have considered bills on the calendar from No. 132 to the end of it, will there be any chance to take up bills that were passed over at the last meeting and ask the House for unanimous consent for their present consideration?

Mr. POU. I can only express the hope that there will be such opportunity. So far as I am concerned, whenever the calendar is completed, it is my purpose to ask unanimous consent to begin at the beginning of the calendar, and I am hoping that we will have at least one or two other opportunities to consider bills on the calendar that are contested, but the gentleman knows——

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If this resolution is agreed to, and the House begins with Calendar No. 132 and runs through to the end of the calendar before 11 o'clock, will it not then commence at the beginning and run down as far as possible before 11 o'clock?

Mr. POU. I see nothing in the resolution to prevent that course being pursued. The resolution merely fixes the beginning point.

The SPEAKER. All that the resolution says about it is "commencing with No. 132 on said calendar." If the present occupant of the chair should happen to be in the chair, he would rule that they had a right to go back to the beginning after they had got through with the calendar. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit a request for unanimous consent relative to the conference on the naval appropriation bill. In some of the paragraphs of the bill there were amendments changing the amounts of specific items, but they failed to change the totals, leaving the text of the bill unchanged with reference to the total. I want the assent of the House that the conferees, wherever it is necessary, may change the totals in order to make it speak the truth.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent that the conferees shall have the privilege of correcting totals in the naval appropriation bill. Is there objection?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Tennessee about certain changes reported to have been made in the naval appropriation bill. I am receiving quite a large number of letters from persons in my district stating that a change has been made in the Senate by which an additional number of chaplains has been authorized.

Mr. PADGETT. There is a provision in the bill, the same as was in the House bill, that went out on a point of order in the House.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Is there any way by which the House can get at that now?

Mr. PADGETT. I do not know of any.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PENSION BILLS.

Mr. ADAIR. Mr. Speaker, I call up conference reports on the bills S. 4168, S. 4252, S. 4552, and ask that they be agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Are there any statements with the conference reports?

Mr. ADAIR. The conference reports have been printed, but there was no statement with them.

The SPEAKER. Have the conference reports been printed?

Mr. ADAIR. They have.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk informs the Chair that those reports have been agreed to.

REVISION OF THE LAWS—JUDICIARY TITLE.

The SPEAKER. This is Calendar Wednesday, and the House automatically resolves itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. RUSSELL] in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 218. A bill of exceptions allowed in any cause shall be deemed sufficiently authenticated if signed by the judge of the court in which the cause was tried, without any seal of the court or judge being affixed thereto. And in case the judge before whom the cause has been tried is, by reason of death, sickness, or other disability, unable to hear and pass upon the motion for a new trial and allow and sign said bill of exceptions, then the judge who succeeds such trial judge, or any other judge of the court in which the cause was tried, holding such court thereafter, if the evidence in such case is taken in stenographic notes, or if said judge is satisfied by any other means that he can pass upon such motion and allow a true bill of exceptions, shall pass upon said motion and allow and sign such bill of exceptions; and his ruling upon such motion and allowance and signing of such bill of exceptions shall be as valid as if such ruling and allowance and signing of such bill of exceptions had been made by the judge before whom such cause was tried: but in case said judge is satisfied that owing to the fact that he did not preside at the trial, or for any other cause, that he can not fairly pass upon said motion and allow and sign said bill of exceptions, then he may, in his discretion, grant a new trial to the party moving therefor.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. In reference to section 218, I have this memorandum submitted by one of the district Federal judges as to the signing of bills of exceptions, which I would like to call to the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana.

The condition of the law as to the time when bills of exceptions shall be signed and allowed is very unsatisfactory.

The general rule is that a bill of exceptions should be signed at the term. Some terms are six months long and some are one month long. The victorious party in a suit is generally content to rest on his laurels; a defeated attorney often deliberately waits until the incidents of the trial have passed from the mind of the trial judge and then submits a grossly unfair and indeed untrue bill of exceptions. There should be a time limit upon the presentation of bills of exceptions. The writ of error must be taken to the circuit court of appeals within six months, but I have had bills of exceptions submitted to me more than a year after trial.

The section ought to read:

A bill of exceptions allowed in any cause shall be deemed sufficiently authenticated if signed by the judge of the court in which the cause was tried within four months of the rendition of the verdict, if there was one, or the entry of a final order or judgment if there was no jury. It shall not be necessary to affix to such bill of exceptions the seal of the court or judge.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman says that the memorandum he has read is from a presiding judge.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. I am not surprised that he put the time at four months. No judge ought to have four months to sign a bill of exceptions. I agree with the gentleman that it is proper to fix a time limit. I think that often 10 days after the termination of the case is a sufficient time, and 30 days would be ample.

Mr. MANN. I should think myself that four months was a long time; but considering the fact that they sometimes take a year, I suppose the judge thought he was doing pretty well to cut it down to four months.

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will suggest an amendment making it 30 days, I would not object to that.

Mr. MANN. I should be perfectly willing to do that, but I have not the form of the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Strike out the words "four months" and insert in lieu thereof "thirty days."

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I think 30 days is too short a time, for this reason: Sometimes the court stenographer is kept busy through the entire session of the court and has no time to prepare a transcript of the evidence. Therefore, there must be some time permitted after the term. If there is not, there will be instances in which it will be impossible to get a stenographic report of the evidence. I would suggest 60 days—that within 60 days after the adjournment of the term it shall be done.

Mr. MANN. Suppose the gentleman passes this section over at this time and prepares an amendment to the section which would put some kind of a time limit upon it.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I will state to the gentleman that if that was done it would not change my opinion at all. I have had sufficient experience in the courts to know that 30 days is ample time. The suggestion of the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] would be practical if it was a fact that the stenographer was the one who prepared the bill of exceptions, but the lawyer in the case prepares the bill of exceptions and the judge signs it without any assistance from the stenographer whatever. It is not necessary at all.

Mr. CULLOP. But if the stenographer takes down the evidence, the evidence must be incorporated in a bill of exceptions, and no one but the stenographer can transcribe the evidence or make the longhand manuscript of his shorthand notes. Therefore in all such cases it would be impossible for any lawyer where there was a stenographer taking the evidence to make out a bill of exceptions which incorporated the evidence, and in many instances the very question that goes to the court of review is some question arising during the trial over the admission or rejection of evidence and the ruling thereon.

Mr. MANN. Why would it not be practicable to put in a limit of, say, 30 days, and then give the judge power to extend that time?

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I would like to make this suggestion to the gentleman: He is right on that proposition, except in many cases 30 days would not be sufficient time. Make this amendment so that it will be such time as the judge trying the case shall grant, not to exceed 90 days.

Mr. MANN. I would fix the time and give the judge authority to extend the time. There might be reasons why time ought to be extended.

Mr. CULLOP. But if the gentleman fixes it as I suggest, I think it will be satisfactory—such time as the court will grant, not to exceed 90 days.

Mr. MANN. We all agree there ought to be some kind of time limit. Lawyers ought not to be permitted to bring in a bill of exceptions without any occasion for it a year after the trial.

Mr. CULLOP. Certainly not.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman's amendment proposes to say that the bill of exceptions shall be filed within four months after the rendering of the decision complained of?

Mr. MANN. I did not offer an amendment. I read a suggestion which was made by one of the presiding judges in New York City to a Member of the House who is not now present, and that suggestion was that it be signed by the judge of the court in which the case was tried within four months after the rendition of the verdict, if there was a verdict, or the entry of final order or judgment, if there was no jury. Of course it would require the preparation of an amendment to go with the section that is in the bill.

Mr. BARTLETT. They now have six months?

Mr. MANN. I think there is no time limit. This judge says that he has had bills of exceptions presented to him more than a year after the trial.

Mr. BARTLETT. I take it that was because the court was in continuous session?

Mr. MANN. I think not, though that might be the case.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think myself there ought to be some time within which the bill of exceptions would have to be presented to the judge and certified, but I do not think the time should be so short as 30 days, unless it be 30 days after the adjournment of the term in which the decision complained of was rendered. For instance, take the court in my district. It is in session in my city, is never closed, from the 1st of November until some time in July or August, when the court adjourns for the year. I think we ought not leave it in the discretion of the judge to say whether he will give more time or not.

Mr. MANN. Something unusual might arise. A man might be ill or the stenographer who took the testimony might be sick or dead, and there might be some reason for granting further time.

Mr. BARTLETT. It seems to me four months or six months is plenty of time, even taking into account such a contingency.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois has expired.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes in my own time. I want to ask the gentleman from Illinois another question. There is no provision in this code as it stands now to meet this contingency. If the admission or rejection of testimony is made the cause for a new trial, and an appeal is taken upon that, I think there should be some provision made whereby the one complaining could appeal on the particular question; and while the gentleman is preparing an amendment on the subject he has presented I wish he would also be kind enough to prepare one upon that proposition, namely, where a single question has arisen over the admission or a rejection of testimony, that the person who appeals from the ruling shall not be required to take up the whole evidence in order to get a review but have certified the particular question for review and decision.

Mr. MANN. If my friend will permit me, I do not expect to prepare an amendment. On a matter of this sort I prefer to take the wisdom of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] and gentlemen working with him in the preparation of this bill as to the form of any amendment which is offered. I make my suggestion to him, and I hope my friend from Indiana will make his suggestion to him, so that whatever is done it will work in harmony with the rest of the bill.

Mr. CULLOP. I will make the suggestion, and that is this: That where a motion for a new trial assigns as an error a ruling upon some particular question of the admission or rejection of evidence the party who appeals ought not to be required to provide a transcript of all of the evidence in order to get that one question passed upon, and there ought to be some provision in this code whereby the statement of the court presenting the exact question complained of would be sufficient in order to have the appellate court review that question.

If it was not so fixed by law, the court might go off on a tangent or technicality in ruling on the question and say that perhaps there was some other evidence admitted which cured the error of which the appealing party complained. There ought to be some provision in this code whereby the court could certify the precise question to the court of appeals for decision and have an expression of the court of appeals upon the error complained of, as to whether it was or was not error. Many of the States have that kind of a provision in their statutes providing for appeal, and it works most successfully. It reduces both labor and cost in determining such controverted questions. Appeals should be made so as to conserve both labor and expense. Such a provision would be, in this respect, most advantageous. But if there is not something of that kind, then a party must take up the entire evidence in order to get the court to pass upon that question, or it will say, technically, that all the evidence is not before the court to be reviewed on the question, or, for aught the court knows, there may have been evidence that cured the error of which the party complained. That is why some provision ought to go in this code covering that question, so as to reduce the cost of appeals to the party who desires to have a question reviewed of that kind.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, while I do not think that 60 days is at all necessary for the purpose of allowing the judges to sign up a bill of exceptions, in view of the fact there is quite a variety of opinions among the able lawyers of this House, and in view of the fact that there is no time limit now, and that there should be a time limit, I have reluctantly given my consent, if the pro forma amendment be withdrawn, to offer an amendment for a 60-day limit.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 118, line 13, after the word "tried," insert "within 60 days from the rendition of the verdict or the signing of the decree by the court."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out "60 days" and inserting "four months."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by striking out the words "60 days" and inserting in lieu thereof "four months."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I have very little to say on this proposed amendment, but it seems to me that 60 days is too short a time to which to limit the filing of a bill of exceptions, especially in view of the fact there is no statute of limitation now on the statute books. A great many cases in the United States court, where exceptions are taken and filed during the trial, take quite a time to try them. I myself have seen cases tried in my own State in the United States court where it took 40 or 50 days to try a case, and you must remember that exceptions must be noted as you proceed in the trial. If the judge rules against you, as you believe, erroneously, and you desire to except to it, you have to note an exception then and there and make a record of it. The circuit court of appeals in the fifth circuit decided in a very important criminal case that you can not waive even with the consent of the prosecuting attorney, but that the record must show that the exceptions were made at the time and noted in the manner provided for by the rules of trial.

It was stated, and a contest arose about it, that the prosecuting attorney and the court had virtually agreed that the exceptions should not be presented at the time that they ought to have been and noted of record, but could be presented at the end of the trial, and because that was done by a divided court of the court of appeals it rendered a decision which committed men to the penitentiary upon a verdict of guilty. So we are passing a law here now in reference to cases that take a short time and cases that take a long time, and you say that the cases that will take three months to try or 40, 50, 60, or even 30 days to try, that you have to prepare and present your bill of exceptions within 60 days, when in all probability you will not be able to get the record of the trial from the stenographer in that time.

Mr. CULLOP. I would like to call the gentleman's attention to an instance that carries out the very argument he is presenting here. Take the dynamite trials in Indianapolis in 1912. They took over four months to try them. The stenographer could not have made out the evidence in 60 days; it was impossible.

Mr. MANN. As a matter of fact, was not that evidence written out every day and furnished the counsel in the case every night or morning?

Mr. CULLOP. Yes; but I do not know, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois about that matter, but that the stenographers would not certify to a bill of exceptions in all probability to a bill made out that way.

Mr. BARTLETT. The judge?

Mr. CULLOP. I mean the stenographer himself certifying to the correctness of the transcript of his notes, and such transcript as was made during that trial is made out for the lawyers on either side and not for the purpose of a bill of exceptions.

Mr. MANN. If they are not accurate, what are they good for? They are made for use in court at the time.

Mr. CULLOP. I do not say they were not accurate, but he will not furnish them for that use.

Mr. MANN. He will if he is paid for it.

Mr. BARTLETT. I think four months is short enough time, Mr. Chairman. It takes sometimes two or three months to get the exact case up to the supreme court or to the appellate court. The judge has to examine the court stenographers' notes, and he is controlled by them. The judge will not follow the notes of a stenographer engaged by either party. I apprehend lawyers who appear in United States courts have had that experience—that the judge will require the notes of the official stenographer before he will certify to the exceptions or to the correctness of the statement of what transpired in the trial; but even then it is very difficult sometimes to get some judges to certify what the stenographer reports, and I apprehend men in this House who have practised law have had that sort of experience, so that for a lawyer or lawyers or parties who are engaged in a long trial for three or four weeks or months in a case shall only have this limited time in which to file these exceptions, it seems to me, is to put the parties at a disadvantage, and they ought certainly to have the time suggested by the gentleman from Illinois, as suggested by the judge in New York, who doubtless has had much experience in the matter, and I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I think that to adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Georgia and just make it four months will extend the law's delay in many cases, and I do not think it is right to do it. It ought to be nearer 30 days, with right of extension on cause shown for as much as 120 days—that is, 90 days more. I believe with this the committee ought to follow the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], which he made a while ago from correspondence which he had, and then we will find it will make appellate procedure better.

As far as the small cases and the large cases are concerned, the practice is that the large cases, the cases involving large sums of money, are generally kept better up, and the stenographers' notes are kept better up, and the testimony transcribed more readily, than in these little cases where they do not know whether they are going to appeal or not until the very last minute. They do not know whether they are going to have the necessary funds, and it is more often these little cases that are delayed. And if you put it 120 days in all cases the finality of the judgment, or at least the effect of the judgment, is held up that long, and then after appeal for no telling how long. I know from practice in our own State courts, where we have 30 days to file a bill of exceptions, then the right of extension for the full 90 days, it takes a long time then to get a final verdict and decision. And I am sure if we extend the time of the Federal court in that way we will hurt rather than help.

Mr. PETERSON. Does the gentleman understand the granting of the time delays the entering of the final judgment?

Mr. BRYAN. It does not.

Mr. PETERSON. Does it delay the procedure in any way?

Mr. BRYAN. It does not delay the execution the minute the judgment is rendered. But if you desire to appeal, attorneys are courteous to each other, agreements are made, and all of those matters are involved—it causes delay. And after notice of appeal is given the time continues to run. I recognize the fact that execution can issue on a judgment unless a supersedeas bond is filed.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 223. In equity and admiralty causes only the process, pleadings, and decree, and such orders and memorandums as may be necessary to show the jurisdiction of the court and regularity of the proceedings shall be entered upon the final record.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask if that word "memorandums" is right. Ought not that to be "memoranda," the plural of memorandum? Is there any such word as "memorandums"?

Mr. WATKINS. I will see if there is.

Mr. BRYAN. I will pass it over. I merely suggested it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 229. Upon all bonds on which suits are brought for the recovery of duties, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent a year from the time when said bonds became due.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Would the gentleman have any objection to making that 5 per cent instead of 6 per cent?

Mr. WATKINS. I have not any objection even to the 4 per cent, to conform to the other provisions in this codification, but 5 per cent would be a reasonable amount.

Mr. MANN. Six per cent was fixed——

Mr. WATKINS. It was fixed when interest was high. I have no objection to the change.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "six," in line 14, and insert the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 124, line 14, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 230. In all suits for balances due to the Post Office Department, interest thereon shall be recovered from the time of the default at the rate of 6 per cent a year.

Mr. CULLOP and Mr. MANN rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. CULLOP] is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move that the word "six," in line 18, be stricken out and the word "five" inserted in lieu thereof, so as to conform to the other amendment just passed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 124, line 14, strike out the word "six" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 231. In suits upon debentures issued by the collectors of the customs under any act for the collection of duties, interest shall be allowed at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the time when such debenture became due and payable.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "six," in line 21, and insert the word "five," so as to conform to the amendments already adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 232. Interest shall be allowed on all judgments in civil causes, and may be levied by the marshal under process of execution issued thereon in all cases where, by the laws of the State in which such court is held, interest may be levied under process of execution on judgments recovered in the courts of such State; and it shall be calculated from the date of the judgment, at such rate as is allowed by law on judgments recovered in the courts of such State.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question on the subject of suits on bond. Is there any provision in this act presented here with reference to the service of process in suits by the Government upon official bonds?

Mr. WATKINS. I believe it is regulated in conformity with the laws of the State in which the judgment is rendered.

Mr. CULLOP. I wanted to ask the chairman if there is a provision in here which provides that in case any judgment is rendered in a suit brought upon an official bond, it shall become a lien upon the property of all of the defendants from the date of the service of the process?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not know about the date of the service of the process, but it shall become a lien upon it in conformity with the laws of the State. Where a judgment is rendered in a State, the law applying in that State on State obligations applies also to the United States obligation.

Mr. CULLOP. Then there is a provision here that the statutes regarding the time of becoming liens in judgments of that kind shall be the same as in the States?

Mr. WATKINS. As in the States.

Mr. CULLOP. So that if the statute of some State so provided in the event of judgment being rendered against the principal and surety on an official bond, the judgment shall become a lien from the date of the service of the process if the State where the suit is prosecuted has such a statute?

Mr. WATKINS. That is my opinion about it.

Mr. CULLOP. In my State we have a statute of that kind, and it is found very advantageous in suits upon public bonds, because in many instances after suit is brought, and the service of process, and before judgment is rendered, the surety or even the defendant might convey his property for full value, and wherever judgment is rendered it becomes a lien from the date of the process, irrespective of any conveyances during the meantime. It is a very salutary provision in regard to the collection of these judgments.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 234. The provisions of section last preceding, so far as applicable, shall apply throughout the United States for the arrest and removal therefrom to the Philippine Islands of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States within the Philippine Islands, and shall apply within the Philippine Islands for the arrest and removal therefrom to the United States of any fugitive from justice charged with the commission of any crime or offense against the United States. Such fugitive may, by any judge or magistrate of the Philippine Islands, and agreeably to the usual mode of process against offenders therein, be arrested and imprisoned, or bailed, as the case may be, pending the issuance of a warrant for his removal to the United States, which warrant it shall be the duty of a judge of the court of first instance seasonably to issue, and of the officer or agent of the United States designated for the purpose to execute. Such officer or agent, when engaged in executing such warrant without the Philippine Islands, shall have all the powers of a marshal of the United States so far as such powers are requisite for the prisoner's safe-keeping and the execution of the warrant. The provisions of sections three hundred and seventy-one and three hundred and seventy-two, so far as applicable, shall apply to the Philippine Islands, which, for the purposes of said sections, shall be deemed a Territory within the meaning thereof.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, there is a word "the" left out, which I wish to have inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Page 127, line 9, after the word "of" insert the word "the."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, this section covers extradition to the Philippine Islands. I do not know that it is necessary, but I was going to ask whether there is any provision in the bill anywhere that would cover extradition between the Canal Zone and the United States?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 237. Warrants of arrest for violation of internal-revenue laws may be issued by United States commissioners upon the sworn complaint of a United States district attorney, assistant district attorney, collector or deputy collector of internal revenue, or revenue agent, or private citizen; but no such warrant of arrest shall be issued upon the sworn complaint of a private citizen unless first approved in writing by a United States district attorney.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question here. Why at this time provide that exception in violations of internal-revenue laws, that private citizens can not complain without the complaint is first approved by the district attorney? That is, one can not be sued until a district attorney, who is perhaps quite a long distance away, approves. Now, that offense of selling liquor in violation of the internal-revenue laws has become a more common thing than formerly, or perhaps the situation is somewhat different from what it was when that was enacted.

Mr. WATKINS. All the United States district attorneys have assistants, and it might be well to put after the words "district attorney" the words "or assistant district attorney."

Mr. MANN. They are in here.

Mr. WATKINS. It is not thought advisable that people who may be prejudiced or interested in having a person arrested should be permitted to cause them to be jerked up without the knowledge of the prosecuting officer. Any prejudiced citizen might prefer a complaint and have a warrant issued and have a citizen arrested; and it is proposed that some one having authority shall first approve, and the district attorney is supposed to be the one having the authority to pass upon the matter before the arrest is made.

Mr. BRYAN. I shall not insist, but it does not obtain as to other crimes—for instance, petty larceny or any other kind of an offense is not subject to the reservation. If the gentleman wants it left as it is I shall not insist.

Mr. WATKINS. Probably there is more prejudice in that class of cases than any other, and that may be the reason why the clause was enacted to begin with.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 240. The defendant may, in the place of giving bail, deposit with the clerk of the court to which the defendant is held to answer, the sum of money mentioned in the order; and upon delivering to the marshal the certificate of deposit, who shall execute a receipt therefor, may be discharged from custody. The money so deposited shall be subject to forfeiture upon the failure of the defendant to comply with the order of the court.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask a question there as to these last words, "comply with the order of the court." Now, where a cash bond is put up for the appearance of a defendant, and he appears and is tried and is fined, is it legitimate to put him in a position where he can not obtain a bail bond for appearance without the money is subject to the orders of the court after conviction, which means if he is fined they will take that money? I think if he appears and is fined, then the bail money ought to be returned to the bondsman, and I think that ought to be only bail money. Of course, if the money belongs to the defendant, it is subject to the judgment.

I have seen in many cases in smaller jurisdictions the money taken to pay the fine. That is what they do in our city courts; but in a Federal court, if a man is arrested and can get somebody to deposit cash as security for his appearance for trial, when the trial is over the money should be refunded to the person who put it up and not be subject to the order of the court at all; a defendant might get a bail bond if the money is not liable to pay the fine where he could not if the money was held subject to the order of the court. I move to strike out the words "comply with the order of the court" and insert "appear at all times under order of the court."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 130, lines 12 and 13, strike out the words "comply with the order of the court" and insert "appear at all times under the order of the court."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Washington what, in his judgment, is the meaning of the next section, where it reads, "If money has been deposited instead of giving bail, and the defendant, at any time before the forfeiture thereof, shall give sufficient special bail, or shall surrender himself in open court or to the marshal," and so forth, "the court shall order a return of the deposit to the defendant"?

Mr. BRYAN. I think that refers to a surrender before trial, and I think that it carries out the theory I have suggested as obtaining as to section 240.

Mr. MANN. Does not that apparently provide—I ask for information—that if a man has given special bail by deposit of money, and at the trial he appears in court in person, the bail is ordered returned to him?

Mr. BRYAN. It says, in line 17 of the section read by the gentleman from Illinois, "or be in any manner discharged."

Mr. MANN. That is in the alternative; that is, "or be in any manner discharged." But it reads before, "or shall surrender himself in open court or to the marshal." Now, when a man does surrender himself, is he not entitled to the return of the deposit?

Mr. BRYAN. I would not think that any court would surrender it. If convicted, he at once comes under the jurisdiction of the court. It is too late to surrender after conviction.

Mr. MANN. It is not too late to surrender if he is there.

Mr. BRYAN. After conviction he can not refuse to surrender. I think that that is only an appearance bond. I do not believe that it ought to be subject to the order of the court, at least when the money does not belong to the defendant.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the next section is intended to cover and protect the very point that is made in the amendment, and it is entirely unnecessary to pass amendments and have them added to the bill when the bill already covers the points to which objection is raised. The next section, section 241, sufficiently and thoroughly covers that, and was intended to cover it. I do not think the amendment ought to prevail and have the bill loaded down with unnecessary amendments.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a division.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 2, noes 14.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 241. If money has been deposited instead of giving bail, and the defendant, at any time before the forfeiture thereof, shall give sufficient special bail, or shall surrender himself in open court or to the marshal, or be in any manner discharged, the court shall order a return of the deposit to the defendant.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, reserving a point of order on this section, if we can amend after the word "discharged." in that section, line 18, so as to make it read "or be in any manner discharged, or upon surrendering himself after conviction," that would cover the point that I want, and will make it plain that after conviction the bail money may be returned, so that the Federal judge can not give an order that the bail money be held until the fine is paid and thereby make it harder for a man to get the bail that he seeks—if the gentleman will agree to that amendment, I think it will be an improvement to the section.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not like to load down the bill with unnecessary amendments. The language is so clear and overwhelming in its import that I do not think there can be any possible doubt about it. It says if he shall surrender himself in open court or to the marshal, or be in any manner discharged. The proposition submitted by the gentleman is intended to be covered by the language in section 241.

Mr. BRYAN. I think it is not covered. I think the gentleman is mistaken.

It seems plain to me that if the money is left with the court, to follow the order of the court, it ought not to be returnable only upon the discharge of the defendant.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on his point of order?

Mr. BRYAN. I will not insist upon it if the gentleman who has charge of the bill thinks that the matter is sufficiently covered.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington withdraws his point of order.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I simply call attention to the fact that something occurred a few moments ago that has not occurred since I have been a Member of this House, as far as I know. Just now there were only two Democrats present. I was wondering what had become of that distinguished patriot from Illinois, Mr. BUCHANAN, who had been saying that it was the duty of Members to be present and attend to business and making a point of no quorum every few minutes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Possibly he is resting up until to-morrow. [Laughter.]

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And also that distinguished statesman from Connecticut, Mr. DONOVAN, I notice is absent.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. My friend ought in the same connection to state how many Republicans there were on the floor.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. There were about five times as many Republicans as there were Democrats, and there were more Progressives that there were Democrats.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. There were only six or seven Republicans.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Oh, there were more than 10.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Certainly.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. I should like to ask the gentleman from Washington how long he has been in the Hall?

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Long enough to see that there were only two Democrats present.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. The gentleman has not been here very long.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Illinois, Mr. BUCHANAN, told me he was going to New York to-day, and that he did not intend to make any trouble on Calendar Wednesday. So if his patriotism is along that line, he ought to get the credit of it.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Perhaps his patriotism has oozed out by this time.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman ought to have stated—although it is wholly unnecessary now—that the Progressive Party was represented on the floor by the same number of Members as the Democratic Party; but the two Members of the Progressive Party have shown that they are here, and I am not sure that the two Members of the Democratic Party have given any such oral demonstration of their presence. The gentleman from Colorado [Mr. TAYLOR] was not one of them.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Oh, yes; I was here.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] will recognize that we are strong on percentages, at that.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I am complimenting you.

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman, as usual, was discounting the Progressive Party at about 50 per cent of its real strength. We have three Members present—the gentleman from California [Mr. STEPHENS], the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and myself.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from California has just come in. He has his hat in his hand.

Mr. BRYAN. If he has his hat in his hand, he counts for just that much more. That makes just that much more of him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 242. Any party charged with a criminal offense and admitted to bail may, in vacation, be arrested by his bail, and delivered to the marshal or his deputy, before any judge or other officer having power to commit for such offense; and at the request of such bail, the judge or other officer shall recommit the party so arrested to the custody of the marshal, and indorse on the recognizance, or certified copy thereof, the discharge and exoneratur of such bail; and the party so committed shall therefrom be held in custody until discharged by due course of law.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the word "the" in line 22, page 130, and to insert in lieu thereof the words "any United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 130, line 22, strike out the word "the" and insert the words "any United States."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the gentleman with reference to that. Under the existing law if a defendant's bail goes after him and captures him at some distant point, at whose expense is the defendant to be returned to the district where he is under indictment?

Mr. TOWNER. I can not answer that question; but the gentleman will see that the object of this is that the process may issue and the arrest may be made by any United States marshal in any part of the United States.

Mr. MANN. I do not so understand it. This says—

Any party charged with a criminal offense and admitted to bail may, in vacation, be arrested by his bail, and delivered to the marshal or his deputy.

Take the case of a man who is arrested in Texas and who furnishes bail to appear at the trial in Texas. Then he flees to Canada, and when he gets up in the State of Washington he is captured by his bail. Now, is it the duty of the United States to pay the expense of returning him, or is it the duty of his bail to return him?

Mr. TOWNER. It is true that the person who is thus arrested ought not to be placed or continued in the custody of an individual at whose instance he may be arrested and continue in the custody of that individual clear across the United States. The object of this is to put him in charge of any United States marshal that may be, for instance, in California and transport him to New York, where he is wanted.

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that it is merely a matter of expense. A man who has given bail to appear in Maine and who gets to California, if the surety can surrender him to the marshal in California, of course his bail has nothing more to do with it. The question is whether the giving of a bail bond in the first instance, guaranteeing to the Government the appearance of the man at the trial court at the proper time, shall be at the expense and risk of the bail, or whether the General Government takes the risk and expense. Because it is quite certain that while this would not require the bail to turn him over to any marshal, as a rule the bail would do that if he could avoid the expense of transporting the alleged criminal back where he was wanted.

Mr. TOWNER. I think the gentleman is correct in regard to that. The only question is whether it is not better in the administration of justice that he should be placed in the custody of the United States authority rather than continue in the custody of the individual. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 244. When any recognizance in a criminal cause, taken for, or in, or returnable to, any court of the United States, or any money deposited with the clerk thereof, is forfeited by a breach of the condition thereof, such court may, in its discretion, remit the whole or a part of the penalty, whenever it appears to the court that there has been no willful default of the party, and that a trial can, notwithstanding, be had in the cause, and that public justice does not otherwise require the same penalty to be enforced.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment, following the word "penalty," in line 19, by inserting the words "forfeiture or judgment therefor."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 19, after the word "penalty," insert the words "forfeiture or judgment therefor."

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TOWNER) there were 6 ayes and 10 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer another amendment, following the word "had,", in line 22, to insert "or has been had," so that it will read "and that a trial can, notwithstanding, be had or has been had in the cause."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 31, line 22, after the word "had," insert the words "or has been had."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. TOWNER. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is authority in such matters, but the language is "and that a trial can notwithstanding be had in the cause," and if the amendment is adopted it will read "a trial can notwithstanding be had or has been had in the cause."

Mr. TOWNER. The language may not be in the best form, but the gentleman will see that it is for the purpose of making available the same rights upon judgment that has been had, as might exist on a judgment that was to be procured. I think this would be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. TOWNER) there were 9 ayes and 12 noes.

So the amendment was lost.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 245. All criminal prosecutions shall be in the name of the United States of America.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Of course, I do not expect the few remarks I make to get to the attention of gentlemen who lie concealed in the catacombs of the House. A few moments ago somebody called attention to the very large attendance on the floor of the House, but whoever did so could not have seen through the walls and seen where the Democratic Party lies concealed.

However, I did not rise for the purpose of discussing that matter, humorous as it may be. It must strike anyone who visits the House as peculiar, where one gentleman in charge of the bill sits on the floor and votes "no," and a majority of those in their seats vote "aye," and the gentleman wiggles his thumb and out of the bowels of the earth a certain number of other distinguished gentlemen come in and vote as the gentleman in charge of the bill wiggles his thumb. I rose for the purpose of calling attention to another matter as an incident.

The bill provides that all criminal prosecutions shall be in the name of the United States of America. Somebody asked me recently, "What is the name of a citizen of the United States when you want to refer to him with an adjective?" We refer to a resident of Canada as a Canadian, to a resident of France as a Frenchman, to a resident of England as an Englishman, and to a resident of Germany as a German, and so forth, and so on. I think that ordinarily we refer to the citizens of the United States as Americans, although, of course, we are not the only Americans.

I took the matter up with the State Department for the purpose of ascertaining what the diplomatic usage was. While I believe they have not yet reached the point where an American is described as an American with the use of the word as a noun, they have reached the point where they use it as an adjective. A gentleman from the United States who is a citizen of the United States is referred to as an American gentleman, or an American woman, or an American lady, and I think no one takes any exception to that. Possibly in the course of time we will get to the point where everybody will acknowledge that we are entitled to use the word "American." I say "possibly," because if the present administration continues in power very long we will probably be called English, in view of the attitude of the administration where we have to ask England what we can do in our own local affairs.

Mr. WATKINS. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. MANN. I will.

Mr. WATKINS. Does the gentleman think that with Central America and South America it would be entirely acceptable to use language without saying "United States of America"?

Mr. MANN. I did not say "America." I said "American."

Mr. WATKINS. Either.

Mr. MANN. How would the gentleman, if he went to South America, describe himself?

Mr. WATKINS. I would say, "I am a citizen of the United States of America."

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is a very long phrase. Nobody in the world ever described people of a foreign country in that manner.

Mr. WATKINS. I have always been very proud of it.

Mr. MANN. "A citizen of the United States of America." Of course we are all proud of that; but the gentleman would not say "A United Statesman." If he were referring to a citizen of Brazil, he would say "Brazilian"; and if he were referring to a citizen of the Republic of Panama, he would say "A Panaman"; and if he were referring to himself, he would say he was an American. Short titles go everywhere in the world. They have to. If we do not give a short title to ourselves, some one else will.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. There is a movement on foot in the United States to eliminate the word "English" in connection with the language. That is, a great many people are in favor of designating the language which we speak not as the English language but as the American language. I want to ask my friend, the distinguished gentleman from Illinois, in whose judgment I have great confidence, whether such a change, which I believe everyone within the hearing of my voice would approve, could be made by the simple introduction of a bill and the passage of a law by the two Houses of Congress?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, there is a great deal of difference between the introduction of a bill and the passage of a law. It would be easy to introduce a bill on that subject, but I am quite confident nobody in our day will pass a law to change the title of the language which we speak.

Mr. BARTHOLDT. Does not the gentleman believe that there is enough American sentiment in the House and the Senate to simply say that henceforth the language which we speak shall be known as the American language rather than the English language?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I do not believe so; but if such a bill were passed, it would not make any change in it.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman permit a suggestion?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. COOPER. Would he want it to be known as the North American language or the South American language? There are two Americas.

Mr. MANN. Irrespective of that, we might name it ourselves; but that would not change what people would call it. It would be the English language everywhere else in the world. It would be like changing the weights and measures, which we did officially many years ago; and I dare say there is not a man in the House who can give the metric scale of weights and measures without examination.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 248. The indictment or information must contain the title of the action, the name of the court in which the same is filed, the names of the parties, and a statement of the facts constituting the offense, in ordinary and concise language, and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what is intended. It may be substantially in the following form:

The United States of America against A. B. In the district court of the United States for the ——— division of the ——— district of ———, 19—. A. B. is accused by the grand jury of the ——— division of the ——— district of ——— by this indictment (or by the United States attorney of said district by this information) of the crime of (giving its legal appellation, such as murder, arson, or the like, or designating it as a felony or misdemeanor), committed as follows: The said A. B., on the ——— day of ———, 19—, at ——— in the said division (or the said district; or at ———, a place within the jurisdiction of the United States and in said division or district; or on board a certain vessel owned in whole or in part by the United States, or by a citizen of the United States, or by a corporation created under the laws of one of the States of the United States, called ———, out of the judisdiction of any particular State or district, said district being the district where the defendant was found, or in which he was first brought), did (here set forth the act or omission charged as an offense), contrary to the form of the act of Congress in such case made and provided, and against the peace and dignity of the United States of America.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment to offer, following the word "filed," in line 10, on page 32, to insert the words "the date of the offense," so that, among other things required in the indictment shall be the requisite that it shall state the date of the offense. I presume likely that has been omitted inadvertently. It certainly ought to be included.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, it was not omitted inadvertently. The general law covers the point, that any case stated within a year is all that is necessary. If it is a capital offense, no time limit runs against it. It is impossible in a great many crimes to name the date. Often in the case of murder it is a long time before people find the man is dead, and it is often impossible to name definitely when an offense was committed. If we should pass such an amendment it might hamper the court very much in requiring the specific date to be set up. Take the case of embezzlement or larceny or robbery or murder. Of course in robbery the date is ordinarily known, but there are other offenses where the dates are not absolutely known, and if it is proven any time within a year or six months, where there is a limit of six months, it is held in law to be sufficient.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I did not suppose that anybody would seriously contend that an indictment could be complete or ought to be considered complete or that anybody ought to be placed on trial under an indictment that did not allege a date. It would be impossible to determine whether it was within the statute of limitations unless the date were alleged. Under the law as it now exists, and as it is interpreted by the courts, it is not necessary to confine the proof to the specific date that is alleged in the indictment, but certainly I never heard it before argued that an indictment might omit charging the date of the offense.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes.

Mr. WATKINS. The gentleman will notice in the form prescribed there that the date in general is named. It does not mean the exact date on which the offense is committed, but there must be an open space; it must be committed on or about a certain date.

Mr. TOWNER. I intended to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that the allegation of the first part of the section 248 did not conform to the form that he himself has inserted later. It certainly seems to me that the date ought to be one of the things stated in the indictment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment:

After the word "intended," in line 13, insert the words "and to identify the acts charged as a crime."

So that the language of the section will read that this statement of fact shall be in ordinary and concise language—and in such manner as to enable a person of common understanding to know what it intended and to identify the acts charged as a crime.

Of course in every allegation of the commission of a crime it is not only necessary to specify that the defendant is charged with the crime, but it is also necessary in an indictment to state what the particular acts are that constitute the crime. It is omitted in this statement of the requisites of the indictment, and it should be at least sufficiently stated to identify the acts charged as a crime with the charge itself.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, we are now dealing with the form of indictment, the general outline of it, not in its specific or definite form, which is required in all indictments, but the outline, and in that outline the very idea intended to be conveyed by the gentleman is fully expressed. The gentleman will see it here in different parts of section 248. Now, in line 8, page 133, I want to call attention to another place that sets it forth very clearly, where it says, "here set forth the act or omission charged as an offense." We are still dealing with section 248, which the gentleman is seeking to amend. I think the gentleman's amendment is superfluous, tautological, and unnecessary.

Mr. TOWNER. Let me call the gentleman's attention to this fact that this part on page 133 of the section has reference to things that must be included in the indictment; that is the form of the indictment, whereas the same language is omitted in the statement of the substantive parts or requisites of the indictment. Ought not that to be included in order to make it conform to the other form made specific?

Mr. WATKINS. We are enacting a law, and one of the requirements of the law we are enacting is that the evidence must be substantively set forth in the indictment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, on page 133, line 9, following the word "offense," insert the words, within the part which is included in the parentheses, "in the form of allegations of fact and not merely in the general language of the statute."

The object of that, Mr. Chairman, is to make it plain and clear that the facts are charged which it is alleged constitute the offense. It is true it says "here set forth the act or omission charged as an offense"; that might be done in the general language of the statute, but it should go further and specify what the particular acts are which constitute the offense in the general language that is used in the section of the statute. I think that is the general requirement, and it is necessary not only for the benefit of the defendant in order that he may know what the crime is with which he is charged, but it is necessary that the court should know it in order to pass upon a demurrer or other question that might arise as to the sufficiency of the indictment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 133, line 9, after the word "offense," within the parentheses, insert the words "in the form of allegations of fact, and not merely in the general language of the statute."

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to ask the gentleman whether this section in reference to indictment and form of indictment is supposed to simplify criminal proceedings?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; that is the object of it; one object of it. Another object is to enable the district attorneys who are very careless, or some few of them who may happen to be ignorant and do not know how to write an indictment so it will stand. It was thought best to give some general idea as to the form of the indictment, so that when a district attorney first entered upon the discharge of his duties, a new man coming into office, there will be some general idea about what the form of the indictment should be. Some district attorneys write them in a very loose way, and it is thought best to furnish an idea of the form, so that a case would not be dismissed on account of a laxity of the indictment.

Mr. MANN. What law gives the form of indictment now in United States courts?

Mr. WATKINS. There is no particular law which gives the form, except the law which designates what shall be incorporated in an indictment set forth in Blackstone and Archbold and other authors on criminal law. There are forms, however, submitted by various authors suggesting certain designated forms, but there is no law covering the proposition so far as I recall.

Mr. MANN. I believe they have printed forms.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; they are used nearly everywhere.

Mr. MANN. I believe the Department of Justice has a man in its employ who used to be one of our district attorneys in Chicago who was supposed to be very expert in preparing these complicated indictments in some of the trust cases and such matters—I am not sure.

Mr. WATKINS. The district attorneys have forms already prepared. Some few do not, and those who do not are sometimes negligent in preparing indictments in proper form.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 250. No indictment found and presented by a grand jury in any district or other court of the United States shall be deemed insufficient, nor shall the trial, judgment, or other proceeding thereon be affected by reason of any defect or imperfection in matter of form only, which shall not tend to the prejudice of the defendant.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to insert a comma following the word "imperfection," line 24, so that the phrase "in matter of form only" shall be set forth, as it ought to be, grammatically.

Mr. WATKINS. Before that amendment is reported——

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. I would like to have time to refer back to the original statute to see whether this is an innovation or whether it has been carried that way all the time. The statute was enacted in June, 1872, and it has stood the test since that time. I have not had an opportunity yet to concentrate my thoughts sufficiently on the question to know whether it makes any material difference or not, but in the hurry of the moment I prefer not to change the punctuation in the bill for fear it might make some material difference. Right on the spur of the moment, at first blush, I would say it would make no material difference; but the statute has stood the test since 1872, and I see no particular objection to it remaining as it is. I do not know the object of putting a comma here, and I do not see what practical purpose it would serve, and for that reason I shall object to it.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 269. Within five days after a plea of guilty or the rendition of a verdict of guilty by the jury, and during the same term of court, unless the defendant moves for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, and in that case within five days after the overruling of such motion, the court shall pronounce the judgment provided by law. And the court thereafter shall not suspend the sentence, or the execution thereof, except in such cases as are expressly provided for by the laws of the United States. A person sentenced to imprisonment, either in a jail or penitentiary, unless the execution of the sentence be suspended as hereinbefore provided, shall be ordered by the court into the custody of the marshal, who shall deliver him to the sheriff, jailer, warden, or other proper officer, in whose custody he shall remain in such jail or penitentiary until the term of his confinement expires or he is pardoned or otherwise legally discharged.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out in line 16, on page 140, the words "within five days"; and if that shall be approved by the committee, I shall also move to strike out of lines 18, 19, and 20 the words "unless the defendant moves for a new trial, or in arrest of judgment, and in that case within five days after the overruling of such motion," so that the sentence will read:

After plea of guilty or the rendition of a verdict of guilty by the jury, and during the same term of court, the court shall pronounce the judgment provided by law.

I want consideration now only for the "five days."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 140, line 16, by striking out the words "within five days."

Mr. TOWNER. That is a very serious innovation on the present law, and I think, Mr. Chairman, it will prove a dangerous one. There are many instances where it will be practically impossible for the court to render judgment in case of the sickness of the defendant or for other reasons of that character. Besides that, the judge himself will very frequently be required to make an investigation regarding the circumstances in order to enable him to properly perform his duty in the infliction of a sentence. He can not and ought not to be limited to five days in order to do this. If it shall be done at any time during the term of court that is a sufficient limitation. I can conceive of no reason why the arbitrary period, and especially the short period of five days, should be placed as a limitation in the infliction of a punishment. I do not think it is necessary for me to say anything else in regard to the matter. It seems to me it should appeal to anyone.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. TOWNER].

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] where this notion of the five days came from, if I may?

Mr. WATKINS. That is simply suggested by the commission which was authorized to codify the law.

Mr. MANN. Take a case where a man pleads guilty, and under this, if sentence was not pronounced in five days, would he then be able to sue out a writ of habeas corpus on the ground that the court had lost jurisdiction to pronounce sentence?

Mr. WATKINS. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Why not?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not object to the 5 days being stricken out. It probably ought to be 10 days, or we might leave no time in. It is during that term of court.

Mr. MANN. During that term of court.

Mr. WATKINS. I think that is all right.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TOWNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to call the attention of the chairman to this further language. I am not yet sure just what ought to be done with that, and I will ask unanimous consent to return to this section for the purpose of changing that, if it may be deemed just to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. TOWNER. No. I ask unanimous consent to return to this section in case I deem it necessary to offer an amendment to it. I refer to section 269.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman wants to ask unanimous consent to return to it hereafter?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes, sir.

Mr. WATKINS. Reserving the right to object, I will be very glad if the gentleman would give some reason for it. I would dislike very much to defer action unless there is some particular reason for it.

Mr. TOWNER. The reason is simply this, that I thought at first blush that the words in lines 18, 19, and 20 also ought to be stricken out, namely:

Unless the defendant moves for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, and in that case within five days after the overruling of such motion.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think so.

Mr. BRYAN. I suggest to the gentleman that he modify his request that he may return to it sometime to-day, and if he does not return to it to-day it will be out of order to do it next Wednesday.

Mr. TOWNER. It occurs to me that the only language that ought to be retained here in section 269 is this:

After a plea of guilty or the rendition of a verdict of guilty by the jury and during the same term of court the court shall pronounce the judgment provided by law.

That is all, I think, as it appears to me now, that this provision ought to contain. Whether or not the motion for a new trial is made, it is proper, I think, that the judgment should be rendered at the same term of court. And I think that is the only requirement that ought to be made, and for that reason it occurs to me the language I have stated ought to be stricken out. In order to settle it, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language from lines 18, 19, and 20:

Unless the defendant moves for a new trial or in arrest of judgment, and in that case within five days after the overruling of such motion.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 140, by striking out all of line 18 after the word "court" and all of line 19 and line 20 up to and including the word "motion."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman certainly does not want that amendment to go in that shape.

Mr. TOWNER. I think so.

Mr. MANN. That would require the court to render sentence although a motion for a new trial was still pending and undisposed of. The gentleman does not want to have the court sentence a prisoner who has a motion for a new trial undisposed of?

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; the court would, of course, dispose of it at the same term of court.

Mr. MANN. But the motion for a new trial may go over to another term of court.

Mr. TOWNER. It can not be so done now, as I understand it.

Mr. MANN. It certainly can be so done now, and it is frequently done. On motions, under that provision, the court could not do any business the last few days of a term of court. He can where he sits continuously, as they do in my city. But on the last day of a term of court, when motions for a new trial are made, a blanket order is issued continuing all these motions to the next term of court.

Mr. TOWNER. It might be done at the request of the defendant.

Mr. MANN. It is not done at the request of the defendant; it is a blanket order. Our local courts are in session all the time. That is not the case with the United States court. But the gentleman's amendment would leave it so that after a plea of guilty or a verdict the court must pronounce sentence during the term of court, although there might be a motion for a new trial pending and undisposed of.

Mr. TOWNER. Yes; it would require the court to pass upon the motion for a new trial at that term of court. I am aware of that fact. But the gentleman raises a question of which I am not very certain, and I shall ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear distinctly everything that was said on that side, but as well as I could hear the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] expressed the correct view of the matter. It would not do at all to have this language stricken out. If there was a new trial granted, the case would have to be disposed of at that term of court, and that is not always practicable.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. The section reads, commencing with line 21:

And the court thereafter shall not suspend the sentence, or the execution thereof, except in such cases as are expressly provided for by the laws of the United States. A person sentenced to imprisonment, either in a jail or penitentiary, unless the execution of the sentence be suspended as hereinbefore provided, shall be ordered by the court into the custody of the marshal, who shall deliver him to the sheriff, jailer, warden, or other proper officer, in whose custody he shall remain in such jail or penitentiary until the term of his confinement expires or he is pardoned or otherwise legally discharged.

Does the gentleman understand from that what I understand from it—that the court under this section must pronounce sentence on all defendants that are found guilty and can not suspend the sentence?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; that is the principal object of the proposed law. The privilege had been so much abused that it became a scandal in many parts of the country where the courts have suspended sentence and allowed defendants who were convicted to tramp over the country and mix with the citizenship of the country. It became a public scandal in some places, and it was thought best to put a stop to it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I propose to read to the House a suggestion made in reference to this matter by one of the distinguished judges on the Federal bench in New York City, and I do not see how anyone can favor the proposition in the bill after hearing this statement. I read:

SECTION 269.

This section takes away from the court the power of suspending sentence and is a distinct step backward in the administration of the criminal law.

Under this act it would be impossible to exercise proper mercy toward that class of offenders, peculiarly large, under the Federal statutes who have committed at most a breach of discipline—e. g., boys of 18 and 19 who have pilfered a trifle from some post office, navigators who have navigated their vessels in forbidden channels in contravention of a statute they never heard of, and so on. It will also be a great handicap to prosecuting officers who under the Federal statutes have long found an indictment for conspiracy the most serviceable method of reaching crime. Many conspirators are mere tools; they are guilty, but their moral status is utterly different from the main conspirators whom they serve. Hitherto prosecutors have been able to point out to such persons that if they tell the truth, the court will probably suspend sentence. But now they must be sentenced. It will be increasingly difficult to get information from them if a premium is put on perjury, and juries will often refuse to convict those who ought to be convicted because of knowledge that their frequent recommendations to mercy can not be sufficiently considered by the court to which they speak.

I feel very strongly on this subject. Personally I have sparingly exercised the power of suspension—never without requiring the convict to report to me, or to a designated person who would report to me, for a long time after conviction. Of course I have not always been successful, but I am sure that in almost every case the person whose sentence I suspended really lived a new life under the influence of the mercy extended to him.

Now, under this provision of the section a man who is legally guilty, though he may not be morally guilty, must be sentenced and must serve his sentence, unless pardoned. Well, a man can not be pardoned practically for a short sentence in jail.

Now, in a case where some person has violated the law unintentionally—of course, he is supposed to know what the law is, but he does not—and he is guilty of an unintentional infraction of the law, what is the use in saying that he must serve a sentence? I do not see the theory of it.

The fact that the power has been abused is no reason, to my mind, for taking the power entirely away from the court. No body and no man anywhere possesses power which they do not abuse. If they did, we would have reached perfection on the part of some one, and the mere fact that some judge lets off a criminal who ought to be sentenced and fined is not to me a sufficient reason for taking away from the court the power to suspend sentence in those many cases which come up of lads, for instance, who have committed some technical violation of the law. Under this provision they would not have the opportunity to have a sentence suspended.

I think the power, while it may have been abused, has been a great blessing on the whole because it has been exercised.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, may I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. Does not the gentleman think it also has been an aid to the enforcement of the law? Because you suspend the sentence, it is held over a man as a guaranty of good behavior. He knows if he violates the law again in like particular he is liable to be taken up and made to undergo that sentence. In other words, it is a kind of reformatory measure.

Mr. MANN. Undoubtedly. I believe myself in enforcing the law. I think there is a good deal of delay in the law, but I never would, if I could avoid it, send an innocent or practically innocent young person to jail. I would rather take the chance, as a rule, of their being good citizens and having received sufficient punishment by indictment than to force them into jail acquaintances.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I suggest to the gentleman that we have this class of cases in my part of the country, of men indicted for violation of the internal-revenue laws and for not paying tax for the manufacture and sale of liquor, and things of that sort; cases where men are arrested—very often ignorant men—for working in a place not registered as a licensed distillery, and they are confined in jail.

The judge has in many such cases suspended sentence in order that they might go home and gather their crop, whereas to put them in jail and make them serve out a sentence then would bring starvation, almost, upon their families. Such cases have occurred of violation of the law by failure to pay the tax, or to register, or by working in an unregistered distillery, where the court has allowed the defendant to plead guilty, return home, and come back and serve out a jail sentence after he has done that which is absolutely necessary for him to do in order to sustain his family. This takes away all discretion from the judge and prohibits things of that sort being done.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the language in lines 21 to 24:

And the court thereafter shall not suspend the sentence, or the execution thereof, except in such cases as are expressly provided for by the laws of the United States.

I move to strike out that sentence.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 140, by striking out, after the word "law," in line 21, the words "And the court thereafter shall not suspend the sentence, or the execution thereof, except in such cases as are expressly provided for by the laws of the United States."

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me the law as it is administered by the Federal courts takes the place of the parole laws of the several States, and I am in favor of a parole law. I am not in favor of this provision as it stands in the bill.

I agree thoroughly with the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. I believe that the courts ought to have the right to suspend sentence, especially in the cases of young men and first offenders. Many a man, as has been well said, commits an offense, not knowing that he has violated a Federal law or some regulation of some department of the Government; and to force the court to impose a sentence and confine him in jail or in a penitentiary, it seems to me, is depriving the court of one of the greatest helps that they have.

They may abuse this in some sections of the country. I remember the time when the parole law was first passed in my State. Men opposed it, and suggested that the courts would not send anyone to the penitentiaries and jails, and that the juries and courts would not enforce the law. Yet we find, after years of experience with the parole law, that it is one of the best allies of the criminal statutes in our State. And I am decidedly in favor of extending it and not abridging it in any particular. I hope the chairman will accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], so that we may still leave it in the power of these courts to extend paroles to those whom they believe ought to be favored.

Sending men to prison is not always the best way of enforcing the criminal statutes. Justice tempered with mercy may reform many men accused of violating the criminal laws. And for one I am not afraid to trust the courts along this line.

Mr. TOWNER. Mr. Chairman, I want to read what another United States judge says regarding this power. He says:

As I wrote you before, the general tendency in all jurisdictions now is to extend the power to suspend sentence and to redeem or assist criminals who may be saved or protected from bad associations. There has been considerable query raised by the Department of Justice with respect to the authority of the court to suspend sentence, and it has, up to the present time, depended upon the right of the court to allow a sentence to be postponed or to let the defendant be discharged without sentence until after the term has expired and the case has lapsed. I shall not attempt to argue the merits of the question, and I do not wish to be understood as desiring merely more authority than Congress may wish to give. I do, however, firmly believe that the power to suspend sentence is a useful provision, and it would be better to have the section expressly give the power than to leave it as at present, merely dependent upon implication or the lack of prohibition against the exercise of power.

Mr. Chairman, I entirely agree with what has been said by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. BOOHER] regarding this power. Everyone who has had experience in the criminal courts, either as an attorney or as a judge, must know that in many cases the imposition of a sentence at all is not only not justified, but is an absolute, affirmative wrong.

The court ought to have the power, and ought to be perfectly free, not merely by implication but by the express language of a statute authorizing it, to use his judgment in such cases. There is very little danger of its abuse. I know that individual instances might be cited where perhaps this benign power had been used without justification, but in ninety-nine cases out of one hundred the use of it is beneficent rather than otherwise. As has been well said, if this provision becomes a law, it will turn the courts of the United States in a direction entirely contrary to the trend of public opinion all over the world with regard to the treatment of criminals. It is best that we should save a man rather than that we should punish him for the commission of a crime which, in some instances, when the act was committed he did not know was a crime. To send him to jail, to impose upon him what he must believe is unmerited punishment, puts him in such a frame of mind with regard to the law and the administration of justice and his relation to society that it is very apt to make him a criminal if he had not before intended to be such. So I sincerely hope that the committee will not leave this provision in the section, and I would be glad if, instead of that, the chairman would afterwards return to this section, by unanimous consent, and insert in lieu of it a provision giving the courts of the United States the affirmative power to suspend sentences in their discretion, so that there shall be no question but that they may exercise that power.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in corroboration of what I stated a few moments ago when answering the question of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to call attention to a statement which is found in House Report No. 566, second session, Fifty-first Congress, on the practice of certain United States district courts and other officers in criminal cases. It it not necessary to read the very long report, or even to go to the expense of having it incorporated in the RECORD, but just a few extracts from it will show to what extent this practice has been carried.

In the middle district of the same State—commencing at the May term, 1885, and ending at the November term, 1889, there appear to have been 673 convictions and 333 suspended sentences. In other words, in more than half the cases the sentences were suspended.

Mr. BOOHER. What were those people convicted of?

Mr. WATKINS. I suppose they were convicted of misdemeanors very largely. We could very easily make an exception to cover cases of that kind.

Mr. BOOHER. What kind of misdemeanors?

Mr. WATKINS. I can not inform the gentleman as to that. I do not know whether they were selling intoxicating liquors, or violating the internal-revenue law in some way. It does not state here. I infer, however, that the cases must have been misdemeanors.

Mr. MANN. What is the report?

Mr. WATKINS. It is House Report No. 566, Fifty-first Congress, second session. It is a report from the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MANN. On some bill?

Mr. WATKINS. It was on a resolution to investigate the practice of certain United States district courts and other officers in criminal cases.

Mr. MANN. Did they report a bill?

Mr. WATKINS. It does not seem from this report that they did.

Mr. MANN. It is a report in the Fifty-first Congress?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. MANN. More than 20 years ago.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes; but they have been doing just as bad ever since.

Mr. MANN. Did anybody ever propose a bill during all this time?

Mr. WATKINS. This report is based upon facts which were brought out in the investigation they had made. It comes from high authority, and I think it ought to have considerable weight. I was going to read some of the statements contained in the report, but as my time is limited I will simply say that there can be no objection in minor cases and misdemeanors for the judges to exercise this discretion, but to do it in all cases is carrying it too far. In many cases this right, as they call it, but which is a privilege they exercise, is carried to the most absurd extreme, and I think it is at least advisable that there should be some restriction of the authority that they exercise.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. WATKINS. I will.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would like to ask the gentleman if he can tell us in what character of cases the language in lines 22 and 23 refer—"except in such cases as are expressly provided for by the laws of the United States"?

Mr. WATKINS. That means that if there are any laws prohibiting this leniency in a certain class of cases that would not conflict with this law. I must say that I do not know of any.

Mr. HOUSTON. The inference would be that there are some provisions of the statutes to that effect.

Mr. WATKINS. We can perfect the language in this section rather than to strike it out altogether.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, the whole idea of the present state of criminology is to give greater power to the courts in suspending sentence. The juvenile courts all over the country, to say nothing of Judge Lindsey, everywhere, take that as a basis. They suspend sentences and send the respondents to reformatory institutions. For instance, in the Navy judges do not think of sending defendants to Fort Leavenworth, but they provide that they may be put in a reformatory institution, in the disciplinary barracks, and with sentence suspended, and if he shows good conduct for a period of six months, or whatever it may be—a period much shorter than the sentence—he may be released. That is the whole tenor and tendency of this day and time, and I hope that we will not back up on that and make it impossible for a judge to suspend the sentence, but require him to put the defendant in the penitentiary. Not one judge in a thousand would suspend a sentence where the circumstances at the trial show that the man was guilty of a heinous offense and that he ought to be punished. Judges generally are associated more or less with the prosecuting attorney, and they work together, and I think they would rather increase a sentence than to decrease it, and I hope that the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will carry.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I believe if this report referred to by the chairman of the committee could be read carefully by every member of the committee present the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois would be unanimously adopted and the chairman of the committee would vote for it himself. These cases, or most of them, seem to have been worked up by deputy United States marshals for the purpose of getting the fees. That is one of the greatest vices of the fee system of the country. Now, take a case here. Here is a report signed by Albert Small, examiner for the Department of Justice:

In the case of William Meeks, the certificate of proceedings fixes the hearing on June 16, while his docket makes it June 19. The arrest was made by Deputy Marshal J. W. Lath, who was allowed $21.40; commissioner, $11.85; witnesses, $28; a total of $61.25.

Page after page of just such kind of suits were brought, and the court suspended sentence and sent the people home, and I think the court was exactly right in so doing. I trust the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out, line 1, page 141, the words "as hereinbefore provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 141, line 1, by striking out the words "as hereinbefore provided."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 270. The review by appeal, by writ of error, or otherwise, of final decisions in the district courts shall be had in the Supreme Court of the United States or in the circuit court of appeals; and the review by appeal, by writ of error, or otherwise, of decisions in cases in which they are not made final, shall be had in the Supreme Court of the United States in accordance with the provisions of this title.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "appeals," line 4, page 142, insert the following: "and appeals may be had in like manner by the defendant in cases of indirect or criminal contempt."

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, we have provided for trial by jury in indirect contempt cases in one of the sections of this bill. We provide in what is known as the bill to amend the antitrust act that passed the House the other day a like trial by jury in indirect contempt cases, and for appeal to the higher court on conviction in these cases.

This amendment but carries into this bill the right which has hitherto been denied under existing law, as construed by the courts, of trial by jury in indirect contempt cases and the right of appeal from the decision in the lower courts.

I believe the most noted case as an authority that the defendant has no right of appeal in indirect contempt cases is the Debs case, but it has been the rule and so held uniformly that when a judge decides a contempt case there is no appeal from it to a higher court.

As I have said on former occasions, it is rather shocking to my sense of correct trial, imbued as I am with the righteousness and propriety of a trial by jury in all disputed cases of facts, where a man's liberty or property is to be taken from him by way of punishment, that there should not be a trial by jury, and it is equally obnoxious to my idea as to what is the proper administration of law among Anglo-Saxon people, when a judgment in a criminal case, no matter how well tried it be, should be final, and that there should be no right of appeal, and therefore I have continued my efforts to amend the law in this section by providing for an appeal to a higher court in indirect contempt cases.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Can the gentleman state for the information of the committee what is the maximum penalty the Federal judge may impose for indirect contempt?

Mr. BARTLETT. It has never been limited. I know in the case of the impeachment of Judge Peck the trial grew out of the fact that he imposed a penalty of $1,500 on the complainant and put him in jail for six months, and that fact led to the impeachment of Judge Peck, although he was not convicted.

Mr. BRYAN. The judge can make it two or three years if he desires to?

Mr. BARTLETT. There is no limit to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection the Clerk will again report the amendment.

There was no objection, and the Clerk again reported the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of asking a question. I do not profess to have much knowledge of the criminal law, but I am told by one of the judges that this chapter contains no definite provision as to bail on appeal after conviction under criminal law.

Mr. WATKINS. I believe it does not.

Mr. MANN. And, further, I am told that this is a very vexed subject, on which the practice in different parts of the United States varies greatly, and I ask whether or not it ought to contain some provision for bail on appeal?

Mr. WATKINS. It might, except in capital cases. I do not know of any objection to it except in capital cases.

Mr. MANN. This judge himself thinks that there ought to be no bail on appeal in a criminal case except when allowed by the appellate court.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not see the virtue of that, because the district judge who tries the case would know, in all probability, more about it than the appellate court.

Mr. MANN. I do not know anything about it myself.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to suggest that where you go to the court of appeals it would subject a man to being sent to the penitentiary before you get a hearing. I believe that was the experience in the dynamite case. They applied for bail to the court of appeals, and before the motion could be heard they were sent to the penitentiary, and then, as the gentleman will remember, they were brought out on appeal. They were put in jail while making their application.

Mr. MANN. I understand. Of course that is always the case where they sue out a writ of error. I call it to the attention of the gentleman, because it might be a matter that ought to be covered in this bill in some way.

I would like to make this suggestion. I have been watching this bill as well as I could, and, while I doubt very much whether it will ever become a law, I do not think that the work that we do on the bill is lost. I take it that if this bill itself should not become a law, that a committee in probably the next Congress would report a bill substantially as amended here, and probably make much more rapid progress with it the second time than was made the first, so that anything that can come in to straighten up the matter, I think, is desirable to have come into the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 271. No appeal or writ of error by which any order, judgment, or decree may be reviewed in the circuit court of appeals under the provisions of this title shall be taken or sued out except within six months after the entry of the order, judgment, or decree sought to be reviewed; and no appeal or writ of error by which any order, judgment, or decree may be reviewed in the Supreme Court under the provisions of this title shall be taken or sued out except within one year after the entry of the order, judgment, or decree sought to be reviewed: Provided, however, That in all cases in which a lesser time is by law limited for appeals or writs of error, such limits of time shall apply to appeals or writs of error in such cases, notwithstanding the provisions of this section: And provided further, That where a party entitled to prosecute a writ of error or to take an appeal is an infant, or non compos mentis, or imprisoned, such writ of error may be prosecuted, or such appeal may be taken within the time limited exclusive of the term of such disability.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by adding after the word "disability," in line 14, page 143, the following:

Bail may be allowed to defendants after conviction, upon appeal, in the discretion of the court.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 143, line 14, after the word "disability," insert "bail may be allowed to defendants after conviction, upon appeal, in the discretion of the court."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that all agree that some kind of amendment ought to be adopted, and if that does not suit the gentlemen on the committee of course we could go back to this later, but it seems to be unanimously agreed that a man who appeals from conviction for contempt, for instance, should be admitted to bail. The gentleman from Georgia has just provided an amendment that where a person is sentenced to jail for contempt he may appeal. If he can not get bail, his appeal does not do him any good.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 273. Upon the appeal of any cause in equity, or of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, or of prize or no prize, a transcript of the record, as directed by law to be made, and copies of the proofs, and of such entries and papers on file as may be necessary on the hearing of the appeal, or such an abstract or statement thereof as is provided for in the next ensuing section, shall be transmitted to the appellate court: Provided, That either the court below or the appellate court may order any original document or other evidence to be sent up, in addition to the copy of the record, or in lieu of a copy of a part thereof. On such appeals no new evidence shall be received in the appellate court, except in admiralty and prize causes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following as an amendment to come in at the end of section 273 as a new section, which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 144, by adding, at the end of section 273, the following as a new section:

"In all cases wherein the court of last resort of a State has decided a State statute to be in conflict with the Constitution of the United States or any statute or treaty thereof the same may be reviewed by writ of error to the Supreme Court of the United States in the same manner as is provided for writs of error to the Supreme Court of the United States in other cases."

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment is to correct a condition with reference to the right of appeal to the Supreme Court, which has come under the attention, I think, of most lawyers who have had anything like a general practice.

In the Federal judiciary act of 1789 provision was made in regard to appeals to the Supreme Court restricting them to instances where a contention had been set up in the State courts under a Federal statute, the Constitution, or some treaty, and that contention had been unfavorably received by the United States court. It was felt in that case that the Supreme Court must enjoy jurisdiction in order to preserve the supremacy of the Federal laws. Now, as a matter of fact, it was felt at that time that the State courts, of course, would not show any particular leaning for Federal contentions, and that the restriction of appeals to negative decisions on such contentions would give the people full protection under the Federal Constitution and its laws. As a matter of fact, such have been the changes in history that State courts look upon State laws with no particular eye of favor as compared with Federal laws. In short, their effort is to impartially construe the Constitution; and it has happened, therefore, in a great number of cases that State statutes have been held unconstitutional by the State courts under the contention that they were violative of the Federal Constitution. In such instances no appeals could be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States. Now, it is true my attention has been called to this condition more especially in view of labor legislation in the respective States. I have in view two cases in my own State. In one case the State legislature endeavored to deal by prohibition with the so-called "company" or "pluck-me" store. That case went to our court of appeals, and the contention was set up that the "pluck-me" store State statute was violative of the fourteenth amendment to the Federal Constitution. That contention was sustained by our State court. No appeal could therefore be taken to the Supreme Court.

In another instance I have in mind a semimonthly pay law was held violative of the Federal Constitution by our court of appeals, and in that case, too, no appeal to the Supreme Court could be had. As a matter of fact, more recently the Supreme Court, in instances where the case could be appealed to, it has held the semimonthly pay law not to be violative of the Federal Constitution. Now, the object of this amendment is to give the State statute the same chance for its life, in its struggle for its validity, before the Supreme Court of the country that the Federal statutes may have. I may say, although I may not be able now to put my finger upon the page of the report, that the American Bar Association at one of its annual meetings made this a matter of recommendation, and suggested that such change be made. I believe those who are paying attention to the matter will find that there is no danger of unduly crowding the Supreme Court with cases, because the right of appeal is only extended to those few additional cases where State statutes have been held unconstitutional by the State courts on Federal grounds. I want to ask unanimous consent, and I ask the chairman's attention to the request, that we may go back to section 270 and consider the amendment as applicable to section 270 instead of section 273. I believe it would be more appropriate to section 270.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Maryland asks unanimous consent to return to section 270 for the purpose of offering this amendment.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, we are on this amendment now, and I do not believe we will stop in the middle of a discussion of this; but I have a suggestion to make which I think will eliminate that. When this amendment was first offered I did not raise the point of order against it, because I wanted it discussed, although I do not believe it is at all applicable to this section we have now under consideration, but in all probability we may finally agree to go back to the other section and discuss it. Now, my proposition is this, if it meets the approval of the gentleman from Maryland, to let this entire section go over until a subsequent meeting and let the committee investigate the question. I think it is of sufficient importance to let the committee from which this bill was reported investigate the question carefully before finally making any disposition of it; and in lieu of the request of the gentleman from Maryland I ask that the whole subject matter, including the section and all amendments thereto, be postponed until further consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana asks unanimous consent that the further consideration of this section and all amendments to it be postponed until some future time.

Mr. LLOYD. I think, though, it may be understood this amendment is to come after section 270 instead of 272.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. The request of the gentleman from Louisiana will include that the amendment come after section 270.

Mr. WATKINS. Yes.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Does the gentleman think it could be reached on next Wednesday?

Mr. WATKINS. Yes, sir.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, reserving the right to object, I doubt whether this is the bill where this proposition belongs.

Mr. WATKINS. That is one thing we wish to consider.

Mr. MANN. I am inclined to believe it belongs in the judiciary title and the amendment should apply to that codification which we passed a few years ago. This proposition has been floating around Congress for a great many years. I believe it has been recommended once or twice by committees of the House. Most all lawyers would be in favor of it. Nearly all lawyers are in favor of anything which adds to the delay of cases or gives greater opportunity for appeals——

Mr. BRYAN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. That is the way they live. Is the gentleman a lawyer?

Mr. BRYAN. I am.

Mr. MANN. Yes; I yield.

Mr. BRYAN. If there is anything that will permit lots of legislation, it is to have 48 States say what the Federal Constitution is without any chance of getting uniformity of decision.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I thought the gentleman was going to speak about something that is pertinent to what I am saying.

Mr. BRYAN. It is pertinent to the amendment.

Mr. MANN. Now, we did provide years ago, where a State court upheld a State statute as against a Federal provision, that it should go to a Federal court for final determination. But, in the interest of getting business ended at some time, it was not allowed that they should take appeals from the decisions of the supreme court of a State where the supreme court held the State statute invalid. What gentlemen seek to do all the time is to centralize all government at Washington. It may be a good thing. Certainly we ought to be able in the different States to have the States determine, so far as they uphold their own position, without having the Federal Government reverse the policy of the State unless it is in conflict, as held by the State courts, with the Federal statutes. This everlasting desire for appeals is what bothers me. A few years ago we created the circuit court of appeals throughout the United States in order to lessen the work being done by the Supreme Court, and for a short time the Supreme Court made progress with its calendar and commenced to get a little nearer to the end of it. But now it is going backward again. It can not dispose of as many cases each year now as are brought before the court, and we must either in some way restrict the jurisdiction of Federal courts—nisi prius courts—or else restrict the appeals which can be taken from those and State supreme courts, or we will have our Supreme Court buried with business until it is almost impossible to get justice because of delay.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will allow a brief reply, I will call his attention to the fact that the theory of the amendment restricts the additional appeals to those instances where a State statute has been held as violative of the Federal Constitution. There could not in the nature of things be very many cases like that; but even if there were, it seems to me that a citizen living in a State is entitled to know his Federal rights. And if we have to make room for those cases let us make some provision to take away the railroad cases that are now engrossing the attention of the Supreme Court. But I do not think, while I recognize the grave importance——

Mr. MANN. We have, I will say to the gentleman, taken away the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court in almost all railroad cases. Instead of expanding it we are restricting it all the time.

Mr. LEWIS of Maryland. I think that a very good movement, because other courts perhaps can give that subject proper attention. But let me mention to the gentleman a subject now that is likely to become a very serious one. The States are passing a number of these accident compensation laws. Where they are going to be contested naturally the fourteenth amendment is going to be set up against them. If the State supreme court thinks that contention against their validity is good, the power of the legislature in that State to act even in a matter of such serious character is forever destroyed. Indeed, that very circumstance happened within the State of New York within the last three or four years and ought not to happen again. I do not believe that the Congress in 1789 would have drawn the distinction it did between decisions against and decisions favorable to Federal contentions in an age like ours. And I trust that the gentleman will not make any objections which will prevent the consideration of this matter at the next meeting, as proposed by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. MANN. Of course I shall not object, so far as that is concerned. This is a new matter with our friend from Maryland, and a new matter to others watching legislation in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. LEWIS].

The question was taken, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment as a new section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

To follow section 273 as a new section:

"In all cases wherein suit is brought to test the constitutionality of any State statute, before the Federal court shall have jurisdiction on such cases such a statute must be passed upon by the highest court of the State which enacted the statute."

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against that. It clearly does not belong to that part of the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana makes a point of order against the amendment.

Mr. CULLOP. Mr. Chairman, I want to be heard on that. The same question was ruled on in the Clayton bill by Judge HULL, wherein a section was offered. The point of order was made that it was not germane at that place, but, it being a new section, it was held to be germane at any place in a bill where it might be offered, and especially where it was offered.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, in behalf of economy of time I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] withdraws the point of order, and the gentleman from Indiana is recognized.

Mr. CULLOP. Now, Mr. Chairman, I have offered this amendment to meet and overcome a very serious question which has arisen in nearly all of the States. Wherever suit has been brought to test the constitutionality of a State statute, usually they have gone to a Federal court and brought the suit first there, and then appealed to the Supreme Court of the United States, notably in the 2-cent fare statute enactments of the different States, and have delayed for years and years the settlement of that important question. Some of them that were brought three or four or five years ago have just recently been settled by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Now, it is a rule of statutory construction that the construction that the highest court of a State puts upon its statutes shall control in the Federal courts. Suits have been brought in the Federal courts ostensibly for the purpose of having the Federal court construe a State statute, but in reality to prevent the highest court of the State from construing its own statutes, having them set aside in the Federal court without first having the highest court of the State put its construction upon its own statutes. And the reason for doing so has been that if the State court upheld the statute such ruling would be controlling in the Federal court. Suits have been brought in nearly every State where 2-cent or 2½-cent fare rate statutes have been passed regulating the transportation of passengers on the railroads, not in the State courts, where the highest court of the State could have the opportunity to pass upon the constitutionality of the statute, but they have been taken to the Federal courts for that purpose. This practice has been the source of much criticism.

Now, it is nothing more than fair and right to restrict the bringing of suits to test the constitutionality of State statutes to the courts of the States which enacted them, so that the opinion of the highest court of that State could first be had upon the validity of such enactment. There has been a very great demand for some Federal statute upon this subject by the people of the different States of the Union, and I have offered this amendment, which I hope will be adopted here, because it is germane at this place, to break up the evil that has been existing in a number of the States where statutes have been passed which corporations sought to have set aside. One of the most glaring illustrations is in the State of Missouri, where the legislature of that State enacted a 2-cent fare statute. The suit was not brought in the Missouri courts to test it, but it was brought in the Federal court. And the people of that State were driven to the Federal courts and to the Supreme Court of the United States for the purpose of sustaining the statute which their legislature had passed. That suit could have been brought in the State courts of Missouri, passed upon by the highest court in Missouri, and then the decision of that court would have been taken as a standard of the test of the validity of that statute unless it violated some Federal law.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will be adopted, so that it will remedy the evil now existing in nearly every State in this Union, and require these to be first passed on by the State courts.

Mr. PETERSON. Mr. Chairman, will my colleague yield for a question?

Mr. CULLOP. With pleasure.

Mr. PETERSON. Do you not think the language of the amendment is a little unfortunate, where you say "in suits brought to contest"?

Mr. CULLOP. I do not say "contest." I said "test."

Mr. PETERSON. Well, to test; where you bring a suit to test the constitutionality of the law. Would it not be better to say "in cases where the constitutionality of the law is involved"? I am objecting only to the language.

Mr. CULLOP. Well, I think it is as broad as it is long, so far as that is concerned. The meaning is the same. Take it in the State of Indiana. Some time in the nineties they passed a bill regulating the fares on the street railways in the city of Indianapolis, which were then regarded as exorbitant.

The bondholders of that railway living outside of the State of Indiana came to the Federal court and brought a suit to test that statute, so that they could present a question of diverse citizenship. After it dragged its long, weary way for three or four or five years through the Federal courts, during all that time, until that long, weary, bitterly fought-out litigation, the railroad company was raking in its old fares, and the people were not having the remedy which their State legislature attempted to give them. Now, that suit could have been brought in a State court, equally as able and competent in every respect; but when it was passed upon by the Federal court it did not have the judgment as a precedent, as a guide, in determining the matter of the highest court in that State, but it was simply a new question, so far as the State courts of Indiana were concerned. That is true also of the Missouri statutes. It is true of every State statute which has been contested in this manner on this subject, and for this reason I want to call the attention of the committee to the fact that there has grown up a demand in nearly every State in the Union for some statute which would prevent the bringing of a suit in the first instance in a Federal court for such purpose before the State courts have had an opportunity to construe their own statutes.

Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will be adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Indiana has expired. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. CULLOP. A division, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. A division is demanded.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 5, noes 8.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 285. The Supreme Court may, at any time, in its discretion and upon such terms as it may deem just, allow an amendment of a writ of error, when there is a mistake in the teste of the writ, or a seal to the writ is wanting, or when the writ is made returnable on a day other than the day of the commencement of the term next ensuing the issue of the writ, or when the statement of the title of the action or parties thereto in the writ is defective, if the defect can be remedied by reference to the accompanying record, and in all other particulars of form: Provided, The defect has not prejudiced, and the amendment will not injure the defendant in error.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, if there is not an "m" in the word "amendment" on line 21, I would like to have one inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the missing "m" will be inserted in the word "amendment" on line 21.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 291. Whenever, on appeal or writ of error or otherwise, a case shall be reviewed and determined in the circuit court of appeals in which the decision of that court is final, or in which no appeal is taken within the time allowed by law, such case shall be remanded to the district court for further proceedings, to be there taken in pursuance of such determination.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS].

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 152, in line 1, after the word "final," strike out the words "or in which no appeal is taken within the time allowed by law."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 295. In all cases of conviction of crime, the punishment of which is death, tried before any court of the United States, the final judgment of such court against the respondent shall, upon the application of the respondent, be reexamined, reversed, or affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States upon a writ of error, under such rules and regulations as said court may prescribe. Every such writ of error shall be allowed as of right and without the requirement of any security for the prosecution of the same or for costs. Upon the allowance of every such writ of error it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to which the writ of error shall be directed to forthwith transmit to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States a certified transcript of the record in such case, and it shall be the duty of the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States to receive, file, and docket the same. Every such writ of error shall, during its pendency, operate as a stay of proceedings upon the judgment in respect of which it is sued out. Any such writ of error may be filed and docketed in said Supreme Court at any time in a term held prior to the term named in the citation, as well as at the term so named; and all such writs of error shall be advanced to a speedy hearing on motion of either party. When any such judgment shall be either reversed or affirmed, the cause shall be remanded to the court from whence it came for further proceedings in accordance with the decision of the Supreme Court, and the court to which such cause is so remanded shall have power to cause such judgment of the Supreme Court to be carried into execution. No such writ of error shall be sued out or granted unless a petition therefor shall be filed with the clerk of the court in which the trial shall have been had during the same term, or within such time, not exceeding 60 days next after the expiration of the term of the court at which the trial shall have been had, as the court may for cause allow by order entered of record.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

Page 153, line 3, strike out section 295 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 295. In all cases of conviction of crime the punishment of which is death, tried before any district court of the United States, the final judgment of such court against the respondent shall, upon the application of the respondent, be reexamined, reversed, or affirmed by the supreme court or the appropriate circuit court of appeals in accordance with the provisions of sections 128 and 238 of the Judicial Code, upon writ of error under such rules and regulations as the appellate court may prescribe. Every such writ of error shall be allowed as of right and without the requirement of any security for the prosecution of the same or for costs. Upon the allowance of every such writ of error it shall be the duty of the clerk of the court to which the writ of error shall be directed to forthwith transmit to the clerk of the Supreme Court of the United States or of the circuit court of appeals a certified transcript of the record in such case, and it shall be the duty of the clerk of such appellate court to receive, file, and docket the same. Every such writ of error shall, during its pendency, operate as a stay of proceedings upon the judgment in respect of which it is sued out. Any such writ of error may be filed and docketed in said Supreme Court and in the circuit court of appeals at any time in a term prior to the term named in the citation, as well as at the term so named, and all such writs of error shall be advanced to a speedy hearing on motion of either party. When any such judgment shall be either reversed or affirmed the cause shall be remanded to the court from whence it came for further proceedings in accordance with the decision of the appellate court, and the court to which such cause is so remanded shall have power to cause such judgment of the appellate court to be carried into execution. No such writ of error shall be sued out or granted unless a petition therefor shall be filed with the clerk of the court in which the trial shall have been had during the same term, or within such time, not exceeding 60 days next after the expiration of the term of the court at which the trial shall have been had, as the court may for cause allow by order entered of record."

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I simply wanted to ask the chairman a question. I did not quite catch the full effect of the amendment from the reading of it, and I would like to ask this question: Under the amendment what cases will go up by appeal to the circuit court of appeals and what ones to the Supreme Court of the United States? Or, perhaps, put it the other way: Will the gentleman state the difference in the practice under the amendment and as it stands in the bill?

Mr. WATKINS. There is virtually no difference, except in cases where the death penalty is inflicted—that is, a man sentenced to death may appeal to the circuit court of appeals, which is provided for by the Judicial Code of 1911, in section 128 and section 238—and it is simply to make it conform to that law which was enacted in 1911 that this amendment is offered. There is no change in the law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Under the law as it stands then, will any further appeal be permitted from the circuit court of appeals in capital cases?

Mr. WATKINS. I do not have the Judicial Code before me at this time; but I will state to the gentleman that the jurisdiction of all the courts are defined in the Judicial Code. This particular class of cases with which we are now dealing must take the course as prescribed by sections 128 and 238 of the Judicial Code.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. The reason I asked the question is because I doubt whether the amendment is in form, in case any such appeal could be taken from the circuit court of appeals to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WATKINS. Whether it is good law or bad law, it is in the codification as passed by Congress in 1911, and stands in that way. We are simply bringing that in its proper place in this bill.

Mr. MANN. I had occasion to look up this matter once in connection with the Panama proposition, and I am inclined to think that the Supreme Court still retains the power to issue a writ of error and bring a case before it whenever it sees fit to do so.

Mr. WATKINS. Doubtless that is true.

Mr. MANN. And there was not any specific right of appeal to the Supreme Court before.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not want to make a definite statement about that.

Mr. MANN. There may have been in some cases, but, as a rule, I think not.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 296. A writ of error may be taken by the United States from the district or circuit courts of appeals direct to the Supreme Court in all criminal cases in the following instances:

From a decision or judgment quashing or setting aside an indictment or any count thereof, or sustaining a demurrer thereto or to any count thereof, where such decision or judgment is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or count thereof is founded.

From a decision sustaining a motion in arrest of judgment upon a verdict or finding of guilty, for the insufficiency of the indictment or of any count thereof, where such decision is based upon the invalidity or construction of the statute upon which the indictment or count thereof is founded.

From a decision or judgment sustaining a special plea in bar when the defendant has not been put in jeopardy.

The writ of error in all such cases shall be taken within 30 days after the decision or judgment has been rendered and shall be diligently prosecuted and shall have precedence over all other cases. Pending the prosecution and determination of the writ of error in the foregoing instances the defendant shall be released upon his own recognizance: Provided, That no writ of error shall be taken by or allowed the United States in any case where there has been a verdict in favor of the defendant.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I have a committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 154, in line 14, after the word "district," strike out the words "or circuit court of appeals" and insert in lieu thereof the word "courts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 313. The bill of fees of the clerk, marshal, and attorney, and the amount paid printers and witnesses, and lawful fees for exemplifications and copies of papers necessarily obtained for use on trials in cases where by law costs are recoverable in favor of the prevailing party, shall be taxed by a judge or clerk of the court, and be included in and form a portion of a judgment or decree against the losing party. An itemized statement of all such fees and costs, together with all sums retained, allowed, or paid a referee, master, or other officer appointed by the court, shall be entered by the clerk upon the docket in which the case is entered or in such other book as the Attorney General may designate, and in such manner as he may from time to time prescribe.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I should like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana what is the occasion for the proposition that an itemized statement of all such fees, costs, and so forth, shall be entered by the clerk upon the docket in which the case is entered?

An itemized statement of cost is quite an extensive thing to enter up in every case.

Here is a memorandum on the subject by one of the ablest judges in the country, presiding over one of the busiest courts in the country:

The provision for entering in the docket or other book an "itemized statement" of fees and costs is a serious matter in a busy court. If by "itemized statement" is meant a differentiation between the amount paid and taxed for subpœnas and that for notary fees, there is a bill of costs filed every day in this court that would require a page of the docket for transcription. No such foolishness will ever be put in practice. An "itemized statement" will somehow lose what I think is its natural meaning.

I suppose that what the draftsman is after is to have on the files of the court and accessible to the public the amount of fees and costs. For that the present practice in a properly run court is sufficient, and if it is desired to translate that into a statute, the new matter in this section should read:

"An itemized statement of all such fees and costs, together with all sums retained, allowed, or paid to a referee, master, or other officer appointed by the court, shall be filed with the papers in the cause, and a summary or aggregate thereof entered by the clerk upon the docket in which the cause is entered."

Gentlemen can see that if, in addition to filing in the cause a paper showing an itemized statement, the same thing has to be entered upon the docket, it will require a great deal of labor, and it seems to me to be entirely unnecessary. I never heard of such a thing in my own practice, and I doubt whether anybody else ever has.

Mr. BRYAN. Is it not the practice in some of the State courts?

Mr. MANN. Not in any State, as far as my practice has gone. The items in a bill of costs are sometimes very numerous. What is the occasion for transcribing those onto the docket?

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman desires an answer——

Mr. MANN. That is what I am trying to get.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state the history of it. It seems from the best information I can obtain that some of the clerks are in the habit of making on sheets of paper memoranda of the itemized costs, and then putting the gross amount on some book that they have. Whether they call it a docket or not is immaterial. It has been very difficult to get at the items which made up the itemized bill of costs. So the Department of Justice, seeking to correct this evil, finally presented it in the form of a request to have these bills of costs made public by having them put in a book—you may call it a docket or by any other name, if you please, but put in a book—and let that book be open to inspection at all times, so that anybody can go to that book and see what these items of costs are. The report says:

This amendment, as stated by the commission in its report to Congress in 1906, was recommended by the accounting officers of the Department of Justice and is designed to compel a disclosure of all fees and costs charged not only in cases in which the Government is a party, but especially in cases in which private parties are litigants.

The idea is to prevent the clerk taking a piece of paper, making out an account on it, itemizing it on that paper, and condensing that itemized statement, and then putting the condensation on his book of record, but requiring him to put the itemized statement on his book, the same as a merchant does his accounts.

Mr. MANN. A merchant would not think of carrying on his ledger account or any other account an itemized statement of everything that he puts on a scratch pad.

Mr. BRYAN. He puts it somewhere. He makes a statement of each item somewhere.

Mr. MANN. They can put it in the files of the case. Of course the reason for this proposition will largely disappear when the clerks are paid fixed salaries. There was a suspicion before that clerks did not wish people to know how much the fees were. But if you put on the docket the total amount of the fees, there is no occasion for transcribing the whole bill of costs or fees into the book. As this judge says, in a busy court it amounts to something. They used to copy all the papers that were filed. That is not done any more. You do not go to the record book now to get a copy of a bill in equity or a declaration in a lawsuit. Those papers are in the files.

Mr. WATKINS. I will state to the gentleman that the reason is greater now than it was heretofore. Up to this time the clerks have been personally interested in the amount of the fees that they collected, and it was for their interest, because they got a salary based largely on the fees they earned. But the commission that codified the laws suggested the propriety of putting the clerks on a salary basis, and in connection with that they make the suggestion that the clerks' fees, which go into the United States Treasury, and which the clerks are not now so much interested in—that they make such an accounting that any person may know what the account is and whether it is correct or incorrect. It seems important now that they should keep a public book in which the accounts shall be open, and the Department of Justice is thoroughly in favor of it and are anxious that this safeguard to protect the Government shall be had.

Mr. MANN. There are people in the Department of Justice who never were inside of a court room, in my judgment, and know nothing about the practical workings of a court. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, to strike out the language in lines 14 and 19 and insert in lieu thereof what I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 162, strike out the language from lines 14 to 19, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"An itemized statement of all such fees and costs, together with all sums retained, allowed, or paid to a referee, master, or other officer appointed by the court, shall be filed with the papers in the cause, and a summary or aggregate thereof entered by the clerk on the docket in which the case is entered."

Mr. WATKINS. If the gentleman will add to that some provision by which these items may be open to the public it will be all right.

Mr. MANN. They are open to the public when placed in the files. It is a public record like any other file. A bill in equity is open to the public.

Mr. WATKINS. That is what the clerks have been doing——

Mr. MANN. No; there was no official requirement and they did not put them in the files.

Mr. WATKINS. They were not required to put them in the files, but they kept them on separate pieces of paper.

Mr. MANN. They kept a private memorandum book practically. This requires them to put the amount in the docket and an itemized statement in the files.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. The amount is on the docket, and the itemized statement is in the files.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois covers all that is necessary. If an itemized statement is placed among the papers and the files it will be subject to inspection. Even if it should become lost or mislaid and should be specifically required, there could be an order of court for another paper to be substituted. Under this amendment the general summary is to be placed on the docket. It seems to me the docket itself ought not to be burdened with an itemized statement which might require additional pages for all the items to be copied therein. I think every safeguard for the public interest is subserved by this amendment. I can see no objection to adding to it a provision that it shall be subject to inspection, but I think that is unnecessary, because, in any event, it is open to inspection by the public.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Certainly.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Does not the gentleman know that in almost every State court there is a docket kept, known as the fee docket, in which the clerk is required to enter each item charged up as a fee? That fee docket is required to be kept as a public record, open to inspection by any interested person. That is the law in my State and, as far as I know, of every other State. We keep what is known as a fee docket, containing a statement of the fees on every paper and returns which are charged up, so that when a man gets his bill of costs he can compare it with the charges made against him on the fee docket and see whether he has been overcharged.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. So he would be able here to make a comparison by this method, because the items would be on the files and he could make the comparison. I think the gentleman is correct, but I do not see the necessity of keeping a record in that way, because it would make a duplication.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. From the filing of the declaration or petition in the courts of our State the clerk puts it on the fee book, and then, when a return is made on a paper, that is entered on the docket. We have a fee system which was passed by the legislature, and so it is very easy for a practicing attorney or a party litigant to see whether he has been overcharged, whether the fees are just and correct, and whether copies in the case and all the costs that must be paid by the plaintiff or the defendant are in accordance with the judgment of the court.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is true in my State to a certain extent, but not to that extent which the gentleman from Texas states. There is a summary of the costs entered on the docket, but it is not necessary to insert every single item, no matter how small it may be.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I will state that in my State it is equivalent to a blotter kept by business men. Every transaction is noted somewhere, and it ought to be, in case of a lawsuit. Whenever a paper is filed or a return made by an officer there should be some record of the fees charged. I think the Federal courts ought to follow the State courts in that matter.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. There will be a record if this amendment is followed. Business houses of late have been modifying their rules with reference to bookkeeping and have discarded duplication as far as possible, and the purpose of this amendment is to avoid the keeping of double accounts.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 325. No person shall be imprisoned for debt in any State, on process issuing from a court of the United States, where, by the laws of such State, imprisonment for debt has been or shall be abolished. All modifications, conditions, and restrictions upon imprisonment for debt provided by the laws of any State shall be applicable to the process issuing from the courts of the United States to be executed therein; and the same course of proceedings shall be adopted therein as may be adopted in the courts of such State.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Is imprisonment for debt any more allowed in any State?

Mr. WATKINS. Imprisonment in a sense is allowed for debt in all of the States of the United States, for the failure to pay where fines are assessed.

Mr. MANN. Of course imprisonment for debt is allowed in trespass cases in a great many of the courts. This leaves it according to the courts of the States. Is imprisonment for civil debt allowed in any State now?

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I hesitate a little to answer the gentleman's question, because it just so happens in my own State there are certain extreme cases in which a man may be imprisoned for debt, but it must be a very flagrant case; and in all States, even in the District of Columbia, men are right now in jail for failure to pay alimony.

Mr. BRYAN. But that is not imprisonment for debt. That is imprisonment for contempt of court.

Mr. MANN. I do not think that is what they call imprisonment for debt. It seems to me that the time has arrived when we ought not to be dependent on the legislature of a State to determine whether we will have imprisonment for debt in the ordinary sense of civil indebtedness.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not just now recall to my mind any State in the Union in which a person incurs an indebtedness in the ordinary course of business where he can be imprisoned, unless it is in some cases where it is the clear intention upon his part to defraud his creditors and is about to permanently leave the State.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt that most of the States have some provision in reference to imprisonment in trespass cases, or in cases for fraud, and I think that is perfectly proper, but if there is no State where imprisonment for debt exists, as I had hopes there was none, in the ordinary sense, of course there would not be any harm in this section. In other words, I would like to see it amended, so that the United States, at least, should not permit an ordinary creditor to put his ordinary debtor in jail because he is unable to pay the indebtedness.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I do not think there is any danger of its applying to that class of cases.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 329. All personal property sold under any order or decree of any court of the United States shall be sold as provided in the preceding section, unless in the opinion of the court rendering such order or decree it would be best to sell it in some other manner.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment which I send to the desk and ask to have read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 167, line 24, after the word "manner," strike out the period, insert a semicolon, and add the following: "In such cases the courts may by order direct the manner of conducting the sale."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the first word. I would like to ask the gentleman in reference to the preceding section, which provides that all real estate sold under decree of the United States court shall be sold at public sale at the courthouse of the county, parish, or State in which the property, and so forth, is located; I suppose it is proper to make a sale at a Federal courthouse, is it not? It is certainly customary now to do that. I do not know just what the language of the existing statute is.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, there are some cities and counties where there are no courthouses. There may be several cities in one county and the courthouse may be located in another city.

Mr. MANN. It would be the courthouse of the county, parish, or city, and if there was no courthouse in a city it would be the county courthouse, I suppose; but apparently this is what fixed the place of sale at the courthouse of the county, when it is certainly customary now to order a sale at the Government building where the Federal court is held. I suppose there is no intention to have that changed.

Mr. BRYAN. That is the same law.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Yes.

Mr. BRYAN. Most public sales are made by the county, and the parties buying are in the habit of going to the courthouse for those sales.

Mr. MANN. But people do not go to the county courthouse to attend a sale of the Federal court. They go to the Government courthouse.

Mr. BOOHER. Does not the gentleman think that real estate ought to be sold in the county in which it is situated, even by the Federal court?

Mr. MANN. Why should it be?

Mr. BOOHER. Take a district in the State of Missouri that holds court at Springfield, for instance, with some counties 125 miles away. Would you sell the land in that county that is so far away at the courthouse in Springfield?

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that.

Mr. BOOHER. If you sell it in the county where the land is located, the ones who know the value can go there, and it will bring more money among the people who know it than among strangers.

Mr. MANN. But suppose it is sold in the city of St. Louis?

Mr. BOOHER. Then you would sell it at the courthouse door in the city of St. Louis.

Mr. MANN. At the county courthouse or the Federal building?

Mr. BOOHER. I think under this law it will be sold probably at the county courthouse or the city courthouse.

Mr. MANN. That may be the existing law; I do not know. I know I have bought real estate and got good title to it at the Federal building in Chicago, and on more than one occasion.

Mr. BOOHER. I presume the Federal court might put that construction upon it, but I think it might be amended so as to say in cities where there is a county courthouse and Government building it might be sold at the Government building; but in the country at large it ought to be sold at the county courthouse.

Mr. BRYAN. That is where the assessments are made and taxes collected.

Mr. MANN. If you should say the courthouse in the county, parish, or city in which the property is located, that might cover it.

Mr. BOOHER. Yes. If you put in county courthouse or Government building, it would be more specific. I am of the opinion that real estate should be sold in the county where it is located, and if there is no Federal courthouse in the county it should be sold at the county courthouse.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 334. No money deposited as aforesaid shall be withdrawn except by order of the judge or judges of said court, respectively, in term or in vacation, to be signed by such judge or judges and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in or on account of which it is drawn.

In every case in which the right to withdraw money so deposited has been adjudicated or is not in dispute and such money has remained so deposited for at least five years unclaimed by the person entitled thereto, it shall be the duty of the judge or judges of said court, or its successor, to cause such money to be deposited in the Treasury of the United States, in the name and to the credit of the United States: Provided, That any person or persons or any corporation or company entitled to any such money may, on petition to the court from which the money was received, or its successor, and upon notice to the United States attorney and full proof of right thereto, obtain an order of court directing the payment of such money to the claimant, and the money deposited as aforesaid shall constitute and be a permanent appropriation for payments in obedience to such orders; and this act is applicable to all money deposited in the Treasury of the United States in accordance with section 996, Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended February 19, 1897.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I do not recall just what this section 996 of the Revised Statutes as amended in 1911 covers. It makes a permanent appropriation of certain money.

Mr. WATKINS. What is the gentleman's question?

Mr. MANN. I said I did not recall just what that section was as amended.

Mr. WATKINS. Section 996 of the Revised Statutes reads that—

No money deposited as aforesaid—

Speaking where the marshals and other officers make deposits of money, where deposits are made of money and the court is regulating the manner of withdrawing moneys—

No money deposited as aforesaid shall be withdrawn except by order of the judge or judges of said courts, respectively, in term or on vacation, to be signed by such judge or judges, and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in or on account of which it is drawn.

Mr. MANN. I do not quite see the pertinency of this reference. This act is applicable to all money deposited in the Treasury of the United States in accordance with section 996 as amended. There is no provision under what the gentleman read in reference to the deposit of money. What is the act of February 19, 1897?

Mr. WATKINS. My attention has just been called to the amendment to section 996, and this amendment reads:

No money deposited as aforesaid shall be withdrawn except by the order of judge or judges of said courts, respectively, in term or on vacation, to be signed by such judge or judges, and to be entered and certified of record by the clerk; and every such order shall state the cause in or on account of which it is drawn—

And then follows—

in every case in which the right to withdraw money so deposited—

And so forth.

Mr. MANN. Well, I do not see how that provides for the deposit of any money in the Treasury.

Mr. WATKINS. This was passed March 3, 1911, this amendment to the Revised Statutes of the United States, and it is simply the existing law which is carried in the bill.

Mr. MANN. This says:

And this act is applicable to all money deposited in the Treasury of the United States in accordance with section 996.

But that does not seem to provide for the deposit of any money in the Treasury. However, I do not have any criticism of the gentleman for not knowing——

Mr. WATKINS. Whether the law is a good law or a bad law, it is the law. It was passed by Congress March 3, 1911. If the gentleman will refer to section 333 of this bill, he will note the authorization for the deposit of the moneys paid into court. Section 996 of the Revised Statutes relates to the withdrawal of the moneys authorized to be deposited in the preceding section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 340. No suit or prosecution for any penalty or forfeiture, pecuniary or otherwise, accruing under the laws of the United States, except customs revenue laws, shall be maintained, except in cases where it is otherwise specially provided, unless the same is commenced within five years from the time when the penalty or forfeiture accrued: Provided, That the person of the offender, or the property liable for such penalty or forfeiture, shall, within the same period, be found within the United States; so that the proper process therefor may be instituted and served against such person or property.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. What is the purpose of this insertion of an exception of this kind, "except customs-revenue laws"? You provide a limitation of five years for the trial of crimes arising under the customs laws.

Mr. WATKINS. They fall under another law, which regulates that section.

Mr. MANN. Where is that?

Mr. WATKINS. Section 22 of the act of June 22, 1874, making them amenable to the law, is the reason they are excepted in this particular law.

Mr. MANN. Yes; but where is the statute of limitation for suits for penalties for violation of customs and revenue laws?

Mr. WATKINS. I am now examining the commission's report on the section, and the report says:

In section 1047 of the Revised Statutes, from which this section of the bill is taken, the words "except customs-revenue laws" have been inserted, as another limitation is fixed for suits for penalties and forfeitures under those laws by section 22 of the act of June 22, 1874.

Mr. MANN. Why is not that carried in here, then?

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. It is carried in here.

Mr. MANN. That is what I want to get. I see there is carried in section 342 a limitation of three years.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 346. The commissioners for the District of Alaska shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus for the purpose of inquiring into the cause of restraint of liberty, which writs shall be made returnable before a district judge for said district; and like proceedings shall be had thereon as if the same had been granted by said judge under the general laws of the United States in such cases.

Mr. BOOHER. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee having this bill in charge why it is necessary to carry in section 346 the words "Commissioners of the District of Alaska":

The Commissioners of the District of Alaska shall have power to grant writs of habeas corpus.

We have now four United States courts up there.

Mr. WATKINS. Sometimes those courts are located far apart, and the United States commissioners no doubt are located more conveniently for the purpose of granting the writs. And then the Alaskan Code provides for that. There is no use of striking it out as I can see. There is no objection to it.

Mr. BOOHER. It is made returnable to a Federal judge, and the party has to appear before the Federal judge wherever he is.

Mr. WATKINS. Oh, well, this law applies to the Federal court.

Mr. BOOHER. Very well. I just asked the question for information.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. BOOHER. Yes.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. I think in Alaska there are places where it would be a hundred miles to the judge.

Mr. BOOHER. There is no doubt about that, but I might call attention to the fact that it is issuable by the commissioner and returnable to the judge. The party has to go there anyhow.

Mr. GREEN of Iowa. That is found absolutely necessary, because the commissioner has no power to act under the statute, and that can not be avoided.

Mr. BOOHER. Well, the explanation of the chairman is satisfactory.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 348. Application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be made to the court, or justice or judge, or in the district of Alaska to a judge or commissioner, authorized to issue the same, by petition in writing signed by the person for whose relief it is intended, setting forth the facts concerning the detention of the party restrained, in whose custody he is detained, and by virtue of what claim or authority, if known. The facts set forth in the petition shall be verified by the oath of the person making the application.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers an amendment which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 177, line 15, after the word "intended," insert "or by any person showing to the court by competent evidence that he is authorized to act for said person for whose relief the writ is intended."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the section reads:

Application for a writ of habeas corpus shall be made to the court, etc., authorized to issue the same, by petition in writing signed by the person for whose relief it is intended.

Well, the amendment I have offered is "by any person showing the court by competent evidence that he is authorized to act." Does the gentleman have any objection to that?

Mr. WATKINS. There ought to be some provision about who should make the affidavit, and if that can be done in such a way as to make it harmonious I think it would be all right.

Mr. MANN. It harmonizes all right. Anyone can file the petition under this provision who shows by competent evidence that he is authorized to act for the person for whose relief it is intended and he makes the affidavit. The person can not always sign the application for a writ of habeas corpus.

Mr. WATKINS. I do not think he ought to be required always to sign it, but I think he ought to be the one who is responsible for the affidavit.

Mr. MANN. He can not always be obtained to get the affidavit, even. At times they sue out a habeas corpus to have somebody produced who is hidden.

Mr. WATKINS. I think that is all right. I shall not interpose any objection to it.

Mr. BRYAN. They can go into court on property with an attorney. I do not see why they could not in a habeas corpus proceeding.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 357. From the decision of any court inferior to the Supreme Court, or of any justice or judge thereof, or of the Supreme Court of the Territory of Porto Rico, or the district courts of Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, or any justice or judge of said courts, upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus, or upon such writ when issued, an appeal may be taken to the Supreme Court of the United States:

1. In the case of any person alleged to be restrained of his liberty in violation of the Constitution or of any law or treaty of the United States;

2. In the case of any prisoner who, being a subject or citizen of a foreign State, and domiciled therein, is committed or confined, or in custody by or under the authority or law of the United States, or of any State, or process founded thereon, for or on account of any act done or omitted under any alleged right, title, authority, privilege, protection, or exemption, set up or claimed under the commission, order, or sanction of any foreign State or sovereignty, the validity and effect whereof depend upon the law of nations, or under color thereof.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MANN. I would like to ask the gentleman from Louisiana whether he recalls, in preparing this bill, that there was taken into consideration the Panama Canal act and its provisions with reference to appeals from the courts on the Panama Canal Zone?

Mr. WATKINS. I can not state that there was in every particular, because the various organic acts providing for the government, and so forth, of the Territories and insular possessions were left to remain intact; but we have carried into this bill that part of the Panama Canal act dealing with extradition.

Mr. MANN. I am not sure whether some such provision ought to be in here or not. It is desirable, if it belongs here, to have it here. I am calling the gentleman's attention to it, so that if he has opportunity it may be looked up.

Mr. WATKINS. I thank the gentleman for doing so.

Mr. MANN. That is quite likely; but I have had a good deal to do with Panama Canal legislation, and it has occurred to me.

Mr. WATKINS. Then I will move to go back and find out about that, if it is necessary.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 358. From the decision of any district court of the United States or of any judge of the circuit court of appeals or district court, or the district courts of Alaska, Hawaii, or Porto Rico, or any judge of said courts, upon an application for a writ of habeas corpus, or upon such writ when issued, an appeal may be taken to the circuit court of appeals in all cases, except as provided in the last preceding section, and a decision of such circuit court of appeals shall be final, excepting that in every such case the circuit court of appeals at any time may certify to the Supreme Court of the United States any question or proposition of law concerning which it desires the instruction of that court for its proper decision. And thereupon the Supreme Court may either give its instruction on the questions and propositions certified to it, which shall be binding upon the circuit court of appeals in such case, or it may require that the whole record and cause may be sent up to it for its consideration, and thereupon shall decide the whole matter in controversy in the same manner as if it had been brought there for review by writ of error or appeal. And excepting that it shall be competent for the Supreme Court in any case to require by certiorari or otherwise any decision of the circuit court of appeals to be certified to the Supreme Court for its review and determination with the same power and authority in the case as if it had been carried by appeal to the Supreme Court.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, the same statement that was made with reference to section 357 I also make with reference to section 358. I will ask permission, also, to go back to that for a similar purpose. I will reserve that right at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 360. Pending the proceedings on appeal in the cases mentioned in the three preceding sections, and until final judgment therein, and after final judgment of discharge, any proceeding against the person so imprisoned or confined or restrained of his liberty in any State court, or by or under the authority of any State, for any matter so heard and determined, or in process of being heard and determined under such writ of habeas corpus, shall be deemed null and void: Provided, That in any case where the petitioner is restrained of his liberty in pursuance of any final judgment or sentence of a State court, no such appeal shall be had or allowed after six months from the date of such judgment or sentence; but where it is claimed that such judgment or sentence is in excess of the punishment authorized by law, such period of six months shall not commence until the prisoner has performed so much of the judgment or served out so much of the sentence as it was within the power of the court to impose.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the chairman of the committee if he does not think he ought to move to rise, because there is only one member of the minority here, and it is wrong to take advantage of them and undertake to pass legislation in the absence of all the members of the minority. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. I want to call the gentleman's attention to the fact that there are some Progressives here.

Mr. MANN. I call attention to the fact that the statement of the gentleman from Connecticut is not true. He knew it was not true, although he himself has just come into the House.

Mr. BRYAN. There are two Progressive members here.

Mr. DONOVAN. I said "members of the minority party." Mr. Chairman, I will withdraw my observation.

Mr. MANN. There are a number of gentlemen here on this side who were here before the gentleman from Connecticut came in. The gentleman from Connecticut is here so little that he does not know the Members of the House from the employees. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOVAN. There are so few here to know. That is the reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. They are not added to by the presence of the gentleman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 361. From a final decision by a court of the United States in a proceeding in habeas corpus where the detention complained of is by virtue of process issued out of a State court no appeal to the Supreme Court shall be allowed unless the United States court by which the final decision was rendered or a justice of the Supreme Court shall be of opinion that there exists probable cause for an appeal, in which event, on allowing the same, the said court or justice shall certify that there is probable cause for such allowance.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I would like to call the attention of the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. WATKINS] to the fact that this has been a rather warm day and it is now 5 o'clock. We have worked very hard and we have been very diligent to-day.

Mr. GARNER. How much of this bill is left? How many sections?

Mr. MANN. Only a few. I think we are on page 183, and there are about 198 pages.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the gentleman from Illinois ought to object to continuing in session until 6 o'clock. We are very anxious to get this bill finished, so that we can get at Calendar Wednesday and consider some important bills that are on that calendar.

Mr. MANN. What is the gentleman from Washington four flushing for?

Mr. BRYAN. The gentleman from Illinois is five flushing. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The gentleman from Washington, only a few minutes ago, was appealing to me to have the House quit.

Mr. BRYAN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, this is a new kind of a game, and I want to get into it. This is a "four flush" and a "five flush." Now, what does a "five flush" do? In my country a "five flush" is a pretty good hand.

Mr. MANN. That is what I am holding. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. I am not acquainted with these terms; otherwise I would not have used it.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman insists upon it, that there is no quorum present.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. RUSSELL, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 15578) to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary, and had come to no resolution thereon.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. WATKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 4 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, June 11, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting estimates of appropriations for the acquisition of sites for public buildings at Chariton, Iowa; Farmville, Va.; and Mount Carmel, Ill. (H. Doc. No. 1026); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

2. A letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, submitting item of amendment to the sundry civil appropriation bill for the removal of the wharf of the quarantine station at Honolulu, Hawaii, and its reerection (H. Doc. No. 1027); to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

3. A letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting the ninth annual report of the American National Red Cross, showing receipts and expenditures during the period January 1, 1913, to December 31, 1913 (H. Doc. No. 1028); to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce and ordered to be printed.

4. A letter from the Acting Secretary of War, transmitting with a letter from the Chief of Engineers reports on preliminary examination and survey of Fig Island, or Screven Ferry Cut, connecting the forks of the Savannah River, at Savannah, Ga. (H. Doc. No. 1029); to the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and ordered to be printed with illustrations.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES ON PRIVATE BILLS AND RESOLUTIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XIII, private bills and resolutions were severally reported from committees, delivered to the Clerk, and referred to the Committee of the Whole House, as follows:

Mr. HAYDEN, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 10765) granting a patent to George N. Van Leuven for the northeast quarter of section 18, township 17 N., R. 19 E., Black Hills meridian, S. Dak., reported the same with amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 805), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. RAKER, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 1528) for the relief of T. A. Roseberry, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 803), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. GARD, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 15705) providing for the retirement of Col. David L. Brainard, Quartermaster Corps, United States Army, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 804), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. LOBECK, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 14699) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of Guy C. Pierce, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 801), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

Mr. UNDERHILL, from the Committee on War Claims, to which was referred the bill (H. R. 13338) authorizing payment for damage to township roads by United States troops while encamped at Camp Meade during the War with Spain, reported the same without amendment, accompanied by a report (No. 802), which said bill and report were referred to the Private Calendar.

CHANGE OF REFERENCE.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXII, the Committee on Pensions was discharged from the consideration of the bill (H. R. 10920) granting an increase of pension to Stringer White, and the same was referred to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

PUBLIC BILLS, RESOLUTIONS, AND MEMORIALS.

Under clause 3 of Rule XXII, bills, resolutions, and memorials were introduced and severally referred as follows:

By Mr. HARRIS: A bill (H. R. 17168) to authorize the North Alabama Traction Co., its successors and assigns, to construct, maintain, and operate a bridge across the Tennessee River at Decatur, Ala.; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. GREEN of Iowa: A bill (H. R. 17169) to discontinue service on rural routes on Christmas Day; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. HAWLEY: Petition of sundry citizens of the State of Oregon, favoring 1-cent letter postage; to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

By Mr. HOWELL: Petition of Murdock Grocery Co., John Rigby & Son, Western Cooperative Association, and 49 other merchants and business houses of Salt Lake City, Utah, in favor of House bill 13305, styled the Stevens bill; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petitions from R. H. Bowen, L. E. Morris, and others, of Ogden, Utah, in favor of national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. MOON: Papers to accompany bill for the relief of Elijah N. Cronan: to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. J. I. NOLAN: Protest of M. J. Leonard, San Francisco, Cal., and 32 other citizens of California, against the passage of the Hobson nation-wide prohibition resolution; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, protest of Herman H. Henning, San Francisco, Cal., and 44 other citizens of San Francisco, against the passage of the Hobson nation-wide prohibition resolution; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. O'LEARY: Petition of Herman Disch and other citizens of the second congressional district of New York, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. PATTEN of New York: Petitions of citizens of New York, against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. RAKER: Letters from Grace B. Reid and J. W. Wallace, of Long Beach, Cal., favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, letter from Chamber of Commerce, San Francisco, Cal., favoring an appropriation of $375,000 for the acquisition of a consular site in Shanghai, China; to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

By Mr. ROBERTS of Nevada: Petitions of the members of Reno Central Trade and Labor Council, representing the unions of Washoe County, Nev., and sundry citizens of Carson City and Virginia City, Nev., protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. J. M. C. SMITH: Papers to accompany H. R. 16984, providing pension for Lois Finney; to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

By Mr. SPARKMAN: Petition of 570 citizens of the first congressional district of Florida, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. STEPHENS of California: Petition of the Council of the City of Richmond, Cal., favoring Senate bill 3677, granting right of way to construct bridge across San Francisco Bay; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

By Mr. TALCOTT of New York: Petition of the New York State Jewelers' Association, favoring Owen-Goeke bill, to eliminate time guarantees on gold-filled watches; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

Also, petition of citizens of Utica and Ilion and voters of the thirty-third congressional district of the State of New York, protesting against national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

Also, petitions of Vernon Town Sunday School Association, members of the First Presbyterian Church of Vernon, and the Presbytery of Utica, all in the State of New York, favoring national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

By Mr. WILLIS: Petitions of Anna W. Sanderson and 59 other citizens of Delaware, Ohio; sundry citizens of St. Paris, Ohio; and R. H. Hampshire and 33 other citizens of Delaware, Ohio, all in favor of the adoption of House resolution 168, relative to national prohibition; to the Committee on Rules.

SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 11, 1914.

(Continuation of the legislative day of Friday, June 5, 1914.)

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m. on the expiration of the recess.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The Senate resumes the consideration of House bill 14385, which is the unfinished business.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SMITH of Georgia. The pending question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee as amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee as amended.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, I raise the point of no quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from New Jersey suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Goff	Nelson	Smith, S. C.
Borah	Gronna	Norris	Smoot
Brady	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Sterling
Brandegee	Hollis	Overman	Sutherland
Bristow	James	Page	Swanson
Bryan	Johnson	Perkins	Thompson
Burleigh	Jones	Pittman	Thornton
Burton	Kenyon	Reed	Tillman
Carroll	Kern	Root	Townsend
Chamberlain	La Follette	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Chilton	Lane	Shafroth	Warren
Clapp	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	West
Colt	Lewis	Sherman	White
Crawford	McCumber	Shively	Williams
Culberson	McLean	Simmons	Works
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Smith, Ariz.
Dillingham	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ga.
Fletcher	Myers	Smith, Md.

Mr. CHILTON. I wish to announce for the day that the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] is necessarily absent, and that he is paired with me.

Mr. MYERS. I announce that my colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily detained from the Chamber on official business.

Mr. KERN. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE] and the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], both of whom are paired. This announcement will stand for the day.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Sixty-eight Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. BRANDEGEE obtained the floor.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Connecticut yield to me for a moment?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. On yesterday during the remarks of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] and during a colloquy between the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from Iowa I stated to the Senator from Mississippi, on page 10166 of the RECORD:

> Mr. SUTHERLAND. Suppose the Senator from Mississippi had a lawsuit pending before a court. Of course the opinion of the Senator's lawyer that he did not have a good case, or his opinion that he had a doubtful case, would not be admissible, but would the Senator think it would tend to bring about a decision in his favor if his lawyer said he did not have any case or expressed doubt about it and that opinion got to the judge and the jury?

To this the Senator from Mississippi replied:

> Mr. WILLIAMS. That is again a different proposition. If in that case my lawyer proved untrue to me and let the jury and the judge know, or if my lawyer selected a judge who agreed with him and did not agree with me, his client, of course that would weaken the case very much indeed, probably lose it.

Then, I am reported as having said:

> Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is what I think the American people will do; they will change lawyers in this matter.

I understood the Senator from Mississippi to say that in the event supposed he would change lawyers, and it was in view of that statement which I understood the Senator from Mississippi to make that I said:

> That is what I think the American people will do; they will change lawyers in this matter.

As it reads in the RECORD it appears as though I had said that in response to the statement of the Senator from Mississippi, that he would probably lose the case. I did not intend to suggest anything of that sort. I do not think the American people will lose their case before any fair arbitration tribunal which may be organized; but, on the contrary, I think they will win the case. However, I think before we get through with this business the American people will change the officials who are now representing them in the matter.

Mr. DU PONT. Mr. President, I desire to state that I was necessarily absent yesterday when the vote was taken on the Simmons amendment and that had I been present I should have voted "nay."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, during my remarks I shall allude to some documents which I will not quote in full, but will insert in the RECORD, with the consent of the Senate, and I desire to proceed without interruption, if I may be allowed to do so.

Mr. President, the so-called Panama Canal act, being H. R. 21969, Sixty-second Congress, second session, which was approved August 24, 1912, passed the House of Representatives on May 23, 1912. It was reported by me as chairman of the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals on the 12th day of June, 1912.

On the 18th day of May, while the bill was under consideration in the House, Mr. DOREMUS offered an amendment, which appears on page 6770 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session. It proposed to strike out section 5 of the bill as it had been reported from the House committee and to substitute in lieu thereof a section containing the following provision, to wit:

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Five days later, to wit, on the 23d day of May, 1912, as appears on page 7019 of the RECORD, this Doremus amendment exempting our vessels engaged in the coastwise trade from the payment of tolls was adopted by a vote of 147 yeas to 128 nays. A majority of all the Democrats who voted voted against this amendment. Seventy-one Democrats voted for it and 91 Democrats voted against it.

On June 25, 1912, about a month after a majority of the Democrats voting in the House had voted against this amendment, the Democratic national convention met in Baltimore. At this time, and until after the adjournment of the Democratic convention, this Panama Canal bill had not been taken up for consideration by the Senate.

On July 2, 1912, the day of the adjournment of the Democratic national convention, 11 days before this bill had been taken up at all for consideration by the Senate, the convention adopted its platform of principles. Among other declarations it stated—

We favor the exemption from tolls of American ships engaged in coastwise trade passing through the Panama Canal.

That platform further declared—

our platform is one of principles which we believe to be essential to our national welfare. Our pledges are made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign, and we invite the cooperation of all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country.

These "principles" declared to be "essential to our national welfare," these "pledges made to be kept when in office, as well as relied upon during the campaign," were reported to the convention by the junior Senator from Indiana, the majority leader of the Senate, and received the enthusiastic and unanimous approval of the convention. And why should they not? They were deemed so vital and fundamental that the platform proceeded to extend a courteous invitation, not to say an appeal, to "all citizens, regardless of party, who believe in maintaining unimpaired the institutions and traditions of our country," to cooperate.

It thus appears that 11 days before the Senate had begun the consideration of the bill, every Democratic Senator had been bound by the platform declaration of his party to the exemption from tolls of American vessels engaged in coastwise trade. The Democratic Party was about to enter upon the nation-wide presidential campaign, and had just formulated and unanimously adopted its platform defining the issues, and forthwith every Democratic Senator, unless he was prepared to repudiate his platform upon the threshold of the campaign, was estopped from exercising any judgment, reason, or discretion in the consideration of this grave question of national policy and national good faith.

On August 7, 1912, as appears on page 10396 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session, the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] offered an amendment to strike out from the bill this provision exempting our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls, and not a single Democrat voted for it. This shows how effectually the platform declaration in favor of this exemption bound Democratic Senators.

As heretofore stated, the RECORD shows that a month prior to the meeting of the Democratic convention the Democrats in the National House of Representatives had voted 91 to 71 against this specific exemption. Of course the Democratic national convention had given no consideration whatever to this important question. The matter was not even alluded to on the floor. No evidence was taken, nor was any discussion had. There was no debate or argument of any kind in reference to the question. The platform declaration in favor of this exemption was interjected toward the end of the platform, between a denunciation of bounties and subsidies from the Public Treasury and a conventional approval of pure food and quarantine. The present Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan, who was the chief architect of both the platform and the candidate who until after the election stood upon it, as soon as he had recovered from his dazed condition and freed from the anesthetic, began to appreciate the effect of the operation to which he had been subjected—I will not say "the joker" which had been slipped over on him—forthwith denounced his own work as self-contradictory, absurd, and destructive of fundamental and historic Democratic doctrine.

Can any one explain why the Democratic convention, equally free from the slightest knowledge of either the canal question or the treaty obligations involved in it, flatly reversed the record made by its own party within a month in the House of Representatives and bound and gagged its party in this Senate in advance of any consideration whatever of the bill by this body? Did this excited and worn body of political delegates think that they were better qualified to investigate with knowledge and to determine in a judicial frame of mind these complicated and weighty questions than was the Congress of the United States? How many of those delegates had ever even heard of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? How many of those who had heard of it had ever read it? How many of them knew of the evidence before the committees of each branch of the Congress?

The Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who presided over the convention, has stated on this floor that this platform provision was adopted for the purpose of "driving this exemption through this Senate." He has violated no confidence in making that charge. It was perfectly patent and well understood at the time. The agents of the ship-subsidy hunters flocked about that convention like a cloud of bats. Their swift, silent circlings in the shadows were not visible. Their leathery wings were clad in silence, but carried them into the secret corners and centers of power. They operated in the inner circle where the mighty sat. They knew exactly what they wanted and they got it, while the mass of the delegates was allowed to refresh itself with the various amusements provided for such occasions.

The Senator from Kentucky further charged that the convention did not even know that a majority of the Democrats voting in the House had voted against the exemption. I have no doubt that was true; and, if so, it shows the ignorance of the membership of that convention upon the entire question.

The convention, having thus reversed the House and throttled the Senate, is now in turn reversed and repudiated by its former master and its candidate for the Presidency, and, indeed, if the public prints are to be credited, the great majority of the delegates themselves have reported to the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] that they take great pleasure in reversing and repudiating themselves and their own solemn platform declaration. Was there ever such a record of blundering and tergiversation in the history of political acrobatics since government by parties began?

The Democratic convention adjourned on July 2, after having adopted its platform of fundamental Democratic principles, and on July 13, 1912, as appears on page 8990 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that session of Congress, the Senate voted to proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal bill. It thereby became the unfinished business of the Senate, and so continued until its passage by the Senate on August 9, 1912, when the bill as amended by the Senate was passed.

The conference report on the disagreeing action of the two Houses, including the exemption which the bill now under consideration proposes to repeal, was agreed to on August 16, 1912.

On July 13, 1912, being the same day upon which the Senate voted to proceed to the consideration of the Panama Canal bill, I put into the RECORD a communication addressed to me as the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, from the then Secretary of State, Mr. P. C. Knox, which communication was dated July 12, 1912. This letter called attention to a communication dated July 8, 1912, which had just been received from the British chargé d'affaires in relation to various proposals for exempting American shipping from the payment of tolls on vessels passing through the Panama Canal. This letter from Mr. Knox gave a résumé of the communication from the British chargé. It appears on page 8990 of the RECORD, Sixty-second Congress, Second session. Secretary Knox stated in this communication that the communication stated that—

With respect to the proposal that exemption shall be given to vessels engaged in the coastwise trade, the communication states that it may be that no objection could be taken if the trade should be so regulated as to make it certain that only bona fide coastwise traffic, which is reserved for American vessels, would be benefited by this exemption; but that it appears to His Britannic Majesty's Government that it would be impossible to frame regulations which would prevent the exemption from resulting in a preference to American shipping and consequently in an infraction of the treaty.

The Senate was therefore put upon notice upon the very threshold of the consideration of this legislation, that it would be impossible, in the opinion of the British Government, to prevent the exemption from resulting in an infraction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. President, in the period of more than two months during which the bill was before the Senate in 1912 I implored the Senate time and again not to commit the monumental folly of opening this canal upon a discriminatory basis. I had voted against this exemption in the committee of which at that time I was the chairman. I believed this attempt to adopt a policy of favoritism to a special interest was wrong in principle, a false economic policy, without justification or excuse, uncalled for, unwise, and not needed by the special interest sought to be aided. I felt also that it was in violation of our national treaty obligations. Such additional information as I have obtained since that time and such study and reflection as I have been able to devote to the subject have confirmed me in both these opinions.

On July 18, 1912, at page 9222 of the RECORD of that session, I said:

Of course to those who want to bestow the right of free passage through the canal upon American ships, either those engaged exclusively in the coastwise trade or also those engaged in the foreign trade, the question involved in the treaties is essential. While I have views about the treaties, those views do not enter into the determination of the question with me, because I do not want to confer free passage upon American ships of any kind. I have never had that in mind, and I think the canal commission has never had it in mind, as will appear in the testimony of Col. Goethals given before various committees, both on the Isthmus and here in Washington. They have always based their estimates of the receipts of the canal upon the theory that we were to charge every vessel that went through there what was stated under the treaty to be a just and reasonable price for the work done. So that while I have views about the treaties, they are merely academic questions with me, so far as my vote is concerned.

I take the view of this canal that it is a great undertaking of an international character, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty providing that it should be the joint project of Great Britain and the United States, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty eliminating Great Britain as a joint partner in the enterprise and giving us exclusive jurisdiction of the control of the canal. I regard it—it being, of course, admittedly the greatest work of human hands in any age of the world's history—as having, so to speak, moved the Straits of Magellan approximately 4,000 miles to the northward.

It seems to me that the saving to the coastwise, the port-to-port trade of this country, conducted by American vessels, to which by this expenditure of $400,000,000, together with its maintenance and armament and defense forever, the canal has been dedicated, a saving of 8,000 miles of travel and all the expense of fuel and maintenance and pay of crew involved in that shortening of time, is a sufficient favor to have been conferred by the General Government upon this particular interest, which already has the additional favor of an absolute monopoly in the coastwise trade.

When I stated as above, that while I had views about the treaties, they were merely academic questions with me, so far as my vote was concerned, of course I meant that inasmuch as I was opposed to exempting our vessels in the coastwise trade passing through the canal from tolls on economic grounds, that it was not necessary in the determination of my vote to consider the question of the treaty at all. The question as to whether we are prohibited by the treaty from exempting our vessels in the coastwise trade becomes material only when we propose to exempt them.

Subsequently, in the running debate during the passage of this Panama bill, I stated that it was my opinion, and I thought the opinion of most people whom I had heard discuss it, that all vessels ought to be charged, and I said:

The object of this legislation was to open the canal, start it running, charge all vessels alike, so much per ton, and, after a few years, basing action upon the experience of what will then have been the past, and what is now the prognostication for the future, have some firm facts under our feet upon which to stand and base our future course.

Again I said:

So I, from the beginning, have been in favor and still am in favor of making that canal as free of access to every vessel in the world as it may be. I am in favor of treating it as a great arm of the sea. I am in favor of giving it its broadest international significance, of administering it in a way not only to promote the commerce of the whole world and to induce more frequent coming to both our coasts by not only our own commerce but the whole world, but to administer it in a way, so far as possible, to secure the good will of the whole world and to avoid any international complications or animosities. I think that will be done if we shall proceed as I have indicated.

Later on I spoke as follows:

Mr. President, as I was saying some time ago, in view of these contending theories, in view of these differences of opinion about the treaties, in view of the fact that we can have no positive knowledge in advance of what is going to happen in the canal after it is open for business and business has gone on for a year or two, it seems to me the most sensible thing to do, the thing that certainly we could make no mistake about and never could be blamed for doing, would be to open the canal to all vessels that want to go through it and charge them all a just and reasonable price for the service we render to them in putting them through.

After operating the canal a year or two years and figuring up the amount of tolls received from the vessels, with some experience as to whether or not we might have to reduce the tolls to get the business as against our competitor, the Suez Canal, we would be in a better position to judge as to whether it was necessary to attempt to give—even if we could do so under the treaties—free tolls to American shipping or free tolls to American vessels engaged in the foreign trade, which, if we can give free tolls, need the free tolls and the help much more than the domestic shipping, which already has a monopoly of the market, secure from competition with foreigners, and is fairly prosperous at the present time.

On page 9232 of the RECORD of July 18, 1912, I put into the RECORD a quotation from page 26 of the hearings before the Senate Committee on Interoceanic Canals, being a part of the testimony of Dr. Emory R. Johnson, the President's special commissioner, who had made an exhaustive study of every question relating to the probable traffic through the canal, after access to all available statistics and information in relation to the movement of ships, and the experience and operation of all other canals of the world, with a view of advising the President and Congress what system of ship measurement should be adopted and what tolls should be imposed to secure the greatest trade and to make the canal as useful and profitable as possible. Dr. Johnson stated, among many other things:

The Panama Canal is a world highway; and certainly the use of that world highway by the shipping of other people than those of the United States should be charged for in proportion to the service rendered by the canal. When we come to American shipping there were two general problems involved. The canal will be the most expensive work that we have ever put through. The time has come, in my judgment, when we can not wisely continue indefinitely to finance such great public works as the Panama Canal out of the general budget, if revenues can be secured without limiting the usefulness of such a public work and without burdening the commerce that is benefited.

As I said in my introductory remarks, I do not believe a toll of 5 or 6 per cent of the freight rate will be burdensome or that it will restrict the use of the canal. It will be wise to adopt and adhere to business principles in our canal toll policy.

On August 6, 1912, at page 10296 of the RECORD, the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] offered an amendment proposing to strike from the bill the provision that—

No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

Upon this proposed amendment I stated:

Mr. President, of course that brings up the whole question whether coastwise trade shall be exempt from toll charges or not. That has been discussed a good deal by Senators in their general speeches on the bill.

I do not intend to take up more than one minute of the Senate's time.

I want to state that from the beginning I have been, and am now, in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON]. I do not see any reason why a vessel engaged in the coastwise trade of this country that wants to get from the Atlantic to the Pacific Ocean, or the reverse, should have any right to come to that canal and say to the United States, which has already paid $400,000,000 for the construction of the canal: "Here, get to work. Burn up the coal you have bought with Treasury funds; maintain your operating force; transport me; not only give me the use of the waterway which you have provided at this enormous expense, as you would in the case of a harbor, but pay the expenses of transporting my vessel across the continent, and also insure her against any accident"—for, as the Senators who have read the bill know, it provides that the vessel must absolutely put itself in the hands of the operating force of the United States.

If any accident happens to it or damage results to it, the United States is responsible in damages for that vessel. I understand the claims that Senators make who believe the other way, but to me there is no moral claim whatever. Any shipping engaged in our coastwise trade, which already has a monopoly in the business, has bound the Government not only to spend the money collected in taxes from all the people in a special service to it, but also to guarantee it and insure it against damage if a vessel is injured. I am heartily in sympathy with the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Afterwards, replying to an inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, I stated:

I will say that I do not consider this Panama Canal to be at all on a parity with our inland waterways. I see no analogy whatever between them but the fact that they are both waterways upon which ships sail. I do not regard it as a part of our coast line, as some Senators do. Two foreign countries intervene between our country and the canal. To my mind it is no more a part of our coast line than the Straits of Magellan would be. It is simply a question of degree as to the distance.

I continued:

The sole question with me is with what moral force does the appeal come to the Congress of the United States as representatives of our States here and the people from a private shipowner, who already has a monopoly of our coastwise trade, to appear from the Atlantic or Pacific Ocean and signal to the operatives of the canal upon which we have spent $400,000,000, the interest charge of which is some $11,000,000, the annual maintenance and operation of which is two and a half or three million dollars—with what right in equity does that man say to us: "You have saved me some 8,000 miles of travel around the Straits of Magellan, and you allow me to sail over this water as you would a harbor, but in addition to that I demand that you shall keep it equipped, that you shall go into the market and buy coal, that you shall carry it down there and burn it in running the machinery for my peculiar benefit, and I will keep the tolls, the amount of money which the service is worth to me."

Again I stated:

We had for years a Panama railroad down there, and it did, as far as it could, the same business that this canal is going to do, only the cargoes of ships had to be transferred from the ship to the railroad. We never put the cargoes of the ships through free on the railroad. On the contrary, we charged them for the service performed.

I stated further:

I have said upon a previous occasion that I do not think we can do it under the treaty. I am frank to say so. But, irrespective of the treaty, I do not think the proposition has any intrinsic merits of its own. If I were certain that we had the right to do it under the treaty, I should still be in favor of charging the ships for the people's money that we have burned up in putting them through. I think, even if I were willing to grant a ship subsidy, which this is to an extent, I would want it impartially distributed among our ships. If I were going to subsidize our coastwise trade, I should want a law so that any vessel in our coastwise trade could get its share; but if this be a subsidy, it is a subsidy which discriminates between that portion of our coastwise trade which goes through the Panama Canal and all the rest of it, and says that those vessels which go through the Panama Canal shall be subsidized and those which do not shall not.

Again I stated:

I never should have raised any treaty question at all, with the view that I entertain upon the subject. The fact that we had a note of a diplomatic character from Great Britain upon this question is absolutely immaterial and irrelevant to me, because, as I said, if Great Britain had never written such a note I would not be in favor of presenting this subsidy to these vessels.

There is another thing about this matter. I know we can have no trouble if we start in and charge every vessel for which we perform this special service. We can work on that theory for a year or two. If then Congress wants to remit the tolls, or is satisfied that it can lawfully give a preference to our domestic shipping, it can do it easily; but if it starts with free tolls, and it is desirable to put tolls on, it never will be possible to do it, in my opinion.

There is another thing I will say in passing. If it shall be the policy of Congress to grant free tolls to its ships in the coastwise trade, which have the monopoly of the market, I think it much more deserving to grant subsidies or free tolls to our shipping in the foreign trade, which has been almost wiped from the ocean, while our coastwise trade is profitable. I certainly would not permit that discrimination as between our two classes of shipping.

Later on, in a colloquy with the Senator from Massachusetts, I stated:

Article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty not only provides that it shall be on terms of entire equality as to tolls, but provides that—

"There shall be no discrimination against any nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

Now, it seems to me that if we are bound by that treaty, if the treaty applies to us, it is a discrimination for us to attempt to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls in this sense: A British vessel, from Liverpool, via the canal to San Francisco, has to pay the tolls, while an American vessel, from San Francisco to New York, going via the canal, does not have to pay any tolls. If Great Britain has a market in San Francisco, we are able to have just that much preference in the retail prices or the wholesale prices there by the fact that our vessels go through the canal free, while theirs are charged, and it might result, if the margin was close enough, in transferring the trade from old England to New England.

Mr. President, so unalterably opposed was I to the discrimination in favor of American ships using the canal as against those of other nations that as has been seen from what I have quoted from the RECORD, I voted in favor of the amendment offered by the Senator from Ohio to strike from the bill that provision which exempted our vessels in the coastwise trade passing through the canal from the payment of tolls, and later on, as a member of the managers of the conference on the part of the Senate on the disagreeing action between the two Houses on the Panama Canal bill, I declined to sign the conference report, as did also Representative STEVENS of Minnesota, one of the managers on the part of the House. When the conference report was presented to the Senate, without my signature, I stated:

The country will be better off, in my judgment, if this conference report should not be accepted, but either recommitted or rejected. What would be quite sufficient to provide for all that we started to provide for in the opening and operation of this canal would be accomplished by a short resolution, which I send to the desk and ask the secretary to read.

This resolution was read by the secretary and appears on page 11062 of the RECORD, under date of August 16, 1912. The resolution was as follows:

Resolved, etc., That until Congress shall otherwise provide, the President is authorized, as the progress of work on the Panama Canal may seem to justify, to proceed with the organization and training of a competent force to man the locks and operate said canal when completed and ready to be opened for use and operation.

The President is also hereby authorized to establish facilities for the repair and supply of our own Government's vessels and such others as may use the canal, and to install wireless telegraphy, making such agreements with private wireless telegraph companies as may be necessary to secure freedom from interference, the cost of any of which may be paid from appropriations either for the construction or the maintenance and operation of the canal.

The President is further authorized to give public notice, by Executive order or proclamation, that the tolls to be charged vessels for passage through the Panama Canal shall not exceed $1.25 per ton, net registry measurement, or the equivalent thereof.

I then stated:

The only haste about this legislation or any of it was that involved in creating an operating force from the present skilled constructing force so that the services of the men engaged upon the work there now and familiar with it could be continued when the canal is opened and that they should not leave the Isthmus and the zone.

I stated further:

The only other feature that required immediate attention was the notification to the commercial world and those contemplating the construction of great ships, the completion of which will take about two years, that the tolls to be charged should not be beyond a certain sum, and upon that basis they could go ahead with their shipbuilding. The President in this resolution is authorized to notify them that the tolls shall not in any event be over a dollar and a quarter a ton, and then if it was anything less it would be to their advantage. Everybody would be safe. The canal could be completed, opened, and operated, and the community would be notified of the tolls. That is everything that was proposed to be contemplated in this legislation. The question of the revision of the courts down there and such minor questions can be determined at any time. In the meantime an investigation should be made of this whole subject of water and rail transportation, and justice could be done the subject by the Congress of the United States.

On August 16, 1912, the conference report by which this unfortunate legislation was enacted by Congress was agreed to by a vote of 48 to 18. Eighteen Senators on a yea-and-nay vote, as appears on page 11065 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD of that date, myself among the number, voted against the adoption of this conference report.

I will say there that I am not sure but that I was paired with the Senator from New York [Mr. O'GORMAN] against the bill. I was either paired against it or voted against it.

From what I have already said it is evident that I protested at the time this legislation was enacted to the best of my ability, over and over again, against its passage. I called attention to its economic folly, to its questionable legality, and to the international friction which it would probably engender. I prophesied the animosities which it would cause. I begged the Senate not to lift the lid of this Pandora's box of troubles, but all in vain. I gave warning that the path of exemption, discrimination, and favoritism was sown with dragons' teeth, both at home and abroad, but to no avail. Instead of confining itself to a bona fide disinterested attempt to ascertain the wisest economic policy and the true meaning and intent of our treaty obligations, Congress allowed itself to be overpersuaded by the pressure of the shipowners for special favors, by the importunities of commercial bodies in various sections of the country in their attempt to obtain unfair advantages from the use of the canal over other sections of the country, by the appeal to the hostility which exists in various quarters against the transcontinental railroads, and by the fact that the national convention of the Democratic Party was entrapped into a declaration upon this complicated subject upon which it was utterly ignorant. So much for the history of this legislation in the Sixty-second Congress.

On the 24th day of August, 1912, the day upon which this troublous bill was approved, Mr. SIMS of Tennessee, a Democrat in the House of Representatives, introduced in the House a bill which provided:

That so much of the act approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

And again, on March 9, 1914, the same Mr. SIMS introduced House bill 14385, the first section of which is identical with the bill which he had previously introduced, and the second section of which repeals another discrimination of the Panama Canal legislation. This bill was passed by the House on March 31, 1914, and is the bill now under consideration here, upon which a vote will soon be taken. I shall vote for this bill. It is in accordance with what I have always believed and advocated, both in the Committee on Interoceanic Canals and on the floor of the Senate and in the visits of inspection and investigation which I have made to the Isthmus of Panama and the Canal Zone.

The blunders of the Democratic convention and the swift changes of its membership upon this question, the various interpretations of its platform declarations, whether the Democratic Party has kept or betrayed its pledges to the people, whether the President of the United States meant what he said to his constituents in New Jersey and elsewhere while he was standing upon this platform, whether he has changed his mind, if he did believe what he said, whether he was right when he said what he did say or whether he is right now when he denies that what he said then was right, what the effect upon the Democratic Party of their varied and spectacular evolutions upon this question may be, whether the Democrats in the Senate who formerly voted to sustain their platform pledge and are now about to vote against it can explain their conduct satisfactorily to their constituents, what Democratic Senators now believe upon this question, whether any of them are about to change their votes without having changed their minds, or whether they had any opinions in the matter to change, are questions of entire indifference to me. My opinion and belief, conduct and record upon this entire question has been consistent from the beginning to the end. I believe now just as I believed in 1912, and it would make no difference whatever to me in casting my vote on this bill whether I stood with the majority or with the minority or alone. I may be mistaken in my belief about this question. I do not pretend to be infallible, but I do know when I have an opinion, and I must vote as I think. I am always ready to take whatever consequences may ensue upon having an opinion and expressing that opinion by my vote, and I am in this instance.

Mr. President, I am aware that this subject has been debated in both branches of Congress, in the press, in the magazines, and by eminent authorities all over the world; and I do not expect that much additional light can be thrown upon the subject by further discussion. The time for action has nearly arrived. Before the final vote shall be taken I desire to say that a careful consideration of the debate which has been had on the treaty of November 18, 1901, commonly known as the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and the diplomatic correspondence and other information supplied by the Department of State in reply to a resolution introduced by me and adopted by the Senate on April 14, 1914, and in reply to a resolution introduced by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. HITCHCOCK] on the 20th of April, 1914, which information was printed by the Senate, entitled "Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal," and is known as Senate Document No. 474, Sixty-third Congress, second session, I am confirmed in my previous opinion that under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the United States is not at liberty to discriminate in favor of the vessels owned by its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise in the passage of said vessels through the Panama Canal.

The United States is an honest Nation. The vast majority of our citizens intends to keep its word. If this Nation has made a contract, the great majority of the people want to see the contract kept and not broken. I believe that the very interests who have demanded the exemption of our coastwise ships from the payment of tolls would not ask for this exemption if they thought it broke our contract. I do not believe that Senators here would vote to maintain this exemption if they thought it broke our contract. The question is, Does this exemption break our contract? To the ordinary person, who is not familiar with the way in which we obtained the authority to build the Panama Canal, it seems that we ought to be able to exempt our coastwise ships from tolls if we so desire. He is told that we are sovereign in the Panama Canal Zone; that we have an American canal there; that we have built it at an expense of over $400,000,000; that under the treaty we are, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, to have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal. And then he is asked the question, sometimes in a blustering and indignant manner, which is supposed to indicate a superior kind of patriotism on the part of the gentleman who propounds the inquiry: "Do you mean to say that having spent $400,000,000 in the building of this American canal we are to be dictated to by any foreign Government as to whether we shall charge our own ships or not; shall we surrender our sovereignty to a foreign nation?" And then the argument is supposed to be closed and the person who from a full reading of the treaty and thoughtful consideration of it and of the circumstances and diplomatic history of the last century which led up to the making of the treaty thinks otherwise is supposed to be convicted of treason against the United States.

Of course those familiar with the history of the question know that prior to the Mexican War Great Britain had a much longer coast line in North America than the United States did. Her maritime interests were infinitely greater. Her interests in the neighborhood of the Isthmus of Panama were much greater. The entire California coast belonged to Mexico. Great Britain controlled both the Atlantic and the Pacific coasts of the Dominion of Canada. She had possessions in the West Indies. She had a settlement and claim in British Honduras. She made a claim to the Mosquito territory which controlled the mouth of one of the rivers where it was expected the canal might some day be built. She possessed Greytown. Both the United States and Great Britain were opposed to the exclusive control of any canal across the Isthmus by any nation except itself. There was contention, bad feeling, and various attempts to get exclusive rights in the location where it was supposed the canal might finally be constructed. Finally on April 19, 1850, the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was executed. This treaty read as follows:

The United States of America and Her Britannic Majesty, being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the river San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, the President of the United States has conferred full powers on John M. Clayton, Secretary of State of the United States, and Her Britannic Majesty on the Right Honorable Sir Henry Lytton Bulwer, a member of Her Majesty's most honorable privy council, knight commander of the most honorable Order of the Bath, and envoy extraordinary and minister plenipotentiary of Her Britannic Majesty to the United States, for the aforesaid purpose; and the said plenipotentiaries having exchanged their full powers, which were found to be in proper form, have agreed to the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain hereby declare that neither the one nor the other will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal; agreeing that neither will ever erect or maintain any fortifications commanding the same or in the vicinity thereof, or occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America; nor will either make use of any protection which either affords or may afford, or any alliance which either has or may have to or with any state or people, for the purpose of erecting or maintaining any such fortifications, or of occupying, fortifying, or colonizing Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito coast, or any part of Central America, or of assuming or exercising dominion over the same; nor will the United States or Great Britain take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any state or government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

ARTICLE 2.

Vessels of the United States or Great Britain traversing the said canal shall, in case of war between the contracting parties, be exempted from blockade, detention, or capture by either of the belligerents; and this provision shall extend to such a distance from the two ends of the said canal as may hereafter be found expedient to establish.

ARTICLE 3.

In order to secure the construction of the said canal, the contracting parties engage that if any such canal shall be undertaken upon fair and equitable terms by any parties having the authority of the local Government or Governments through whose territory the same may pass, then the persons employed in making the said canal, and their property used, or to be used, for that object, shall be protected, from the commencement of the said canal to its completion, by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, from unjust detention, confiscation, seizure, or any violence whatsoever.

ARTICLE 4.

The contracting parties will use whatever influence they respectively exercise with any State, States, or Governments possessing or claiming to possess any jurisdiction or right over the territory which the said canal shall traverse, or which shall be near the waters applicable thereto, in order to induce such States or Governments to facilitate the construction of the said canal by every means in their power. And furthermore, the United States and Great Britain agree to use their good offices, wherever or however it may be most expedient, in order to procure the establishment of two free ports, one at each end of the said canal.

ARTICLE 5.

The contracting parties further engage, that when the said canal shall have been completed, they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may forever be open and free, and the capital invested therein secure. Nevertheless, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, in according their protection to the construction of the said canal, and guaranteeing its neutrality and security when completed, always understand that this protection and guarantee are granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments, or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls upon the passengers, vessels, goods, wares, merchandise, or other articles. Neither party, however, shall withdraw the aforesaid protection and guarantee without first giving six months' notice to the other.

ARTICLE 6.

The contracting parties in this convention engage to invite every State with which both or either have friendly intercourse to enter into stipulations with them similar to those which they have entered into with each other, to the end that all other States may share in the honor and advantage of having contributed to a work of such general interest and importance as the canal herein contemplated. And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention, namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same; and they also agree, that the good offices of either shall be employed, when requested by the other, in aiding and assisting the negotiation of such treaty stipulations; and should any differences arise as to right or property over the territory through which the said canal shall pass between the States or Governments of Central America, and such differences should in any way impede or obstruct the execution of the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain will use their good offices to settle such differences in the manner best suited to promote the interests of the said canal, and to strengthen the bonds of friendship and alliance which exist between the contracting parties.

ARTICLE 7.

It being desirable that no time should be unnecessarily lost in commencing and constructing the said canal, the Governments of the United States and Great Britain determine to give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, with the necessary capital, the consent of the local authorities, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention; and if any persons or company should already have, with any State through which the proposed ship canal may pass, a contract for the construction of such a canal as that specified in this convention, to the stipulations of which contract neither of the contracting parties in this convention have any just cause to object, and the said persons or company shall moreover have made preparations, and expended time, money, and trouble, on the faith of such contract, it is hereby agreed that such persons or company shall have a priority of claim over every other person, persons, or company to the protection of the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, and be allowed a year from the date of the exchange of the ratifications of this convention for concluding their arrangements, and presenting evidence of sufficient capital subscribed to accomplish the contemplated undertaking; it being understood that if, at the expiration of the aforesaid period, such persons or company be not able to commence and carry out the proposed enterprise, then the Governments of the United States and Great Britain shall be free to afford their protection to any other persons or company that shall be prepared to commence and proceed with the construction of the canal in question.

ARTICLE 8.

The Governments of the United States and Great Britain having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they hereby agree to extend their protection, by treaty stipulations, to any other practicable communications, whether by canal or railway, across the isthmus which connects North and South America, and especially to the interoceanic communications, should the same prove to be practicable, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. In granting, however, their joint protection to any such canals or railways as are by this article specified, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable; and that the same canals or railways, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

ARTICLE 9.

The ratifications of this convention shall be exchanged at Washington within six months from this day, or sooner if possible.

In faith whereof we, the respective plenipotentiaries, have signed this convention and have hereunto affixed our seals.

Done at Washington the 19th day of April, A. D. 1850.

JOHN M. CLAYTON. [L. S.]
HENRY LYTTON BULWER. [L. S.]

It was printed as Senate Document No. 85, Fifty-seventh Congress, first session.

It will be seen that the preamble of this treaty recites that the two powers—being desirous of consolidating the relations of amity which so happily subsist between them, by setting forth and fixing in a convention their views and intentions with reference to any means of communication by ship canal which may be constructed between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans by the way of the River San Juan de Nicaragua and either or both of the lakes of Nicaragua or Managua, to any port or place on the Pacific Ocean, * * * have agreed to the following articles.

It will be further noted that the first article agreed to declares that neither power will ever obtain or maintain for itself any exclusive control over the said ship canal, nor take advantage of any intimacy, or use any alliance, connection, or influence that either may possess with any State or Government through whose territory the said canal may pass, for the purpose of acquiring or holding, directly or indirectly, for the citizens or subjects of the one, any rights or advantages in regard to commerce or navigation through the said canal which shall not be offered on the same terms to the citizens or subjects of the other.

In article 5 it was provided that when the said canal shall have been completed they will protect it from interruption, seizure, or unjust confiscation, and that they will guarantee the neutrality thereof, so that the said canal may be forever open and free, and that both Governments always understand that this protection and guarantee is granted conditionally, and may be withdrawn by both Governments or either Government, if both Governments, or either Government, should deem that the persons or company undertaking or managing the same adopt or establish such regulations concerning the traffic thereupon as are contrary to the spirit and intention of this convention, either by making unfair discriminations in favor of the commerce of one of the contracting parties over the commerce of the other, or by imposing oppressive exactions or unreasonable tolls, and so forth.

By article 6 they agreed, among other things, as follows: And the contracting parties likewise agree that each shall enter into treaty stipulations with such of the Central American States as they may deem advisable, for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the great design of this convention—namely, that of constructing and maintaining the said canal as a ship communication between the two oceans for the benefit of mankind, on equal terms to all, and of protecting the same, and so forth.

Article 7, among other things, provides that the two Governments shall give their support and encouragement to such persons or company as may first offer to commence the same, and on such principles as accord with the spirit and intention of this convention.

Article 8 provides that the Governments of the United States and Great Britain, having not only desired, in entering into this convention, to accomplish a particular object, but also to establish a general principle, they agreed to extend their protection to any other practicable communication, whether by canal or railway, across the Isthmus, and especially to the interoceanic communications, whether by canal or railway, which are now proposed to be established by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. It further provided that in granting their joint protection to any such canals or railways, it is always understood by the United States and Great Britain that the parties constructing or owning the same shall impose no other charges or conditions of traffic thereupon than the aforesaid Governments shall approve of as just and equitable, and—that the same canals or railways being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford.

The attempt by the French company to construct the canal and its failure is a matter of history, but after the Spanish War the desire of the American people that the canal should be constructed, not only for commercial purposes, but for military purposes, became insistent. The length of time taken by our naval vessel, the Oregon, which was caught in the Pacific Ocean, in steaming around Cape Horn to the Atlantic coast, drew the attention of the country sharply to the value of a canal in the evolutions of our Navy.

Representations were made by the United States to Great Britain that it was the desire of this country that the canal should be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, and on February 5, 1900, what is known as the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty was signed at Washington. The Senate advised and consented to this treaty with certain amendments, but as Great Britain declined to accept the treaty as amended by the Senate, ratifications were not exchanged, and the treaty was therefore inoperative. In its preamble this treaty provides that the high contracting parties being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of April 19, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed their plenipotentiaries.

Article 2 provides that—the high contracting parties, desiring to preserve and maintain the "general principles" of neutralization established in articles 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention, adopt, as the basis of such neutralization, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention between Great Britain and certain other powers, signed at Constantinople October 29, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Maritime Canal, that is to say—and then rules were provided similar to those provided in the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Finally the existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty, the interpretation of which is largely the subject of this debate, was signed November 18, 1901, at Washington, and is as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries:

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Honorable Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the afore-mentioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States, either directly at its own cost or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that, subject to the provisions of the present treaty, the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal, the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 29th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say:

1. The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

2. The canal shall never be blockaded, nor shall any right of war be exercised nor any act of hostility be committed within it. The United States, however, shall be at liberty to maintain such military police along the canal as may be necessary to protect it against lawlessness and disorder.

3. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not revictual nor take any stores in the canal except so far as may be strictly necessary; and the transit of such vessels through the canal shall be effected with the least possible delay in accordance with the regulations in force, and with only such intermission as may result from the necessities of the service.

Prizes shall be in all respects subject to the same rules as vessels of war of the belligerents.

4. No belligerent shall embark or disembark troops, munitions of war, or warlike materials in the canal, except in case of accidental hindrance of the transit, and in such case the transit shall be resumed with all possible dispatch.

5. The provisions of this article shall apply to waters adjacent to the canal, within 3 marine miles of either end. Vessels of war of a belligerent shall not remain in such waters longer than 24 hours at any one time, except in case of distress, and in such case shall depart as soon as possible; but a vessel of war of one belligerent shall not depart within 24 hours from the departure of a vessel of war of the other belligerent.

6. The plant, establishments, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, for the purposes of this treaty, and in time of war, as in time of peace, shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

ARTICLE 4.

It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty or of international relations of the country or countries traversed by the beforementioned canal shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligation of the high contracting parties under the present treaty.

ARTICLE 5.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

It will be noted that the preamble of this treaty provides that the parties thereto, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries, and so forth.

Now it will be noted that the object of this existing Hay-Pauncefote treaty is stated in the preamble to be to facilitate the construction of the canal and to that end to remove any objection which may arise under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty had stated that the two Governments in entering into that convention desired not only "to accomplish a particular object but also to establish a general principle" and that to accomplish these purposes they extended their protection to the interoceanic communications which might be constructed and that the canals or railways being open to the "citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State which is willing to grant thereto such protection as the United States and Great Britain engage to afford."

The Hay-Pauncefote treaty having recited in its preamble that its object was to remove any objection which might exist under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the construction of the canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it becomes necessary to inquire what the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was. It will be noted that the word "neutralization" is not used at all anywhere in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The word "war" or "warlike proceedings" was not used anywhere in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Article 8 states that the high contracting parties desired thereby not only to accomplish a particular object, which I suppose was the construction of the canal, but also to establish a "general principle," and to that end they agreed to extend their protection to the canal, and it is provided further on in said article that no other charges or conditions of traffic shall be imposed upon the canal than shall be "just and equitable" and that the canal being open to the "citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall be open on like terms" to others, and so forth.

The "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty therefore has nothing whatever to do with neutrality in war. These words are not even mentioned in the article, and it is perfectly evident to me that the neutralization referred to in said article 8 refers to the charges and conditions of traffic as being just and equitable and that the canal shall be open on equal terms to all vessels.

The first article of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that it shall supersede the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

The third article provides that—

The United States adopts, as the basis of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople signed the 29th October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal, that is to say: (1) The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect to the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

The agreements for the protection of the canal in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty were made in articles 3, 5, 6, and 7, as well as in article 8; but article 8 is the only one in the entire treaty which speaks of the intention and purpose of the two Governments in entering into this convention as being "to establish a general principle," and, therefore, agreed to extend their protection to any other practicable communications across the Isthmus which connects North and South America by the way of Tehuantepec or Panama. It being—

Always understood that the same, being open to the citizens and subjects of the United States and Great Britain on equal terms, shall be open on like terms to the citizens and subjects of every other State—

And so forth.

When the Hay-Pauncefote treaty superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, the joint protection was abolished and the United States assumed the sole protection of its own canal. When, therefore, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was substituted for the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it stated in the preamble that its purpose was—

To remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th of April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States without impairing the "general principle" of neutralization established in article 8 of that convention.

The general principle of neutralization which was not to be impaired could not by any possibility have referred to anything else except "just and equitable charges or conditions of traffic" and "equality of terms," for that was all that was left in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty after the joint protection provided therein had ceased and sole protection had been assumed by the United States.

Article 4 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty provides that no change of sovereignty of the country traversed by the canal shall affect the "general principle of neutralization" under the present treaty. Article 3 states "the United States adopts, as the 'basis' of the neutralization of such ship canal the following rules," the first of which is:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise. Such conditions and charges of traffic shall be just and equitable.

Article 18 of our treaty with Panama, made just two years after our treaty with Great Britain, on November 18, 1903, being the sole basis of our right to construct any canal at all at the Isthmus of Panama, being our title deed so to speak, provides:

The canal, when constructed, and the entrances thereto shall be neutral in perpetuity, and shall be opened upon the terms provided for by section 1 of article 3 of, and in conformity with all the stipulations of, the treaty entered into by the Governments of the United States and Great Britain on November 18, 1901.

This treaty, the Hay-Bunau-Varilla treaty, was negotiated and signed by the same great Secretary of State, John Hay, who negotiated and signed the Hay-Pauncefort treaty. He knew what he intended, and he says we are bound by the rules we adopted in the treaty which he made with Great Britain. The first of these rules, which he himself wrote into the treaty, provides that the canal shall be—open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination.

And so forth.

Now I read his letter to Senator Cullom, the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, at the time this very treaty was in that committee, and when Mr. Hay was explaining its meaning to the committee for the purpose of obtaining its recommendation to the Senate for favorable action. It is dated December 12, 1901, and is found beginning at page 53 of Senate Document 474, Sixty-third Congress, second session, entitled "Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal":

[Personal—Not of record—Original not in department files.]

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, December 12, 1901.

MY DEAR MR. CULLOM: The treaty with England in respect to the construction of a ship canal between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, which the President has sent to the Senate, is the result of careful negotiations conducted between the two Governments since the receipt of Lord Lansdowne's dispatch of the 22d of February last, whereby His Majesty's Government declined to accept, for the reasons therein stated, the former convention of February 5, 1900, as amended by the Senate on the 20th of January, 1901. Under the instructions of the President I have signed on behalf of the United States the treaty now prepared.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850, which contemplated the construction of a canal under the joint auspices of the two Governments, to be controlled by them jointly, its neutrality and security to be guaranteed by both, was almost from the date of its ratification the subject of frequent discussion and occasional irritation between the two Governments. Nearly half a century elapsed without any step being taken by either toward carrying it into practical effect by the construction of a canal under its provisions. Instead of being, as was intended, an instrument for facilitating the construction of a canal it became a serious obstacle in the way of such construction. In the meantime the conditions which had existed at the time of its ratification had wholly changed. The commerce of the world had multiplied many fold. The growth of the United States in population, resources, and ability had been greater still. The occupation and development of its Pacific coast and its commercial necessities upon the Pacific Ocean created a state of things hardly dreamt of at the date of the treaty. At last the acquisition of the Hawaiian and the Philippine Islands rendered the construction of the canal a matter of imperative and absolute necessity to the Government and people of the United States, and a strong national feeling in favor of such construction arose, which grew with the progress of events into an irrevocable determination to accomplish that object at the earliest possible moment.

The incident of one of our great ships of war lying in the North Pacific, being ordered to join our fleet in the West Indies in time of actual war, and being obliged for that purpose to round Cape Horn, when through an isthmian canal she could in much less than half the time have reached the scene of action in which she was destined to take part, was an unanswerable illustration of the urgent and immediate need of such a canal for the protection and safety of the interests of the United States. But the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stood in the way. Great Britain did not manifest, and it is believed did not entertain, the remotest idea of joining or aiding in such a work. The United States was able to bear alone the entire cost of the canal, but was apparently prohibited by the existing treaty from undertaking the enterprise which, although carried out at its own expense, would redound to the benefit of the world's commerce quite as much as to its own advantage. The President, loyal to treaty obligations, was unwilling to countenance any demand, however widespread, for proceeding with the construction of the canal until he could obtain by friendly negotiation, on which he confidently relied, the consent of Great Britain to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or such a modification of its terms as would enable the United States untrammeled to enter upon the great work whose successful accomplishment was vitally necessary to its own security, and would benefit the people of all other nations according to their respective interests in the commerce of the world.

Such was the situation in which the negotiations for the supersession of the treaty were commenced and have been conducted, and we can not but recognize the fair and friendly spirit in which the successive overtures of the United States toward that end have been met by Great Britain. It has been my firm and constant hope throughout these negotiations that a solution of this difficult and important question between the two Governments would finally be reached which, instead of disturbing the amicable relations which have recently existed and ought always to exist between the United States and Great Britain, would make them more friendly still, and I believe that the treaty now presented, if finally established, will have this desired effect.

It is unnecessary to recall the discussions and negotiations which resulted in the making of the treaty of February 5, 1900, its deliberate consideration by the Senate, the amendments proposed by that body as a condition of its ratification by the United States, and its rejection as so amended by the British cabinet.

In rejecting the amended treaty, in the memorandum of February 22, 1901, Lord Lansdowne gave evidence of the sincere desire of His Majesty's Government to meet the views of the United States and earnestly deprecated any final failure to come to an understanding on this important subject.

Reciprocating these friendly intentions and determined, if possible, to devise a form of treaty which should reconcile the conflicting views which had proved fatal to that of 1900, I prepared and submitted to Lord Pauncefote in March last, for the consideration of his Government, a project for a treaty which, after long and careful consideration and negotiation, has been so perfected as to receive the approval both of the President and of the British Government in the form now presented.

The points on which there was failure to agree in the former treaty consisted of the amendments proposed by the Senate and were three in number:

First. The insertion of the clause relating to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty "superseding" the same.

Second. The addition of the clause providing that the stipulations and conditions of the first five clauses of the third article, as to the neutrality of the canal, should not "apply to measures which the United States may find it necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States and the maintenance of public order"; and Third. The omission of the invitation to other powers to adhere to the treaty when ratified.

Although on all three of these important points the opposing views of the Senate and of the British Government were most emphatic, I deemed it not impossible that a project might be framed which would satisfy both, without a sacrifice of any essential principle on either side, and that the supreme importance of the end in view would justify the attempt.

In the new draft of treaty the clause superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made the subject of a separate article and was submitted to the consideration of the British Government upon terms which would permanently secure the neutrality of the canal for the use of all nations on terms of entire equality and at the same time would relieve Great Britain of all responsibility and obligation to enforce the conditions which, by the former treaty, had been imposed upon or assumed by her jointly with the United States. And to this end, instead of that provision the United States alone adopted them and undertook the whole of that burden.

Second. No longer insisting upon the language of the amendment, which had in terms reserved to the United States express permission to disregard the rules of neutrality prescribed when necessary to secure its own defense—which the Senate had apparently deemed necessary because of the provision in rule 1 that the canal should be free and open "in time of war as in time of peace" to the vessels of all nations—it was considered that the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" would dispense with the necessity of the amendment referred to, and that war between the contracting parties or between the United States and any other power would have the ordinary effect of war upon treaties and would remit both parties to their original and natural right of self-defense and give to the United States the clear right to close the canal against the other belligerent and to protect it by whatever means might be necessary.

Third. While omitting to invite other nations to adhere to the treaty when ratified, and so to acquire contract rights in the canal, it was thought that the provision that the canal should be free and open to all nations on terms of entire equality, now that Great Britain was relieved of all obligation to defend such neutrality, would practically meet the objection which had been made by Lord Lansdowne to the Senate's third amendment, viz, that Great Britain was thereby placed in a worse position than other nations in case of war.

Fourth. In view of the facts that the enormous cost of constructing the canal was to be borne by the United States alone; that when constructed the canal was to be the absolute property of the United States, and to be managed, controlled, and defended by it; and that now by the new project the whole burden of maintaining its neutrality and security was thrown upon the United States, it was deemed fair to omit the prohibition contained in the former treaty forbidding the fortification of the canal and the waters adjacent.

Fifth. The sixth clause of article 3 was retained, which provides that "in time of war as in time of peace" the canal itself shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by belligerents, in the belief that such a provision was in the general interest of commerce and civilization, and that all nations should and would regard such a work as sacred under all circumstances.

With the exception of the changes above enumerated, which were made to reconcile conflicting views, care was taken to preserve in the new draft the exact language which had already passed the Senate without objection, and so far as known without criticism. The draft of the new treaty was transmitted by Lord Pauncefote to Lord Lansdowne, and its treatment by him manifested a most conciliatory spirit and an earnest desire to reach a conclusion which should be satisfactory to the United States, if this could be done without departing from the great principle of neutrality, including the use of the canal by all nations on equal terms, for which Great Britain had always contended.

After months of careful deliberation he announced the readiness of himself and his colleagues to approve the form and substance of the new treaty, with certain amendments hereinafter referred to. He recognized the important bearing upon all the questions involved of the change by which Great Britain was to be relieved of all the burden and responsibility of maintaining the neutrality and security of the canal, which were to be wholly assumed by the United States as the owner of this great work of public improvement built at its own cost. He considered that the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which had been inserted by way of amendment in the former treaty without any previous opportunity for consideration of the matter by Great Britain, would not now be regarded as inadmissible if sufficient provision were made in the new treaty for anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which it was any longer of material interest to Great Britain to preserve.

In this connection he referred to the fact that the new treaty contained no stipulation against the acquisition of sovereignty over the territory through which the canal should pass, and that, although the former treaty as approved by Great Britain before its amendment by the Senate had contained no such stipulation, it had left undisturbed that portion of article 1 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by which the two Governments agreed that neither would ever occupy, or fortify, or colonize, or assume, or exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America; and also to article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which is referred to in the preamble of the new treaty and in that of the original treaty of February 5, 1900, as amended by the Senate, as establishing the "general principle" of neutralization which was not to be thereby impaired.

It was claimed that if Great Britain were now to be called upon to surrender the interests and the principle thus secured by what remained of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, there should be, in view of the character of the treaty now to be concluded and of the "general principle" of neutralization thus reaffirmed in the preamble, some clause inserted agreeing that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances in the territory through which the canal is intended to pass shall affect such "general principle" or release the parties, or either of them, from their obligations under this treaty, and that the rules adopted as the basis of neutralization shall govern so far as possible all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus. He therefore proposed, as an additional article, on the acceptance of which His Majesty's Government would probably be prepared to withdraw their objections to the formal abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty the following, viz:

"In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the 'general principle' established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer convention is reaffirmed, the high contracting parties hereby declare and agree that the rules laid down in the last preceding article shall, so far as they may be applicable, govern all interoceanic communication across the Isthmus which connects North and South America, and that no change of territorial sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

The clause so proposed was regarded by the President as more far-reaching than the purpose demanded and as converting the vague and indefinite provisions of the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—which only contemplated future treaty stipulations to be entered into when any other route should prove to be practicable—into a very definite and certain present treaty which would fasten the crystallized rules of this treaty upon every other interoceanic communication across the Isthmus; and as perpetuating in a much stricter and more definite and more extended form, by a revision and re-enactment of the eighth article, the mischievous effects of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, of which it was the desire and hope of the United States to be relieved altogether.

The President considered that now that a canal between the two oceans was actually about to be built, it was sufficient for the treaty now to be concluded to provide for that alone; that there was hardly a possibility of more than this one canal ever being built between the two oceans—that in that remote and almost impossible contingency the rules and principles governing the use and status of the canal to be constructed under this treaty would be regarded as precedents for the consideration of the parties if they should be approved and sanctioned by experience and by the judgment of the commercial nations; but that for the present a convention for the building of one canal at the cost of the United States for the equal benefit of them all was all that could be wisely attempted. He not only was willing but earnestly desired that the "general principle" of neutralization referred to in the preamble of this treaty and in the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty should be perpetually applied to this canal. This, in fact, had always been insisted upon by the United States. He recognized the entire justice and propriety of the demand of Great Britain that if she was asked to surrender the material interest secured by the first article of that treaty, which might result at some indefinite future time in a change of sovereignty in the territory traversed by the canal, the "general principle" of neutralization as applied to the canal should be absolutely secured, and that a clause should be added to the draft treaty by which the parties should agree that no change of sovereignty or of international relations of the territory traversed by the canal should affect this general principle or the obligations of the parties under this treaty.

These views were in substance submitted to Lord Lansdowne on the part of the United States, and after considerable discussion and deliberation the following additional clause, to be known as article 4 of the new treaty, was agreed upon as a substitute for that proposed by him:

"It is agreed that no change of territorial sovereignty, or of the international relations of the country or countries traversed by the before-mentioned canal, shall affect the general principle of neutralization or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty."

It transpired, in the course of the discussion already referred to, that although the draft of the new treaty mentioned no particular route which the canal should traverse, there was an apprehension that, as the canal had been so often referred to as the Nicaragua Canal, and the intended treaty as the Nicaragua Canal treaty, it might possibly be claimed that it would not apply to a canal by the Panama route or by any other route, if any such should be selected. But it had always been the purpose of the President that the treaty should apply to the canal which should be first built, by whichever or whatever route, and when this apprehension was communicated to the President, he declared such to be his purpose, and, to exclude all doubt, it was agreed that the preamble should be amended by inserting, after the word "oceans," the words "by whatsoever route may be considered expedient."

His Majesty's Government recognized the material importance of the changes from the former treaty as amended by the Senate, by the omission of the Senate amendment that the first five rules of neutrality should not apply to measures which "might be found necessary to take for securing by its own forces the defense of the United States," and by the omission, as an offset thereto, of the words "in time of war as in time of peace" from rule 1, and of the stipulation prohibiting the erection of fortifications commanding the canal or the waters adjacent. These changes, in the first place, removed what Lord Lansdowne had criticized as a dangerous ambiguity in the former treaty as amended, of which one clause permitted the adoption of defensive measures, while another prohibited the erection of fortifications.

The obvious effect of these changes is to reserve to the United States, when engaged in war, the right and power to protect the canal from all damage and injury at the hands of the enemy, to exclude the ships of such enemy from the use of the canal while the war lasts, and to defend itself in the waters adjacent to the canal, the same as in any other waters, without derogation in other respects from the principles of neutrality established by the treaty; and it was clearly recognized by His Majesty's Government "that contingencies may arise when, not only from a national point of view but on behalf of the commercial interests of the whole world, it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities."

The omission of the words in the former treaty by which Great Britain was bound jointly with the United States to maintain the neutrality of the canal enabled His Majesty's Government to waive their former objection, insisted upon under the former treaty as amended by the Senate, to an agreement which permitted the United States in time of war or apprehended war to interfere with the canal or its use as its interests might require, while Great Britain alone, in spite of her vast commercial interests, was precluded from taking any measures to secure her interests in or near the canal. By the omission of the words "in time of war as in time of peace," in the event of the remote and well-nigh impossible contingency of a war between the United States and Great Britain, each party is remitted to its natural right of self-defense; but, even in that emergency, by force of the sixth clause of article 3—which is the only clause in the treaty by its terms expressly applying in time of war as in time of peace—the plant, establishment, buildings, and all works necessary to the construction, maintenance, and operation of the canal shall be deemed to be part thereof, and shall enjoy complete immunity from attack or injury by the enemy, and from acts calculated to impair their usefulness as part of the canal.

Finally, the absence from the draft treaty of any provision for the adherence of other powers was at first strenuously objected to by the British Government. It protested against being bound by stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers, and to remedy this proposed the insertion in rule 1, after the word "nations," of the words "which shall agree to observe these rules," so as to make it read that "the canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations who shall agree to observe these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any nation so agreeing," etc.

But the President was apprehensive that such a provision would give to the other nations the footing of parties to the contract and give them a contract right to the use of the canal. And in view of the action of the Senate on the former treaty, striking out article 3, which provided for bringing the treaty, when ratified, to the notice of other powers and inviting them to adhere to it, which seemed to mean practically the same thing, he believed that the proposed provision would meet the same fate. This was represented to His Majesty's Government, and it was also insisted on the part of the United States that there was a strong national feeling among the people of the United States against giving to foreign powers a contract right to intervene in an affair so peculiarly American as this canal when constructed would be; that, notwithstanding the similar provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, no foreign powers in the 50 years that had elapsed had effectively intimated a desire to participate in or contribute to the construction of the canal; that no other power had now any right in the premises, or anything to give up or part with as the consideration for acquiring such a contract right; that they must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

It was further insisted that the proposed provision was much more objectionable than the third article of the former treaty, which was struck out by the Senate, for that only invited the other powers to come in and become parties to the contract after ratification. But the proposed provision would rather compel the other powers to come in and agree in the first instance as a condition precedent to any use of the canal by them.

These views were appreciated, and a modification suggested on the part of the United States to Lord Lansdowne's proposed amendment was accepted which omits the words "which shall agree to observe" and substitutes for them the word "observing," and omits the words "so agreeing" and inserts the word "observing," and omits the words "so agreeing" and inserts "such," before "nations," in the next line, so as to make the provision read: "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations observing these rules on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation," etc. Thus the whole idea of contract right disappears, and any nation whose ships refuse or fail to observe the rules will be deprived of the use of the canal.

The further amendment proposed by Lord Lansdowne, and taken from the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that the conditions and charges of traffic on the canal shall be just and equitable, was so obviously reasonable that it was accepted by the President as soon as suggested.

I am, etc.,

JOHN HAY.

In this letter Mr. Hay distinctly states that other powers—must rely upon the good faith of the United States in its declaration to Great Britain in the treaty that it adopts the rules and principles of neutralization therein set forth, and that it was not quite correct to speak of the nations other than the United States as being bound by the rules of neutralization set forth in the treaty; that it was the United States which bound itself by them as a consideration for getting rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and that the only way in which they [the other nations] were bound by them was that they must comply with them if they would use the canal.

I read also the letter of Mr. Joseph H. Choate to Secretary Hay, dated August 16, 1901, which appears in said Senate Document 474, beginning with page 31:

DEAR COL. HAY: I have your kind letter of the 5th [not on State Department files], and was much pleased to know that I correctly understood your views about your project of treaty, which you sent for my information in your private letter of April 27.

On Tuesday last I had from Lord Lansdowne's hands a copy (printed) of the private memorandum, without date, which has been sent to you by Lord Pauncefote. At our next interview, on the following day, he asked me if I had read it and what I thought of it. I told him that I admired the friendly spirit and evident desire to agree which were manifest on the face of the paper. But I told him there were two points which I apprehended you would regard as very debatable. First, his new article 3A is much more definite and certain than the eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and I should anticipate objection on our side on that account. I called his attention to the fact that while the preamble of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty limits the object and subject of the treaty to the Nicaragua route and the eighth article carefully avoids the use of the word "neutrality," but merely agrees to extend the "protection" of the two Governments to other routes, and that in granting such joint "protection" the understanding is that canals by another route shall be open on equal terms to the subjects and citizens of the two nations and of every other State which is willing to grant the same "protection." All of which was extremely vague and uncertain, and omitted the "guaranty of neutrality"; that wanting to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty altogether, we shouldn't want to make any part of it by a new covenant stronger than it was before. Whereas his new article 3A makes the eighth article a great deal stronger than it was before, and saying nothing about "protection," which is, of course, inapplicable to a canal wholly American, fastens the rules of neutrality of article 3, which he calls "stringent rules," upon all future routes. He said he thought article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty clearly inferred neutrality. But I said it was only an inference—the word used was "protection." (I know that the "general principle" referred to in the eighth article is recited in the preamble of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty and of your new "project" and of his amended draft as the "general principle" "of neutralization," but it seems to me there is no reason why we should make it any stronger than it was and define in advance the exact rules to be applied to any future canals. However, as no more than one canal will ever be built, you may not think it worth while to take any such point.)

Secondly, I told him that I thought his amendment of the first clause of the third article, insisting upon bringing in other nations as parties to the agreement after the Senate had struck out of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty the article inviting them to come in, would seem counter to the very strong conviction in the Senate, sustained, as I believe, by an equally strong and general popular conviction, that we ought not to accord to other nations any contract rights whatever in the canal which we were to build and own; that none of them, though invited, ever came in or offered to come in under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that at present they had no rights; that they must be content to rely on our national honor to keep the canal open to them, as declared in this treaty with Great Britain. I told him that I thought he had no idea of the intensity of the feeling in the Senate and the Nation against the intervention of other nations in our affairs such as this, especially upon any footing of contract right, and that if you should conclude that this clause as amended by him does give them such a contract right, you could hardly be expected after the Senate's former action to accept it without modification.

I said to him that I supposed his mind was still open to conviction, and he said, oh, yes; of course—Mr. Hay's project was only tentative. He asked Lord Pauncefote to sound me, and I have made these suggestions in the hope of coming to an agreement, and herewith expect you to offer your counter suggestions. I don't really see why they insist on lugging in the other nations. The reason given by him that Great Britain objects to being bound to stringent rules of neutral conduct not equally binding upon other powers seems to me without substance. It is we that are bound by stringent rules. We accord to Great Britain clear contract rights to have these rules observed by us as owners of the canal; and the other nations can only use it under the same rules.

Great Britain has something to give us in exchange for this agreement with her—the relinquishment of her rights under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty—but the other nations part with us and no such consideration. I also told Lord Lansdowne, in respect to this clause 1 of article 3, that in one respect it was worse than the provision [art. 3] of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty which the Senate struck out. That only invited the other nations to come in and left it optional with them to stay out, as they did under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but this actually compels them to come in at the start. They can not use the canal, as I read it, unless they agree. The question is whether, if they agree as he proposes, they would become parties to the agreement in the sense in which they would have done under article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which the Senate vetoed. I've not had time to study this question carefully, but my present strong impression is that they would. Lord Lansdowne claims to desire only that the other nations parting with nothing should not be on a better footing with respect to the canal than Great Britain, who parts with so much, and that she shall not be bound by these "stringent" rules of neutrality, while the others are not so bound. I think they are practically all treated alike by the instrument as you have drawn it. I venture, however, to suggest, in view of his amendment of clause 1, article 3, that it might possibly meet the views both of the Senate and the British Cabinet if you should propose further to amend by striking out the words "agree" and "so agreeing," which I dislike so much, considering the previous action of the Senate, and make it read, "The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations observing these rules," etc.

These are only my hasty suggestions after having Lord Lansdowne's papers in my hands for only two busy days. I told him what I thought because he wanted to know, and I give them to you for what they are worth. Perhaps you will not agree with them at all. If not, no harm will come; but if you and the Senators whom you may consult concur in this objection to his amendment of clause 1, article 3, Lord Lansdowne will be prepared to have you dissent.

I think it must be conceded that Lord Lansdowne has very gracefully yielded on the main point that was covered by the Davis amendment in subdivision 7, page 5, of his paper, where he seems to construe the new draft substantially, I think, as we do. He recognizes "our desire to reserve the power of taking measures to protect the canal at any time when we are engaged in war," that "contingencies may arise when it might be of supreme importance to the United States that they should be free to adopt measures for the defense of the canal at a moment when they were themselves engaged in hostilities," and "the necessity"—and, of course, the right—"of the United States to interfere temporarily with the free use of the canal by the shipping of another power." Whether, however, such other power would thereupon and ipso facto become liberated from the necessity of observing the rules laid down in the "war treaty" I am not yet prepared to say. It ought not even in war to be at liberty to violate clause 6 of article 5.

Upon the whole the prospect of a satisfactory settlement of this troublesome matter seems to me better than it has ever been before, and I am sure that you will appreciate the friendly tone of Lord Lansdowne's advances. I have not yet seen Lord Pauncefote, but have an appointment with him for Tuesday, after which I may write to you again.

Yours, very truly, JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

It will be observed that Mr. Choate states—

It is we that are bound by stringent rules. We accord to Great Britain clear contract rights to have these rules observed by us as owners of the canal; and the other nations can only use it under the same rules.

On August 20, 1901, Mr. Choate again wrote Mr. Hay from London the following letter, which appears in said Senate Document 474, beginning with page 34:

LONDON, August 20, 1901.

DEAR COL. HAY: Yesterday I had a most satisfactory interview with Lord Pauncefote about the canal business, with the result that I am still more encouraged to hope for and expect a final draft at your hands that will suit both Senate and British cabinet. I went over with him fully the two points which I had discussed with Lord Lansdowne and in my answer to you. He recognized the full force of what I had to say as to the inexpediency of inserting the words "which shall agree" and "so agreeing" in clause 1 of article 3, after the striking out by the Senate of article 3 in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. He should emphatically favor omitting them, and thought his Government would assent to the omission, and he seemed to agree that making it read "all nations observing the rules," etc., would reach this object, which is that Great Britain and all other nations should be served alike and be on an equal footing as to obligation to observe the neutrality of the canal.

I also gathered from what he said that the new article 3A might be modified somewhat to meet my objection that it not only confirmed the general principle of article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty but made it a great deal stronger than it stands in that treaty.

Although naturally this point did not impress him as much as the other. But the more thought I give it the more substantial it seems. As article 8 stands in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it undoubtedly contemplates further treaty stipulations—not "new" treaty stipulations, in case any other interoceanic route, either by land or by water, should "prove to be practicable," and it proceeds to state that the general principle to be applied is to be, viz, no other charges or conditions of traffic thereon "than are just and equitable," and that said "canals or railways" being open to the subjects and citizens of Great Britain and the United States on equal terms shall also be open on like terms to the subjects and citizens of other States, by which I believe to be the real general principle of neutralization (if you choose to call it so) intended to be asserted by this eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. But under cover of reasserting this "general principle" this new article 3A instead of postponing the making of new treaty stipulations as to other routes until some other route by land or by water proves to be practicable immediately and for all time fastens these six crystallized rules of article 3 upon all interoceanic communications across the Isthmus as well as providing that no change of sovereignty or other change of circumstances shall affect such "general principle or the obligations of the high contracting parties under the present treaty," and I shall be surprised if objection is not encountered in the Senate to this result of making the old eighth article of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty so much more comprehensive, definite, and binding than it was before. The idea "change of sovereignty," of course, relates to the report of an intention on the part of the United States to acquire a strip of territory on each side of the canal, and "other change of circumstances" is aimed at the argument in some future epoch against the continuance of this treaty that has often been directed against the continued binding force of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty that "change of circumstance" since 1850 has put an end to it.

Lord Lansdowne's object in insisting upon article 3A is to be able to meet the objectors in Parliament by saying that although they have given up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they have saved the "general principle," and have made it immediately effective and binding upon the United States as to all future routes, and have dispensed with future "treaty stipulations" by making it much stronger than it was before. I think his all-sufficient answer is that by giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which stood in the way of building any canal, he has insured the building of a canal for the benefit of Great Britain at the expense of the United States, relieved Great Britain of all responsibility about it now and forever, and imposed upon the United States stringent rules of neutrality as to Great Britain and all mankind.

Assuming that some such article must be retained, how would this do?

In view of the permanent character of this treaty, whereby the general principle established by article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is reaffirmed, the United States hereby declares (and agrees) that it will impose no other charges or conditions of traffic upon any other canal that may be built across the Isthmus (or between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans) than such as are just and equitable, and that such canals shall be open to the subjects and citizens of the United States and of all other nations on equal terms.

Lord Pauncefote's expectation is now that you will in due time answer Lord Lansdowne's paper, and that he and Lord Lansdowne will give full consideration to the matter in time to enable him to bring back an agreed instrument when he returns in October, which I sincerely hope may be the case.

Yours, very truly, JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

From this letter, and especially from the paragraph which I am about to repeat, it is perfectly evident that our ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Choate, believed that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was intended to apply to all other nations on equal terms with the United States. He suggests that the intention would be carried out if "the United States hereby declares (and agrees) that it will impose no other charges or conditions of traffic upon any other canal that may be built across the Isthmus (or between the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans) than such as are just and equitable, and that such canals shall be open to the subjects and citizens of the United States and of all other nations on equal terms."

I now read a letter contained in the same Senate Document 474, dated September 20, 1901, from Mr. Choate to Mr. Hay, marked "confidential," beginning at page 39:

[Confidential.]

AMERICAN EMBASSY,
London, September 20, 1901.
(Received 5.40 p. m.)

Have had long interview with British ambassador at Washington. British minister for foreign affairs still absent in Ireland. British ambassador at Washington thinks amendments of clause 1, article 3, striking out "which shall agree to observe" and substituting "observing" and striking out "so agreeing," will be acceptable. Assuming this, would you not consent to add to your article 4, in letter to British ambassador at Washington, if accepted as a substitute for 3A, these words:

"Or the freedom of the canal to the vessels of commerce and war of all nations on terms of entire equality and without discrimination, as provided by article 3."

He apprehends that without this addition your 4 might be regarded as limited to technical neutrality and as not including freedom of passage and equality of terms. I thought you had no such idea; that taking all your language in 4 you meant it include all that is in your telegram, adding that if not included in "general principles of neutralization," it certainly is in obligation of parties under treaty. With this addition he would approve and thinks could carry it through. Certainly this would get rid of all obnoxious features of eighth article, C B, and of British minister of foreign affairs, 3A, and put in their place substantially what you propose.

CHOATE.

From this letter it clearly appears that our ambassador, who, under the instructions of our Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, negotiated this treaty, understood that freedom of passage and equality of terms were included in the expression "general principles of neutralization," and was not limited to technical neutrality.

I now read another letter from Mr. Choate to Mr. Hay, dated September 21, 1901, marked "Private and confidential," which appears in said Senate Document 474, beginning at page 40:

[Private and confidential.]

SEPTEMBER 21, 1901.

DEAR COL. HAY: In re canal treaty. I regret to say that Lord Lansdowne, who left on the 17th for Ireland, has not as yet been accessible for a conference, and I fear will not be until October. He was to have come on the 19th to attend the service at the abbey, but unfortunately he had another sharp attack of sciatica, which prevented. Both Lord Pauncefote and I had hoped that he would come and remain here a few days to enable us to advance, if not to dispose of, this important matter. But I have had a full discussion of the matter with Lord Pauncefote, which has, I think, materially advanced it and which resulted in my confidential cipher cable of yesterday, of which I inclose a copy. It is needless to say that I found Lord Pauncefote very reasonable. I pressed upon him your great desire, if possible, to restore clause 1 of article 3 to the form you originally proposed, eliminating Lord Lansdowne's amendment altogether, except the clause as to just and equitable charges and conditions. But he thought the idea of amending it had gone too far to dispense with it altogether. He had sent to Lord Lansdowne your letter to him of September 2, and both he and I thought that the best that could be done was what you there propose, viz, to strike out after "nations" the words "which shall agree to observe" and substituting therefor "observing," and in the next line to strike out the words "any nation so agreeing" and to substitute therefor "any such nation."

As to article 3A, proposed by Lord Lansdowne, Lord Pauncefote realizes, I think, the full force of our objections to it, as I stated them to him before and repeated to you in my former letter. I told him emphatically that meaning to get rid of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty altogether we did not want to have article 8 of that treaty fastened upon us forever in a more intensified form, and as to any and all future interoceanic communication, with these crystallized rules, dissenting with any future negotiation about the matter when it should arise at some distant day. I told him how you and President McKinley had raised the same objections on first reading Lord Lansdowne's paper, and without a word from me yet received. Rather to my surprise he yielded very readily on the point of the future canal or other interoceanic communication, which, to my mind, was the worst part of it. He said that the only two possible routes for a canal were, he was satisfied, the Panama route and the Nicaragua route; and that the Panama route was so hedged about by many treaties with several powers and that without their consent nothing in the direction of our wishes could be done, and that it was sufficient in this treaty to provide for the Nicaragua route. This I thought a decided advance. He no longer insisted upon the words "or other change of circumstances" not affecting the treaty, against my insistence that there might be changes of circumstances which would affect or even nullify a treaty; that there was such a principle of international law, which we can not let go; that what such change of circumstances might be is not determined, nor was it easy to foresee what change of circumstances might come upon the United States in the next hundred years. But he said they could not give up article 3A altogether; that it was quite obvious that we might in the future acquire all the territory on both sides of the canal; that we might then claim that a treaty providing for the neutrality of a canal running through a neutral country could no longer apply to a canal that ran through American territory only; and he again insisted, as Lord Lansdowne had insisted, that they must have something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the "general principle" of it, that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality, and especially that in the contingency supposed, of the territory on both sides of the canal becoming ours, the canal, its neutrality, its being free and open to all nations on equal terms should not be thereby affected; that without securing this they could not justify the treaty either to Parliament or the public; that the preamble which had already passed the Senate was not enough, although he recognized the full importance of the circumstance of its having so passed.

I then called his attention to your article 4 in your letter, which did seem to me to cover and secure all that he now claimed and insisted on. He said no; that it only preserved the principle of neutralization, which, it might be insisted on, did not include freedom of passage for all nations and equality of terms, and that without an explicit provision, which should leave that freed from doubt, he could not expect to sustain it before the Parliament and people. I insisted that those ideas were already included in your 4, i. e., within the words "the general principle of neutralization," especially in the light of that phrase as used in the preamble, where it is "neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty"; that if not included within that it certainly was in the phrase "obligations of the high contracting parties under this treaty," for what could be clearer than our obligation by article 3 to keep it open and on terms of equality as provided there, and what your 4 meant was that no change of territorial sovereignty should affect any of the obligations of the present treaty, including that. He still insisted that it should not be left to the construction of general clauses, but should be explicitly stated. Believing, as I do, that you had no thought of escaping from the obligations of article 3, clause 1, in any such contingency as change of territorial sovereignty, and that you had intended it to be included in your language in 4, I wrote down the words "or the freedom of passage of the canal to the vessels of commerce and of war of all nations on terms of entire equality and without discrimination, as provided by article 3," and asked him if those words were added to your 4 it would satisfy him as a substitute for Lord Lansdowne's 3A. He said it would, and that with those words added the treaty could, he thought, be sustained before Parliament and the British public; that he should approve it, and he thought Lord Lansdowne could and would, although it would have to be submitted to the cabinet or to a majority of its members. This seemed to bring the matter to a very satisfactory point so far as we could go, and I agreed to cable our result to you, in the hope of getting your approval before he submitted it to Lord Lansdowne. I did not give him the words I wrote on paper, but said I would cable them to you. (MEMO.—I observe that in the brevity of my cable I omitted the words "and without discrimination," but I don't see that the omission affects the meaning at all, as it is all included in the words "on terms of entire equality, as provided by article 3." But if on reading this you think it does make a difference, please cable me.) It still looks to me most propitious for a satisfactory conclusion being reached.

Yours, very truly,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

From this letter it is perfectly evident that Lord Lansdowne, with whom our ambassador, Mr. Choate, was negotiating, under instructions from our Secretary of State, Mr. Hay, insisted that he must have—something to satisfy Parliament and the British public that in giving up the Clayton-Bulwer treaty they had retained and reasserted the "general principle" of it, that the canal should be technically neutral and should be free to all nations on terms of equality, and especially that in the contingency supposed, of the territory on both sides of the canal becoming ours, the canal, its neutrality, its being free and open to all nations on equal terms should not be thereby affected; that without securing this they could not justify the treaty either to Parliament or the public; that the preamble which had already passed the Senate was not enough, although he recognized the full importance of the circumstance of its having so passed.

Mr. Choate further describes how Lord Lansdowne, in objecting to article 4 as proposed by Mr. Hay, had stated that—it only preserved the principle of neutralization, which, it might be insisted on, did not include freedom of passage for all nations and equality of terms, and that without an explicit provision, which should leave that freed from doubt, he could not expect to sustain it before the Parliament and people.

Mr. Choate states that, replying to Lord Lansdowne, he had insisted that those ideas were already included in Mr. Hay's article 4, that is—within the words "the general principle of neutralization," especially in the light of that phrase as used in the preamble, where it is "neutralization established in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty"; that if not included within that it certainly was in the phrase "obligations of the high contracting parties under this treaty," for what could be clearer than our obligation by article 3 to keep it open and on terms of equality as provided there, and what your 4 meant was that no change of territorial sovereignty should affect any of the obligations of the present treaty, including that. He still insisted that it should not be left to the construction of general clauses, but should be explicitly stated.

It is perfectly clear to any person who is trying to ascertain the true meaning of this treaty, as evidenced by the written statements of the negotiators at the time it was made, that all nations should use the canal upon terms of entire equality, and, in view of what has taken place recently, Lord Lansdowne was entirely justified in insisting that the treaty should specifically state that that equality was to apply to all nations, and he was also wise enough to anticipate that some person who wanted to get a special advantage for this country might claim that the general principle of neutralization, as described in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, meant only technical neutrality in the sense that the canal was not to be fortified or was to be neutral in time of war, and did not include what the negotiators clearly intended to include—to wit, equitable and equal terms to all.

Mr. Choate, on April 13, 1914, wrote to Senator O'GORMAN, the chairman of the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, a letter which appears on page 264 of the hearings before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals of the Senate, Sixty-third Congress, second session, entitled "Panama Canal Tolls," in relation to H. R. 14385. The letter is as follows:

DEAR SENATOR O'GORMAN: As I am unavoidably prevented from accepting the courteous invitation of your Interoceanic Canals Committee for to-morrow, I avail myself of your kind permission to submit anything of mine not already published that might throw light on the pending question.

I, accordingly, with the express permission of the Secretary of State, submit to your committee the inclosed copies of letters written by me to Secretary Hay between August 3 and October 12, 1901, giving step by step the negotiations between Lord Lansdowne and Lord Pauncefote and myself in regard to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

These, if carefully perused, will, I think, be found to confirm my view that the clause in the Panama Canal act, exempting our coastwise shipping from tolls, is a clear violation of the treaty.

With great respect, most truly yours,

JOSEPH H. CHOATE.

Hon. JAMES A. O'GORMAN, Chairman.

Mr. Choate was the man who negotiated the treaty and corresponded with the Secretary of State about what every word meant that he put into it, and he and Mr. Hay agreed that they intended that the United States should be bound by its own rules.

It will be remembered that article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty states that the bases of the neutralization of such ship canal are the following rules, substantially as embodied in the convention of Constantinople, signed the 29th of October, 1888, for the free navigation of the Suez Canal. Article 12 of the treaty of Constantinople, therein referred to, is as follows:

The high contracting parties, by application of the principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal, a principle which forms one of the bases of the present treaty, agree that none of them shall endeavor to obtain with respect to the canal territorial or commercial advantages or privileges in any international arrangements which may be concluded. Moreover, the rights of Turkey as the territorial power are reserved.

It appears, therefore, that the "principle of equality as regards the free use of the canal forms one of the bases" of the treaty of Constantinople for the free use of that canal.

The great chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Relations, Senator Cushman K. Davis, of Minnesota, in his report of the first Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which report was Senate Document 268, Fifty-sixth Congress, first session, gives his view of this principle of equality and of the treaty of Constantinople. He states:

No American statesman, speaking with official authority or responsibility, has ever intimated that the United States would attempt to control this canal for the exclusive benefit of our Government or people. They have all, with one accord, declared that the canal was to be neutral ground in time of war, and always open, on terms of impartial equity, to the ships and commerce of the world.

Special treaties for the neutrality, impartiality, freedom, and innocent use of the two canals that are to be the eastern and western gateways of commerce between the great oceans—are not in keeping with the magnitude and universality of the blessings they must confer upon mankind. The subject rather belongs to the domain of international law.

He is referring to the Suez Canal and the Panama Canal—

The leading powers of Europe recognized the importance of this subject in respect of the Suez Canal, and ordained a public international act for its neutralization that is an honor to the civilization of the age. It is the beneficent work of all Europe, and not of Great Britain alone. Whatever canal is built in the Isthmus of Darien will be, ultimately, made subject to the same law of freedom and neutrality as governs the Suez Canal, as a part of the laws of nations, and no single power will be able to resist its control.

The European powers gave to this subject the greatest consideration, and reached conclusions that are not open to criticism as being unjust to any nation in the world. Turkey and Egypt, the imperial and the local sovereigns of the canal, and Great Britain, a controlling stockholder in the Maritime Canal Co., had special interests in the rules for regulating the use of the canal, and they united in the convention which deprived them of exceptional privileges in its navigation, in peace and in war, for the sake of justice to all maritime nations and the peace and prosperity of the world.

No nation disapproves of this act or has had grounds of complaint against it. No American will ever be found to complain of it. It is right in its moral features, in its impartiality, and, above all, in its tendency to decrease the resort to war for the settlement of international quarrels, and it will have the cordial approval of the American people.

The United States can not take an attitude of opposition to the principles of the great act of October 29, 1888, without discrediting the official declarations of our Government for 50 years on the neutrality of an isthmian canal and its equal use by all nations, without discrimination.

It is claimed by some who are not familiar with the diplomatic negotiations and representations which have been conducted in relation to our acquisition of the right to construct and operate this canal in a foreign country, and who are unfamiliar with the technical terms such as "neutralization" and "the general principle of neutralization," and the meaning which those terms conveyed to the ears and the minds of the negotiators of these treaties, that we are not bound to apply the same measure to our ships engaged in our coastwise trade through the canal that we apply to the ships of other nations engaged in their coastwise trade passing through the canal, but such a notion is utterly inconsistent with equality without discrimination. Others claim that we are not bound to observe the rules which we ourselves have adopted for the regulation of the canal, and that the first rule under article 3, which provides for terms of "entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination," does not mean that we are bound to treat vessels of the citizens of all nations on terms of equality with vessels owned by our own citizens, but they claim that we are only obligated to treat foreign vessels on an equality with each other. They claim that the treaty should be construed as if the word "other" was interpolated before the word "nations" in rule 1 of article 3. Let us, therefore, insert the word "other" where they say it ought to be, and then inspect the rule as it would look. If this interpolation were made, the rule would stand as follows:

The canal shall be free and open to the vessels of commerce and of war of all other nations observing these rules, on terms of entire equality, so that there shall be no discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

This would intimate that it was not open to the vessels of our own Nation on such terms.

How absurd such a rule would appear, and if they meant that the rule should read that way, why did they not insert the word "other" in the place referred to? If the intention of the makers of the treaty was that the United States should have the right to discriminate in favor of its own vessels, Secretary Hay could have written into the treaty the following language:

But it is agreed that the United States may discriminate against other nations, their citizens and subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise.

This is what the advocates of the right to exempt our coastwise vessels from tolls claim the treaty means as it stands. Of course this is preposterous, and John Hay would have been ashamed to write it into the treaty, and this great Nation would have blushed if he had done it, and Great Britain would have refused to have agreed to it, and we would have become the laughingstock of the civilized nations of the world if we had asked for such a right to discriminate. Yet this is exactly what the advocates of the right to exempt our ships in the coastwise trade claim that the treaty really does mean. Could we, as an enlightened nation stand for this construction for a moment? Could we maintain our self-respect in discriminating in the use of this world highway, this international public utility, this interoceanic common carrier, even if we had the unquestioned right to discriminate in our own favor?

Mr. President, we pass laws making it a crime punishable by imprisonment for our domestic common carriers to discriminate between persons, classifications, and localities. We prohibit free passes, favoritism, and secret advantages of all kinds on the part of our public utilities. Are we to celebrate the dedication of this triumphal national monument, this colossal symbol of the power and majesty, of the skill, brains, and resources of this great free and democratic Republic, this long-sought endowment of the commerce of the nations, this boon to mankind, by throwing open the gates of this great artery of international commerce on the basis of obtaining a devious advantage of rebate or rake-off for ourselves?

Mr. President, if ever a nation, by its professions, its state papers, its diplomatic representations, and accredited utterances by all its official spokesmen, was ever pledged to the great moral principle of equality of treatment, this Nation stands so pledged in its conduct of the Panama Canal. If we are not to be bound by the rule of equality prescribed by the rule agreed to in the treaty, why did we make any treaty at all? If the construction claimed by the advocates of exemption and special privilege is correct, the treaty ought to have provided as follows:

The United States adopts as a basis of neutralization for this canal the following rules, to be binding upon all nations except the United States, which alone, of all of the nations of the world, shall be exempt from them.

We are asked to construe this treaty and to legislate and regulate our conduct in relation to the canal as though we had made no treaty at all, but had built a canal on our own soil with which no other nation had ever had any relations and about which no international negotiations had ever been held.

Mr. President, when this treaty was being considered in executive session of the Senate, the then Senator from Georgia, Mr. Bacon, proposed the following amendments:

In the preamble strike out all after the words "United States," in the tenth line, down to and including the word "convention," in line 11.

Strike out from article 2, in line 10, the following words: "Subject to the provisions of the present treaty."

Strike out all of articles 3 and 4.

Mr. President, the question being on agreeing to the amendments proposed by Mr. Bacon it was determined in the negative—yeas 18, nays 60. That appears on page 24 of the document entitled "Canal Treaties," being Senate Document No. 456, Sixty-third Congress, second session.

I have taken the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and I have struck out what Senator Bacon proposed to strike out by those amendments, and I will insert the treaty in the RECORD, so that it will read as Senator Bacon would have had it read.

The treaty, if it had been amended as indicated, would have read as follows:

The United States of America and His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, being desirous to facilitate the construction of a ship canal to connect the Atlantic and Pacific Oceans, by whatever route may be considered expedient, and to that end to remove any objection which may arise out of the convention of the 19th April, 1850, commonly called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to the construction of such canal under the auspices of the Government of the United States, have for that purpose appointed as their plenipotentiaries.

The President of the United States, John Hay, Secretary of State of the United States of America;

And His Majesty Edward the Seventh, of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and of the British Dominions beyond the Seas, King, and Emperor of India, the Right Hon. Lord Pauncefote, G. C. B., G. C. M. G., His Majesty's ambassador extraordinary and plenipotentiary to the United States;

Who, having communicated to each other their full powers, which were found to be in due and proper form, have agreed upon the following articles:

ARTICLE 1.

The high contracting parties agree that the present treaty shall supersede the aforementioned convention of the 19th April, 1850.

ARTICLE 2.

It is agreed that the canal may be constructed under the auspices of the Government of the United States either directly at its own cost, or by gift or loan of money to individuals or corporations, or through subscription to or purchase of stock or shares, and that the said Government shall have and enjoy all the rights incident to such construction, as well as the exclusive right of providing for the regulation and management of the canal.

ARTICLE 3.

The present treaty shall be ratified by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate thereof, and by His Britannic Majesty; and the ratifications shall be exchanged at Washington or at London at the earliest possible time within six months from the date hereof.

In faith whereof the respective plenipotentiaries have signed this treaty and hereunto affixed their seals.

Done in duplicate at Washington, the 18th day of November, in the year A. D. 1901.

JOHN HAY. [SEAL.]
PAUNCEFOTE. [SEAL.]

If the treaty had been amended in that way, Mr. President, you would have had exactly the kind of treaty that the advocates of exemption are claiming we have now. You would have had a treaty that superseded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; that authorized the United States to build the canal and to have exclusive control and jurisdiction over it, without being bound by any rules of equality, whether or not those rules were adopted substantially from the convention of Constantinople. Then the patriots could have raged through the country, beating their breasts with some consistency about "the canal being ours and paid for by the people's money, and we will do with it as we please, and if anybody objects we will fight Europe in arms." But the Senate voted down that construction by a vote of 60 to 18, because it was a proposition simply to hog the whole thing and afforded no basis whatever for any supercession of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at all. It simply had the effect of wiping out the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and asserting our right to do as we please, as though we were the sovereign of the Isthmus of Panama. You must remember at the time we made the Hay-Pauncefote treaty we had no more right in Panama than Guinea in Africa had, because it belonged to Colombia, in South America. The Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH], who points the withering finger of scorn at Great Britain for hovering around and snooping around the Isthmus of Panama, as though she were engaged in some nefarious conspiracy, should remember that we were hovering and snooping around there just as much as Great Britain was. It was the hovering and snooping around of both of us and of other nations, trying to exact a rake-off, if you please, for themselves and acquire a strategic position between those two oceans, that was the cause of the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty by which both of us agreed, in spite of the mutual airy persiflage that was exchanged between the two nations at a safe distance across the ocean, neither one being actually itching to get up against the muzzles of the guns of the other, you know, if they could get what they wanted by making a treaty, providing that there should be no discrimination against either.

Mr. President, that construction which is so eagerly sought by those who want to open the Panama Canal on the basis of some privilege granted to themselves is a forced and erroneous construction of the treaty. If we had so desired, we could have denounced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty; we could have claimed that circumstances had changed, as indeed they had.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if the Senator will pardon me, I will state that just before that time a gentleman by the name of Cooney, from the State of Missouri, while the matter was being discussed in the House, did offer an amendment calling upon the Executive to denounce the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and to abrogate it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I never had the pleasure of Mr. Cooney's acquaintance; but I was curious about him, because I knew he must have been a great man, since the Senator from Michigan quoted him as an authority, so at the time he was alluding to the fracas that Mr. Cooney created in the House I sent for the Biographical Dictionary of Congress and looked him up. The poor man is dead now. He was a gentleman who had been judge of probate at home and had been also prosecuting attorney; and aside from the episode alluded to by the Senator from Mississippi——

Mr. WILLIAMS. I interrupt the Senator only for this reason: If I remember correctly what the Senator from Michigan said, I think he said the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not mentioned in the discussion in the House. I may be mistaken, however, about that. He went on to say, however, that the treaty had been defunct and dead Heaven knows how long; that nobody was paying any attention to it. It was thought by this Representative, who confessed that it was in force, at any rate, of sufficient importance to introduce a resolution requesting its abrogation. In that same debate Representatives Mann of Illinois, Dolliver of Iowa, Burton of Ohio, and I, among others, asserted that it was in full force and effect.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from Mississippi whether a yea-and-nay vote was taken on that question?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not remember. I think so. I can hunt it up later. I got the volume and laid it on my desk, but the Senator from Michigan needed it in preparing his remarks for publication, and I gave it to him.

[NOTE.—Mr. WILLIAMS later furnished stenographer a note to the effect that he had found on page 5002, volume 33, CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Mr. Cooney's announcement of his motion, but could find no record of a vote.]

Mr. BRANDEGEE. This is a forced and erroneous construction of this treaty. If we had so desired, we could have denounced the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, could have claimed that circumstances had changed, and that inasmuch as no action had ever been taken under it, declined further to be bound by its provisions, and declared it, after the proper lapse of time under diplomatic usage, to be abrogated. We did no such thing, but we deliberately opened negotiations with Great Britain to supersede that treaty by another treaty, with the distinct, specific understanding and statement in the new treaty that "the general principle of neutralization, as contained in article 8 of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, should not be impaired."

If we had denounced and abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, we and Great Britain would both have been at liberty to avail ourselves of our respective influence, arts, and diplomacy to obtain the exclusive right from the owners of the Isthmus to construct and operate the canal. If we had so desired, we could have opened the whole situation again as it had existed with all its troubles before we ever made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, and as it has continued to exist and does exist now, owing to the disposition to try to get something of advantage to ourselves as against the rest of the commerce of the world. To be sure such a course and such a result would have undone the work of a half century, would have violated the ideals of the great statesmen of the world as to the free and equal use of this strategic Isthmus for the benefit of the commerce of mankind on equal terms.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Idaho?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I stated when I started that I preferred to proceed without interruption, and I hope the Senator will not insist upon interrupting at this time. I will gladly talk with the Senator later. I have only a little more to say.

Mr. BORAH. I supposed the Senator had suspended the rule.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I do not want to make any distinction; and as the Senator from Mississippi did interrupt, I yield to the Senator from Idaho. That is the trouble about trying to be courteous in this body. If a Senator says he does not wish to be interrupted, and then a Senator does, in fact, interrupt, and he tolerates it, he is subject to interruptions from 96 Senators. I yield to the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BORAH. No; I will not interrupt the Senator.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. I thank the Senator. I appreciate his action.

We could, if we had so desired, have returned to the monopolistic, selfish, and narrow view of this great marine international highway. Whether we would have been able, single handed against the world, to have maintained this monopoly, or to have managed it on terms which the rest of the world would have regarded unfair and discriminatory and characteristic of the arrogant medieval days, may well be doubted. But, thank God, we did not do this; we did not turn back the hands of progress; we did not attempt to convert the strategic figuration of this continent to the exclusive advantage of this Nation alone. Even though we had the physical power to conduct the canal on that barbaric conception, a decent regard for the respect of mankind would have prevented us from so doing. Other nations have other means of exercising influence than mere force of arms. We would soon have realized that we were ostracized by the civilized world—our trade, our commerce, our goods, wares, and merchandise would have been under a universal boycott.

Mr. President, in order to build, operate, and control this canal, and to free ourselves from anything in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty which prevented that ambition, we agreed to administer this canal on terms of equality to all. As will be seen, therefore, from the recital which I have made, the argument that because we built this canal and paid for it and own it, that we will therefore do with it as we please falls to the ground.

Nor can this great enlightened Nation say to other nations who disagree with us as to the meaning of our treaty agreements that we will be the exclusive judge of all our international contracts, and that if any nation does not like our construction, their only remedy is to precipitate a bloody war against us. We have an arbitration treaty under the terms of which we agree to submit to arbitration disagreements as to the meaning of treaties. It is said that we are not obliged to submit this question to arbitration under our agreement, because our treaty of arbitration provides that vital matters, matters of national honor, and matters affecting third parties, need not be submitted to arbitration.

Mr. President, it is not tenable, in my view, to claim that our desire to distribute a few million dollars among the owners of our coastwise ships falls within either of the three exceptions noted above. Neither the life nor the honor of this Republic depends upon the success of those who desire to subsidize indirectly that part of our coastwise trade which may use the Panama Canal. We should either arbitrate this question or repeal this discriminating exemption, or both. Many of those who insist upon granting this veiled subsidy to a portion of our coastwise shipping could not be prevailed upon to pass a statute to take the money ut of the Treasury of the United States and give it to the owners of these ships. Many of them have voted against a subsidy to our ships engaged in the foreign trade, which have to compete under disadvantageous conditions, both as to the cost of their ships and the cost of their crews, with their competitors. The claim ingeniously devised, and urgently pressed, that under the practice in relation to treaties involving the ships or vessels of nations, that coastwise vessels were never contemplated to be included in the provisions of the treaty, has no application whatever to the provisions of this Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because the equality prescribed in the treaty is defined to be for the purpose of preventing "discrimination against any such nation, or its citizens or subjects, in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic or otherwise."

The whole intent of the treaty is to prevent discrimination of any kind against the citizens or nations or their trade or commerce in the use of the canal. The claim that other nations of the world, who are prohibited by our navigation laws from entering our coastwise trade, can not be discriminated against by the exemption of our coastwise trade is perfectly irrelevant. The treaty does not agree to put the ships of all nations upon an equality by giving them a right to enter our coastwise trade any more than it pretends to do away with discriminations against the vessels of other nations, or their commodities or commerce in our tariff laws. The only discriminations which the treaty forbids us to make and the only equality which the treaty compels us to grant are such as arise from the use of the Panama Canal and our administration thereof. Can anybody suppose that Great Britain, after her years of struggle to obtain the rights which she had under the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which unquestionably provided for equality of treatment with the United States by the operators of the canal, having for more than 50 years been in the enjoyment of those rights under that treaty, would abandon them all in order to secure inequality of treatment and discrimination against herself? Is it conceivable that Lord Lansdowne and Lord Salisbury would have advocated before the British council the ratification of a treaty which allowed us to impose tolls upon all British shipping and the shipping of all other nations, and to exempt our own ships from charges for passing through the canal? Could either she or we have supposed at that time that anybody would or could place that construction upon the Hay-Pauncefote treaty? If they had thought that the treaty was susceptible of that construction, would they ever have had the hardihood to recommend its adoption by the greatest shipping power of the world, which at that time had a guaranty of absolute equality of treatment with us?

Mr. President, the equality prescribed in rule 1 is not capable of covering the special-privilege exemption in favor of one interest or any kind of direct or devious preference or advantage—they are the rules of the square deal and not of shifty evasion, sinuous subtlety, or slippery diplomacy. The parties to this treaty spoke the same language and used the same dictionaries, but there is not a word in this treaty which the ordinary, humble citizen would need to look up in a dictionary. The short Anglo-Saxon terms employed are those of plain, straightforward people, who knew exactly what they meant, and said it. They were all perfectly familiar with the history of events which led to the meeting of their minds; they reduced their ideas to the simplest forms of expression and affixed their seals and plighted their national good faith thereto. They promulgated their contract to the world and gave all the world equal rights in its benefits, and it was understood of all men. And now that the dream of 400 years is about to be realized, having invited the nations of the world to join with us in celebrating the grandeur of this vast enterprise and its triumphal completion, rejoicing in this enduring monument to the wealth, power, genius, integrity, and majesty of the American people, with the visiting flotillas of the brotherhood of nations almost embarked to participate in the festivities, while the flags are fluttering and the great guns are booming a welcome by this free Republic, are we to be discovered in the Senate of the United States taking counsel of one another by what possible specious device we may draw down something extra for ourselves?

May a decent respect for the opinion of mankind forbid that we shall desecrate this greatest wonder of the world by inscribing upon its enduring portals, "Special Privilege, Favoritism, Discrimination!" I appeal to you to join in helping this great Nation to cherish the loftier ideal and conception so eloquently portrayed and prophesied by the great Minnesota Senator, Mr. Davis, and to consecrate this great work, in which the French nation has had such a prominent part, to the grand principles which emancipated that nation—"Liberty, Fraternity, Equality!"

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, some time ago I proposed an amendment to the pending bill in the form of a substitute for the amendment proposed by the committee. Subsequently and before the amendment had been offered a similar amendment was offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and that amendment has been adopted by the Senate. I am now about to offer the substance of my proposed amendment as an amendment to the Simmons amendment, and before doing so I desire to explain not only my reasons for offering the amendment but what I understand will be its effect.

The Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has challenged any Member of this body to point out any right or interest of this Government that is not protected by the Simmons amendment. I accept that challenge. I maintain that the amendment that has been adopted by the Senate fails to protect any interest of this Government from the effects of anything that may be done by the Senate in dealing with the bill that is now before it. It is a sham.

It will be noticed that the only attempt to protect this Government is from the effect of the passage of this act. The passage of this act will have no effect whatever upon the right of this Government to exempt its own ships from the payment of tolls. That right is not vested in the United States by the Panama act, and therefore the repeal of that act can not take it away.

If we have any right to exempt our ships from the payment of tolls, it is not because of the act which Congress passed, but because of the fact that we own the canal. The Panama act, a clause of which is now sought to be repealed, did not give this Government any right to exempt its ships from the payment of tolls, or purport to do so. The act assumes, necessarily and properly assumes, that that right exists in the Government as an incident to its ownership of the canal, and the only object and purpose of the Panama Canal act in this respect is to determine who shall regulate and fix those rights, namely, the President of the United States. Section 5 of that act provides:

> That the President is hereby authorized to prescribe and from time to time change the tolls that shall be levied by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal.

There is no grant of right to this Government by virtue of that statute. It assumes, as I said, that the Government had that right, and it simply provided that the President of the United States should regulate those rates and how, with certain limitations:

> Provided, That no tolls, when prescribed as above, shall be changed, unless six months' notice thereof shall have been given by the President by proclamation. No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States.

If we owned the canal and had complete sovereignty over it, we had the right by reason of that single fact to exempt our own ships from the payment of tolls for the use of our own canal. This statement in the statute is simply a legislative declaration of a right that already existed by virtue of our ownership. It did not vest any new right in this Government, and if we repeal it we will not take away any right of the Government.

If it be true, as claimed by the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] and other Members of this body, that this is a great international waterway, and that this Government has no right to control its use, but that every nation in the world has a right to use it upon equal terms with every other nation, then this Government could not by statute give itself the right to use it in any different way, and therefore the statute would have no effect upon the rights of the United States in the canal. But if, on the other hand, it is our canal, constructed with our money, over which we have complete sovereignty, then as a result of that fact we have a right to exempt our own ships from the payment of tolls.

So at last, Mr. President, we come back to the single question as to the effect upon that right of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I am not going to discuss that question. I have already done so in the earlier stages of this debate to the best of my ability, and the subject has been thoroughly and much more ably discussed by other Senators following me. But the point I am making is that we are attempting now by this amendment to protect ourselves from the effect of this bill, if it becomes a law, upon our right to exempt our ships, and that the statute sought to be repealed gives us no such right, and that therefore the repeal of it or any action taken in respect to it can not affect our right to exempt our ships, and therefore the amendment providing that the passage of it shall not affect our right to exempt our ships is simply worthless as an effort to protect our rights.

There is one clause in the original act that does have some effect upon our rights. It limits the President as to the amount of tolls to be fixed and charged, namely, not more than $1.25 a ton nor less than 75 cents a ton. Coastwise trade of the United States was excepted from that provision. Therefore that provision has no effect upon the fixing of tolls as affecting our domestic trade; but with the statute as it then stood the President of the United States would have had a perfect right to charge $1.25 a ton as against foreign and 75 cents a ton against domestic trade. He could not under the limitations upon his power to fix the rates go either higher or lower than the amount fixed in the statute.

But the Senate must remember that that was merely a regulation imposed upon the President of the United States in fixing and controlling the rates and did not pretend to determine whether we had the right to exempt our ships or to give us any such right that we did not already have.

So we have been discussing the question for two months, whether we should repeal this exemption clause of the statute or not, when, in my judgment, it has no effect whatever upon the rights of the United States to exempt her ships.

But, Mr. President, this discussion has been important not because of the passage or defeat of this bill but because we have assumed here to determine what should be the construction placed upon the treaty that is intended to limit that right.

Now, again, the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina proposes to protect this Government from its rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That treaty gave this Government no right to exempt its ships. Certainly no one could claim that. The repeal of this statute could by no possibility affect the question as to the effect of that treaty upon our rights. If there never had been any Panama Canal statute passed at all, this Government would have had a right, independent of any such provision as that, to exempt its ships unless the position is maintained that this is an international highway, and our Government has no right to assume any preferred rights to itself.

In that view of it, if every other nation has a right to claim the same right to use the canal that we have, on account of its international rights, then the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, attempting to limit our rights, was entirely unnecessary, and is immaterial.

I take it for granted that the Senator from North Carolina and Senators who have voted for his amendment desire to protect us in the future from any action that we may take here bearing upon this question, whether it be the passage of the act or any votes that have been taken here or anything that has been said by Senators representing the Government as to the construction which should be placed upon this treaty. The statute has nothing to do with it whatever. The Government of Great Britain has made the claim that we have no right to pass our coastwise ships through the canal if they carry foreign goods. If by reason of the removal of this statute we proceed to levy a toll upon our own ships, then the Government of England may very well claim that we have estopped ourselves from claiming that we have the right in the future to exempt them, because under this protest we have actually charged our ships just the same as we charge theirs.

Mr. President, it is not the passage of this statute that is an offense against Great Britain, if we are proposing to violate the treaty by exempting our own ships, but it is the act itself of exemption. The position was correctly taken by our own Secretary of State that Great Britain had no cause of complaint until we had actually exempted ships that ought not to be exempted under the provisions of the treaty; and evidently the Government of Great Britain accepted that position, because she made no further protest, and the matter was left in that condition. Perhaps if later on we had allowed our ships to pass through without the payment of tolls and exacted tolls from the ships of Great Britain, a case would have arisen where she might have made her protest and called for arbitration; but that time has not arrived and that question is not affected by the statute. Therefore, to attempt to relieve ourselves from the effect of the statute or its repeal is a deception, unintentional, of course, and is absolutely misleading.

In order to meet what I think may be a danger resulting from what has been said and done here and what may be done in the way of actually exempting our ships from tolls, I propose to offer this amendment, to add at the end of the amendment the following:

Neither shall the passage of this act nor the imposition upon or collection of tolls from the ships of this country or its citizens for passing through the Panama Canal deprive the United States of any right, as owner of said canal, to exempt from the payment of such tolls any and all ships of the Government and its citizens at any future time, nor shall this act be construed as a waiver of such right or as an acceptance of or consent to such a construction of any treaty with a foreign country as will deny or abridge the same.

What is claimed here is that the treaty with Great Britain has limited the right that existed on the part of the Government of the United States to exempt our ships from tolls, and that has been argued here day after day in an attempt to determine whether we have the right to exempt our ships or not. The whole question turns upon the effect of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, because without that treaty, as I maintain, we have the right as the owner of the canal to exempt our own ships.

I should like, if we are going to repeal this statute, and as there is an honest difference of opinion between us here as the representatives of the United States Government as to the effect of the treaty, that we should by some clause in this bill protect ourselves from any consequences growing out of our act that would prevent us in the future from asserting that right if it should be determined that we have it.

The amendment that I offer differs from that of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] and that of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] in that it does not assert the right on our part; it simply endeavors to protect us in the right that I think exists. Others do not think so. Therefore I think as the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] has assumed to protect us from the consequences of the passage of this act that he and the Senators on the other side of the Chamber should be not only willing, but anxious, to make it so strong that our rights, if we should be determined to have any, may be protected from the consequences of what we are doing to-day.

Mr. President, I have no disposition to delay the Senate unnecessarily. I have endeavored briefly to call the attention of the Senate to the reasons why I think this additional amendment should be made and to point out the effect that I think may result from it. I am not prepared to say that this amendment is necessary. I doubt very much whether it is, because of my belief that the passage of this statute could by no possibility have any effect upon our rights in the future. But other Senators do not agree with me in that respect, and therefore I desire, out of a proper sense of caution, to ask the Senate to adopt the amendment that I now send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof the following:

Neither shall the passage of this act nor the imposition upon or collection of tolls from the ships of this country or its citizens for passing through the Panama Canal deprive the United States of any right, as owner of said canal, to exempt from the payment of such tolls any and all ships of the Government and its citizens at any future time, nor shall this act be construed as a waiver of such right or as an acceptance of or consent to such a construction of any treaty with a foreign country as will deny or abridge the same.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is upon the amendment offered by the Senator of California to the amendment.

Mr. WORKS. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from California suggests the absence of a quorum. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Ashurst	Hitchcock	O'Gorman	Stephenson
Brady	Hollis	Owen	Sterling
Brandegee	Hughes	Page	Stone
Burleigh	James	Perkins	Sutherland
Burton	Johnson	Poindexter	Swanson
Catron	Jones	Pomerene	Thomas
Chamberlain	Kenyon	Ransdell	Thompson
Chilton	Kern	Reed	Thornton
Clapp	La Follette	Root	Tillman
Clark, Wyo.	Lane	Saulsbury	Vardaman
Colt	Lea, Tenn.	Shafroth	Walsh
Crawford	Lewis	Sheppard	Warren
Cummins	Lodge	Sherman	Weeks
Dillingham	McCumber	Shively	West
du Pont	Martin, Va.	Simmons	White
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Smith, Ariz.	Williams
Gallinger	Myers	Smith, Ga.	Works
Goff	Nelson	Smith, Md.
Gronna	Norris	Smoot

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Seventy-four Senators have answered to their names. A quorum is present.

Mr. WORKS. As a number of Senators were out of the Chamber when the amendment was offered, I ask to have it reread.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment for the information of the Senate.

The SECRETARY. Amend the amendment by adding at the end thereof the following:

Neither shall the passage of this act nor the imposition upon or collection of tolls from the ships of this country or its citizens for passing through the Panama Canal deprive the United States of any right, as owner of said canal, to exempt from the payment of such tolls any and all ships of the Government and its citizens at any future time, nor shall this act be construed as a waiver of such right or as an acceptance of or consent to such a construction of any treaty with a foreign country as will deny or abridge the same.

Mr. WORKS. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. In his absence I withhold my vote. If permitted to vote I should vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair on this particular amendment with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has a pair with the senior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE]. We have arranged to transfer those pairs in a manner so that we may both be permitted to vote. I therefore vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. SUTHERLAND (when his name was called). I have a pair with the Senator from Arkansas [Mr. CLARKE], but under the statement made by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER], the Senator from Arkansas will stand paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] and I will vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 36, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—36.

Ashurst	Cummins	Lane	Smith, Mich.
Borah	Dillingham	Lippitt	Smoot
Brady	du Pont	Martine, N. J.	Sutherland
Bristow	Gallinger	O'Gorman	Townsend
Burleigh	Goff	Page	Vardaman
Catron	Hitchcock	Perkins	Walsh
Chamberlain	Jones	Poindexter	Warren
Clapp	Kenyon	Ransdell	Weeks
Clark, Wyo.	La Follette	Reed	Works

NAYS—50.

Bankhead	Kern	Pittman	Stephenson
Brandegee	Lea, Tenn.	Pomerene	Sterling
Bryan	Lee, Md.	Root	Stone
Burton	Lewis	Saulsbury	Swanson
Chilton	Lodge	Shafroth	Thomas

Johnson	Owen	Smith, S. C.

NOT VOTING—9.

Clarke, Ark.	Fall	Oliver	Robinson
Crawford	Newlands	Penrose	Shields.
Culberson

So the amendment of Mr. WORKS to the amendment was rejected.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. 11040) to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. TOWNSEND presented petitions of sundry citizens of Ingham County, Mich., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Local Union No. 46, Cigar Makers' Union, of Grand Rapids, Mich., remonstrating against national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Woman's League of Bronson, Mich., praying for an appropriation for the control and prevention of floods, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce.

Mr. CATRON presented a petition of sundry citizens of Lordsburg, N. Mex., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. PAGE presented a petition of the congregation of the Congregational Church of Woodstock, Vt., praying for national prohibition, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. DU PONT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Wilmington, Del., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of sundry citizens of Sussex County, Del., remonstrating against an increase in the number of chaplains in the United States Navy, which was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

He also presented a petition of the Maryland, Delaware, and Virginia Peninsula Retail Jewelers' Association, praying for the enactment of legislation eliminating the time guaranty on gold-filled watchcases, which was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce.

Mr. LODGE presented resolutions adopted by the City Council of Woburn, Mass., favoring the retirement of civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. ROOT presented petitions of sundry citizens of New York City, Haverstraw, Franklin, Fabius, Portageville, Reading Center, Victor, Beanville, Woodstock, and Hadley, all in the State of New York, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented memorials of sundry citizens of New York City, Oneonta, Brooklyn, Scottsville, Troy, and Green Island, all in the State of New York, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WEEKS presented a petition of the Woman's Christian Temperance Union of Melrose, Mass., praying for Federal supervision of motion-picture films, which was referred to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. GALLINGER presented petitions of sundry citizens of Portsmouth, N. H., praying for the enactment of legislation to supplement existing laws against unlawful restraints and monopolies, and for other purposes, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of the Board of Trade of Concord, N. H., praying for the adoption of 1-cent letter postage, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. McLEAN presented memorials of sundry citizens of Hartford and Stafford Springs; of the Central Labor Union of Danbury; and of Local Union No. 15, United Hatters of North America, of South Norwalk, all in the State of Connecticut, remonstrating against national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of the Windham Association of Congregational Churches and Ministers, of Pomfret Center, and of the congregations of the Second Congregational Church of Putnam and the First Congregational Church of Pomfret, all in the State of Connecticut, praying for the establishment of an international tribunal for the adjudication of international differences, which were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations.

He also presented a petition of Local Union No. 207, National Association of Civil Service Employees, of Hartford, Conn., praying for the enactment of legislation granting pensions to civil-service employees, which was referred to the Committee on Civil Service and Retrenchment.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN presented a memorial of Rich Mountain Circle, No. 4, Ladies of the Grand Army of the Republic, of Eugene, Oreg., remonstrating against any change in the United States flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a petition of sundry citizens of Oregon, praying for the adoption of a 1-cent letter postage, which was referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. CLARK of Wyoming presented petitions of sundry citizens of Cody, Powell, and Carpenter, all in the State of Wyoming, praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I present a letter, in the nature of a petition, signed by a large number of retail merchants of Salt Lake City, Utah. The letter is brief, and I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD, omitting the signatures with the exception of the first one.

There being no objection, the petition was referred to the Committee on Interstate Commerce and ordered to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

SALT LAKE CITY, UTAH, May 23, 1914.

Hon. GEORGE SUTHERLAND,
United States Senator, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The undersigned retail merchants in Salt Lake City, State of Utah, hereby ask you to use your good offices in supporting the measure H. R. 13305, known as the Stevens bill. This measure is designed to protect the independent merchant in his legitimate business, which is threatened with destruction by the insane practice that large corporations are adopting of price cutting.

The retailers desire the passage of this measure, because it will enable manufacturers to take advantage of its provisions and establish a uniform price of sale to all wholesalers, and also a uniform price of sale to all retailers. In other words, it affords a fair deal to all concerned, including the consumer. For these and other reasons the retailers are unanimously in favor of the passage of the Stevens bill.

Very respectfully,

MURDOCH GROCERY CO.
(And others).

JUDICIAL POWERS TO MINISTERS, ETC.

Mr. STONE, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to which was referred the bill (S. 2877) to amend an act entitled "An act to carry into effect provisions of the treaties between the United States, China, Siam, and other countries, giving certain judicial powers to ministers and consuls or other functionaries of the United States in those countries, and for other purposes," approved June 22, 1860, reported it without amendment and submitted a report (No. 590) thereon.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bills were introduced, read the first time, and, by unanimous consent, the second time, and referred as follows:

By Mr. GRONNA:

A bill (S. 5802) to amend section 10 of the act entitled "An act to establish a Bureau of Immigration and Naturalization, and to provide for a uniform rule for the naturalization of aliens throughout the United States," approved June 29, 1906; to the Committee on Immigration.

By Mr. SHIVELY:

A bill (S. 5803) granting an increase of pension to Amos T. Phares (with accompanying papers); and

A bill (S. 5804) granting an increase of pension to Curtis B. Small; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. SMITH of Maryland:

A bill (S. 5805) to confer additional power and authority on the National Forest Reservation Commission, and to provide for the acquisition of lands for a national forest or park in the general vicinity of the District of Columbia; to the Committee on Agriculture and Forestry.

By Mr. SMITH of Arizona:

A bill (S. 5806) authorizing the issuance of a patent to the city of Tempe of certain land in the county of Maricopa, State of Arizona; to the Committee on Public Lands.

By Mr. HUGHES:

A bill (S. 5807) granting a pension to Annie Wilson; to the Committee on Pensions.

By Mr. GORE:

A bill (S. 5808) to authorize the Secretary of the Interior to extend certain payments on public lands in Oklahoma; to the Committee on Indian Affairs.

By Mr. OWEN:

A bill (S. 5809) to terminate minority rule in the nomination and election of Senators and Representatives in Congress; and

A bill (S. 5810) to amend an act entitled "An act to provide for publicity of contributions made for the purpose of influencing elections at which Representatives in Congress are elected," also to amend an act amending the said act and "extending the same to candidates for nomination and election to the offices of Representative and Senator in the Congress of the United States and limiting the amount of campaign expenses," and extending both, first, by providing for publicity by all committees and individuals that shall expend $50 or more to influence the election of a Representative or Senator in Congress; second, by restricting all persons other than candidates for office from expending more than $1,000 to influence the election of a Representative or Senator in Congress; and third, by incorporating in an amended form the prohibition against corporations from making money contributions in connection with political elections; to the Committee on Privileges and Elections.

AMENDMENT TO INDIAN APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GORE submitted an amendment authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to grant a further extension of extensions of time on the payments described in the act of April 27, 1912, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the Indian appropriation bill, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

L. W. JONES.

Mr. TILLMAN submitted the following resolution (S. Res. 388), which was referred to the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay out of the "contingent fund" of the Senate, the sum of $16 to L. W. Jones for services as assistant clerk to the Committee on Naval Affairs from June 1 to June 4, inclusive.

THE SHORT-BALLOT MOVEMENT.

Mr. OWEN. I have an article on the short-ballot movement by H. S. Gilbertson, executive secretary of the National Short Ballot Organization. I desire to have the article printed as a public document, and I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to its publication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the matter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

CREEK INDIANS OF OKLAHOMA.

Mr. GORE. I desire to have printed as a document a letter from R. C. Allen, national attorney for the Creek Nation of Indians, of Oklahoma, relative to certain provisions contained in the Indian appropriation bill affecting these Indians. I ask that the letter may be referred to the Committee on Printing with a view to its publication.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, the letter will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, I send to the desk an amendment, and ask for its adoption.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Montana will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause of the bill and to insert:

That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, be, and the same hereby is, amended by the addition thereto of the following provision, namely:

That nothing contained in this act shall be deemed to repeal any provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or to affect the judicial construction thereof, or in anywise to impair any rights or privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the treaties of the United States relative to tolls or other charges for the passage of vessels through the Panama Canal, and that when any alien, whether natural person, partnership, company, or corporation, considers that the charging of tolls or the enforcement of any other regulation under and pursuant to the provisions of this act violates in any way any such treaty rights or privileges, such alien shall have the right to bring an action against the United States for a redress of the injury which he considers himself to have suffered, and the district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases and to decree the appropriate relief, and from the decision of such district courts there shall be an appeal by either party to the action to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, in the course of some remarks which I made upon this bill some time since I said all that I cared to say in advocacy of this amendment. The amendment was offered in the Committee on Interoceanic Canals, having the bill under consideration. It was rejected by that committee by a vote of 8 to 6. I am entitled to no credit for originating the idea which the amendment expresses. It was suggested by former President Taft at or about the time of the passage of the act to repeal an important provision of which the bill now before us is presented. Briefly, the amendment is intended to put the matter in such shape as that the question as to whether that part of the act exempting coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for passing through the Panama Canal is or is not in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Montana yield to the Senator from Nebraska?

Mr. WALSH. I do.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the amendment which the Senator from Montana now offers a substitute for the amendment now pending?

Mr. WALSH. The amendment is offered as a substitute for the bill as amended.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, if that is true, I make the point of order against the amendment that until the committee amendment is disposed of a substitute for the bill would not be in order.

Mr. WALSH. I did not understand there was any amendment pending. I understood that the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska had been adopted.

Mr. NORRIS. No; a vote was taken on making my amendment a substitute for the committee amendment, and that prevailed. Now that amendment is before the Senate as an amendment to the bill. Until it is disposed of, I take it that the Senator can not offer a substitute for the entire bill. Of course the Senator's amendment would be in order later.

Mr. WALSH. I assume that the Senator from Nebraska states the parliamentary situation correctly. I assumed that his amendment had become an integral part of the bill by the action heretofore taken.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate has not yet made the amendment a part of the bill; it has simply expressed a preference for the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina over all other amendments which have as yet been proposed. The vote has not yet been taken in the Senate making the amendment a part of the bill.

Mr. WALSH. I inquire of the Chair, then, whether a vote on the motion to adopt the amendment of the committee as amended by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina is in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is now in order, and it is the question before the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Upon the adoption of that amendment, would my amendment then be in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It would be in order. The question before the Senate is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee as amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina.

Mr. WALSH. I desire to state, then, that if the Senate is prepared to vote on that motion, I shall be very glad to yield, and to resume what I have to say about the matter upon the conclusion of the vote.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana will be recognized.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, what is the question now before the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question before the Senate is the amendment of the committee as amended by the amendment offered by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. SIMMONS obtained the floor.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. CLAPP. Mr. President, before the vote is taken, as I expect to vote against the amendment and the bill, I desire to place in the RECORD my reasons for doing so.

I shall not at this time discuss at length the merits of the bill seeking to repeal the exemption clause of the Panama Canal act. I may refer to one or two reasons urged in favor of the bill; but so far as any treaty right is concerned, I shall not waste any time on that phase of the question, because I think now, outside of a very limited number, no one seriously contends that there are any treaty obligations standing in the way of our granting freedom from tolls either to our coastwise trade or to our over-seas trade.

My conclusion in that respect is borne out even by the position almost universally taken by those who in this debate have favored the repeal of free tolls and the complacency with which those who favor the tolls exemption accept the pending amendment. It is either the abandonment of all claims that the treaty interferes with free tolls or else it is evidence that the pending amendment is in the nature of a sham.

Dealing with the economic phase of this question, we find that some years ago we began the construction of the Panama Canal. I have voted for every appropriation that has been made for the canal. There was but one justification for our taking several hundred million dollars of the money of the American people to build this canal, and that was on the theory, wise or unwise, that the facilitation of water transportation is a general benefit in developing a factor in competition with the railroads. It is the same justification which we urge for annually taking millions of the people's money to develop our waterways, harbors, and canals, like the great "Soo" Canal, that such development may facilitate water transportation and result in the general cheapening of transportation.

Of course, I realize that the trip of the Oregon around Cape Horn developed a sentiment in favor of the canal, but I think everyone upon reflection realizes that every outpost which a nation holds, every over-sea coast or territory which a nation holds, is a liability and not an asset, for such over-sea coast requires protection, and in proof of this we are confronted today with the proposition that we are obliged to increase our Navy, not because the canal has or will prove a military advantage, but because we must have a greater Navy to protect it.

The fact is that, notwithstanding the sentiment, the people of this country, and especially the people of the great Middle West, had determined upon the building of the canal before the trip of the Oregon, because they believed that the canal would in a general way somewhat relieve them from the cost of transportation by making the coastwise water transportation through the canal a competitive factor, a principle that was emphasized in the speech made by President Wilson during the campaign. This purpose of the people had been thwarted and retarded by the railroad interests which, of course, feared such competition, and the trip of the Oregon doubtless developed a sentiment which made it possible for the people to begin sooner the construction of the canal, and they bore the burden of the construction in the belief that it would result in a benefit to the people in transportation, just as they bore the burden of the cost of developing other water transportation.

We went on and built the canal. It is almost ready to be used, and now we are asked to abandon the principle for which we built the canal and to make the great expenditure of no practical benefit in relieving the people of the burdens of transportation rates through competition.

Before the last Democratic convention was held at Baltimore free tolls to our coastwise trade had been the subject of consideration in the House, and a Democratic House had finally decided in favor of free tolls. The bill was pending in the Senate when the Democratic convention was held, and that convention declared, among other things, for free tolls for our coastwise trade. Subsequently the Senate passed the bill, largely by the aid of Democratic votes, and its passage through both Houses had been secured in spite of the opposition of the same interests which had so long delayed the building of the canal itself. It strikes me that it is a reflection upon the intelligence of the delegates to the Baltimore convention for the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] to say that they knew nothing about the status of that matter.

Pending in that form, the Baltimore convention passed a resolution in favor of toll exemption; and now, at the demand of the President, we are confronted with the proposition of repealing the toll-exemption clause and repudiating that declaration in the Democratic platform; and to justify the repudiation of the solemn declaration in the platform, those who, obedient to the President's demand, are working to repeal the exemption shield themselves behind the cry of "ship subsidy," because the Democratic platform contains a plank opposed to ship subsidy, and they insist that the two planks are inconsistent. When men have no excuse they always give a poor one, and the character of the purpose can usually be easily seen in the character of the excuse. Now, upon this issue there are two distinct groups of Democratic Senators. One group repudiates the Baltimore platform as to free tolls but undertakes to justify such repudiation by quoting the Democratic platform against ship subsidy. This analysis of a platform, even if accurate, would leave each man, influenced as he might be by motives good, bad, or indifferent, to determine what part of a platform he might repudiate and what he should retain; but it goes further than that—it discredits the witness and the testimony. What a spectacle it is to see a man stand with the platform in his hand, one portion of which he is repudiating, and then, reading from the same platform, justifying his act of repudiation. Such testimony would hardly command attention in the court of a justice of the peace. It is true that the Democratic Party, from time immemorial, has stood against ship subsidy; but if the deepening of rivers, improving of harbors, and building of canals like the "Soo" Canal is to be classed as ship subsidy, then the attitude of the Democratic Party in accepting the benefits of such appropriations challenges the integrity of its repeated declarations against ship subsidy, and we all know that such appropriations never have been considered as within the purview of what is called "ship subsidy," although the benefits from such appropriation, in the first instance, go directly to the owners of the boats. But I have no time to discuss with a man what the balance of his platform means, when he selects one plank to repudiate and another plank on which to base his justification.

But there is another group of Democrats, who believe in standing by their party pledge, and to them I propose to address briefly some remarks upon this phase of this question. There is absolutely no inconsistency between the plank in the Democratic platform which denounces ship subsidy and the plank in the platform which declares for the continuation of toll exemption in the Panama Canal. There is absolutely nothing inconsistent in those two planks.

As pointed out so ably by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] yesterday, the term "ship subsidy" came to have a distinct meaning in the American political vocabulary. It meant a direct bonus or gratuity to the owners of ships or to the owners of freight carried by ships. In that sense the Democratic Party has stood against ship subsidy almost from time immemorial, and in that sense the Democratic Party was justified in putting in its Baltimore platform a plank against ship subsidy.

But equally from time immemorial the Democratic Party as a party has stood for and shared in the fruits of the appropriations from the Federal Treasury to develop transportation facilities in this country. At every session, with scarce an exception, there comes into this body a bill from the House of Representatives appropriating millions of dollars from the Federal Treasury to deepen our waterways, to make canals of our rivers, and to improve our harbors, but all for the free use of the owners of the boats, based upon the theory that the water transportation so benefited by Federal appropriation finds a reflected benefit to the people in the cheapening of transportation, upon the principle that water transportation as a competitive factor is the surest and most efficient means of reducing transportation rates. If money appropriated by the General Government for improvements is to be designated as a subsidy because a few people, the owners of boats, get the first direct benefit of it, then the attitude of the Democratic Party in the past in securing such appropriations would challenge the integrity of that plank in their platform against subsidy. But this has never been recognized as a test by which to measure the definition of a subsidy, because every dollar of the hundreds of millions we have appropriated for the improvement of rivers and harbors, canals and locks has of course, in the first instance, been a direct benefit to the owners of the boats using these facilities, and yet no one has ever thought of characterizing these benefits as a subsidy, and no Democrat will be found opposing upon that ground the rivers and harbors bill now pending in the House.

There is already on its way from the House of Representatives to this Chamber—and perhaps it may have reached this Chamber—a bill appropriating almost a hundred million dollars to deepen the great waterways of this country, in order that the owners of boats may have without charge to them those facilities which, without this appropriation, they would not have. Are the Democrats who have stood on this floor and in the repudiation of their platform undertaken to shield themselves behind the false cry of subsidy, going to vote against that bill and its provisions simply because the benefits from that bill, if any, will accrue, first, directly to the few men or corporations who own and control those boats?

I think, if the record of bills for rivers and harbors were analyzed, it would be found that those sections of the country represented to-day by those Democrats who are seeking to raise the false cry of subsidy have been the beneficiaries of those appropriations equally with, if not in excess of, other sections of the United States, and when that bill comes before the Senate they will be asked as to the benefits given to their section, and whether or not they are to be regarded as subsidies.

When a Democrat who holds a discredited platform in his hand, then turns to the platform to prove the attitude and traditions of his party I have nothing to say; he stands here with his evidence, his own witness, discredited; but to the Democrat who comes here standing upon the platform of the Baltimore convention, I say there is absolutely no inconsistency between those two planks in that platform.

We have had some very novel arguments advanced in this debate. We have had a new rule laid down. In the first place, the President of the United States comes before Congress and asks Congress to repeal the tolls-exemption clause of the act of 1912. I would be the last man on earth to criticize the man who finds that he has been mistaken and wants to reverse his judgment, but I want to say that, in my humble opinion, while a man is not called upon to give a reason for his original position, when he is confronted with a reversal of that position it is due that he give a reason for the reversal, and so far there has been no reason assigned for this reversal.

If this had been a plank which had found its way into the platform disassociated from pending issues, without thought or consideration, and had been overlooked during the campaign, then it might, perhaps, be ignored now without assigning a reason; but that is not the history of this plank. This plank was developed at a time when the question of toll exemption had been fought out in a Democratic House, and was being fought out in a committee of the Senate. No one could say it was an obscure subject. The halls of this Capitol had been thronged with the representatives of interests which had first fought against building the canal, and then naturally fought against the insertion of the principle of toll exemption, and it was Democratic votes in the House and Democratic votes in this body that saved the toll-exemption clause in the law of 1912. Speaking now from memory, but I think it is accurate, every Democrat in this body who was present and voted voted in favor of free tolls.

Not only was that plank the subject of agitation in Congress, but, more than that, it was the plank singled out by the Democratic candidate for President of the United States, and a discussion and analysis of that plank was laid before the American people by him in public speech during the campaign as a reason why he ought to be elected President of this Republic. Do you call it inadvertence when the candidate for the high office of President of the United States singles out a plank of his platform and shows why that plank should be there, and then emphasizes the use of that plank with the assertion that a platform "is not molasses made to catch flies"? And yet some of those Democrats who seek to repudiate this plank in their platform, in view of its genesis, publicity and emphasis laid upon it by the President, still call it a "joker" inserted in their platform by some one not friendly to the party. We might well inquire of those who thus characterize this plank if they considered it was a "joker" when used by the President during the campaign, and was it then used as a "joker" by some one unfriendly to the party?

Suddenly, and almost without a moment's warning, we were confronted with the request of the President to repeal this provision of the law. And what reason does he give?

According to the statement of one of the oldest and most venerable Democrats of this body, it is no longer necessary for a President to give any reason for what he does, nor is it necessary for a Democratic Senator to inquire as to whether a reason exists. I want to refer to the speech of the distinguished senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], in which he used this somewhat remarkable expression in speaking of the President:

> I have felt that as the first Democrat in half a century—real Democrat, I mean, for I never regarded Cleveland as a Democrat—it is the duty of every man who claims to be a Democrat to support him in all his policies, wise or unwise.

I want to say to the Democratic Senators in this body that that is a novel definition of Democracy. You may ask yourselves mentally what interest I have in the welfare of the Democratic Party. I have this interest: No political party in power can make a mistake without hurting somebody besides that party. A political party in power has in its keeping the interests of the people of this country; and the Democratic Party, ever since its origin, has at least put forth the claim that it was the party of the people. Yet you have a man in the White House to-day who, if not in speech at least in attitude, claims that it is a question for the party to settle and that the party will be responsible for its own mistakes. It is true the party is liable for its own mistakes, and in that sense responsible; but a party can not escape responsibility to the entire people. While this is fairly deducible as the attitude of the President, time and again in the last few weeks Senators have gone further than that and have said, in terms, "This is our responsibility. If our party makes a mistake we will take the responsibility." I want to say to you that no party in power can, in that spirit, take the responsibility for mistakes. Mistakes are visited upon all the people of this country alike, and the man who takes that position flies in the very face of the traditional fundamental principles of Democracy and of the Democratic Party. You can not reconcile the declaration so often put forth by Democrats that theirs is the party of the people, the party of service to the people, with the declaration that it is your duty to follow a man whether he acts wisely or unwisely.

Much as I esteem President Wilson, I want to say to the Democratic Senators here that he is one of the last men in this country of whom any Democratic Senator should say, "I will follow him, whether he acts wisely or unwisely"; to whom any Democratic Senator should commit the keeping and care of his party policy, his party traditions, or the welfare of this country, which it has been so often asserted is inseparably interwoven in the welfare of the party itself. No man can read the earlier works of Mr. Wilson without reaching the conclusion that Mr. Wilson is no more of a Democrat in the broad sense of that term than is the distinguished senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], the distinguished ex-President, Mr. Taft, or that great opponent of real democracy, Alexander Hamilton. Running through every line of his earlier works is a spirit and doctrine that can not be harmonized with the broad doctrine of government by the people. You take his later works, and here and there you find sentiments tending toward democracy, but even there you find a hesitation and halt that shows that he never has entirely broken away from the limitations of his earlier views, and, much as we may admire the man, we can not recognize in him an exponent of democracy as taught by Jefferson and others.

I want to say to you, Democratic Senators, that such a man, no matter how high his ideals, is not a safe leader, and you are rapidly going the same way that another party went because it, too, permitted one man to assume in effect to say, "I am the party." That sentiment and spirit is foreign to the spirit of our Government, and it is especially foreign to the spirit and principles of the party to which you belong.

It spells misfortune for the party and for the man himself when any man who happens to be President assumes that he is bigger than all the rest of his party. It was this mistaken view that lay at the basis of Mr. Taft's misfortunes and the misfortunes of his party. It is this same mistaken view on the part of your President that has brought your party to the position where the evidence of his coming defeat is so plain that the reactionary element in the country is pressing its claim for political favor with a hand so bold that it has forgotten its cunning.

Turn to the President's message, and not a reason is given why the Democratic Party and the American people should be placed in the attitude of repudiating a great principle that every one of the three great parties, either in its platform or the declaration of its candidate, had declared a part and parcel of its party faith and party principle, except the simple declaration of repudiation of what had already been the subject of discussion and contest and exalted by the President himself in public speech as an argument why he should be elected, unless we accept as a reason his declaration that "it is necessary in support of a foreign policy." But that has already been repudiated by the Senators favoring the repeal in their acquiescence in an amendment which they would, at least, have the public believe and which they insist is a reservation of the right to allow free tolls, the assertion of which the President gives as his sole reason for repudiating the platform, which had been paraded before the public as a reason why he should be elected. Without in the least questioning his integrity, in fact, yielding to no man my respect for him as a man of ideals, it is not safe for Senators intrusted with the interests of the American people to say of such a man, "I believe we should follow him whether his policies are wise or unwise."

Some novel features have been introduced into this debate which have taxed the ingenuity of those who have introduced them and shows the folly of men trying to assert a reason for action when no reason exists.

One of these is found in the claim of the Democratic friends of repeal that to grant free passage to our coastwise ships would be favoring monopoly. This places them in a peculiar position. We have already passed a law which forbids the use of that canal to any ship "owned, chartered, operated, or controlled" by any person or company violating the antitrust law. The Democratic Party will be in power when this canal is opened, and the assertion that free tolls will go to monopoly is a serious reflection upon the purpose of the party with reference to the enforcement of the law referred to. Another is found in an incident which occurred last evening.

The distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] was advocating and seeking to justify the repudiation of the platform, and was interrupted by the senior Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN] with a question. The senior Senator from Oklahoma inquired:

> Is it not a fact that in not one of the 48 States had the Democratic Party expressed itself upon this plank before it was adopted at the Baltimore convention?

To which the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES] replied, with assurance, as though that settled the whole question:

> Not one.

That introduces a new rule in the study of platforms. If that rule is to obtain, then hereafter when a campaign speaker stands upon a platform and holds up to his audience the platform he must have proof that each plank in that platform was first authorized by some recognized authority from each State. The voter who in his humble home and by his fireside studies the platform will be unable to tell anything about what is to be observed and what is to be repudiated, because he will not have access to the information as to how many of the sovereign States have first authorized the incorporation of the plank in the platform.

Mr. REED. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. HOLLIS in the chair). Does the Senator from Minnesota yield to the Senator from Missouri?

Mr. CLAPP. With pleasure.

Mr. REED. Does not the Senator clearly see that that suggestion embodies a new application of the principle of initiative and referendum?

Mr. CLAPP. Yes. The Senator from Oklahoma and myself have believed for some time that this should be a government by the people; that political parties should be the instrumentalities and not the masters of the people; that public officers should be the servants and not the masters of the people; but I never yet in my wildest dreams concerning the initiative supposed it would be carried to the point of preceding the formation of a national political platform, and especially where there was no means by which the public could ascertain what particular planks the local organization had first agreed upon. Under my theory of the right of the people to pass upon these questions, the question would not be, "What has been said before the platform was adopted?" but "What has been said to the people after the platform was adopted, and what was their verdict upon the platform after it was laid before them, especially when explained and expounded by a presidential candidate?" That is the only true test. Think of justifying the repudiation of a platform on the suggestion that the various planks had not been submitted to State conventions before they were worked into a national platform!

The trouble is that whenever a man takes a pretended reason that has no foundation he gets deeper into the mire every time he turns around.

Another novel test of platforms has been introduced by the Senator who wrote to the various delegates to the Baltimore convention and asked them if they were willing to have the platform reversed as to free tolls. Now, the trouble is, those gentlemen finished their jurisdiction over the platform when they wrote it. It was submitted then to the people, explained and expounded by the presidential candidate, and the proper ones to ask as to what they think of the platform and whether it should be repudiated or not would not be the gentlemen who made it, but the voters who accepted it with the exposition and explanation of the candidate for President. Again is evidence given that when a man has no valid reason and flounders around to get one the more he flounders the deeper he sinks.

There is no reason yet advanced for the violation and repudiation of the Baltimore platform except that under this new theory of Democracy, where "I must follow the man, wise or unwise," the man to whom that authority is ascribed has said, "This law must be repealed."

I want to say to my Democratic friends that you can no more expect to maintain party supremacy under such leadership than could the Republican Party. There is no excuse for it on the part of the Democratic Party, for you had two object lessons before you—one the fate of the Republican Party, and the other a great disaster that has recently occurred in New England. I refer to the New Haven Railroad episode. A more pitiful spectacle was never presented than the sight of great business men coming up on the stand as directors of a great corporation, and facing the shame and disaster of that corporation with the miserable apology, "I left it all to Mr. Morgan." Men selected because of their supposed business acumen and sagacity faced that humiliation and shame because they abandoned their responsibility and left it all to some one else.

There never yet was a man so big but that there are some things in the world bigger than he. So far as a man is justified by his own attitude and opinion in passing criticism upon another, it seems to me that a Senator who says, "I know nothing about this; I have no opinion upon this; I will leave it all to the President," is as recreant to his public trust as the director of a great corporation who says, "I know nothing of this. I take no responsibility. I leave it all to the president of the corporation." Senators are elected because of their supposed familiarity with public questions. Each State has two Senators upon a theory that there should be developed a broad equation of purpose and judgment, that all should not be left to one man.

If there could be an instance where you have before your very eyes the danger involved in leaving to one man to say what shall be done in these great affairs, you have it to-day in the history of the New Haven Railroad. No man is big enough for such a responsibility. You were sent here that you might bring your experience and your judgment to bear upon these questions. What shall be said of a man who has spent his life in public service, and who then folds his hands and says of a man who never had any public experience except two years' service as governor of a State, "I believe it is my duty to follow him whether he acts wisely or unwisely"?

I must hasten along, as I have already extended my remarks beyond my original intention. What I now desire to speak of is the proposed amendment.

The Senate is divided upon the question of our rights in the canal into two divisions. There are in the Senate those who believe that the United States Government has a perfect right under these treaties, and notwithstanding these treaties, to allow its shipping, domestic or over sea, to go through the Panama Canal without the payment of tolls. There is another group in this body who believe that that right has been granted away in these treaties. The question whether or not the United States has the right to impose tolls, whether it has the right to regulate its own property, or whether, in an unguarded moment, it has given away that right, is the fundamental question that should divide Senators upon this floor; not the question whether to-day or to-morrow we will deal with the economic question of exemption from tolls.

To-morrow, if we have made an economic mistake in granting exemption from tolls, we can reverse that policy; a year from now, if we believe we have made an economic mistake in granting exemption from tolls, we can reverse the policy; but if we make a mistake to-day with reference to the rights of this Republic in that canal we never can reverse that mistake without more or less serious complications and possible loss of honor. Then, while there is another division of those Senators who would repeal exemption from tolls upon an economic basis, and those who would repeal exemption from tolls because they believe we have no right to grant exemption from tolls, the line of division should not go between those Senators.

The line of division when the right of this country is questioned, as it is in this proceeding, should be the line that would separate those on the one hand who believe we have the right, and on the other hand those who believe we have given away the right. Then, if we have the right, and to-morrow or next year we should feel that it was an economic mistake to grant exemption from tolls, we could withdraw the exemption; but once you make a concession here that we have not this right you have made a concession that you never can withdraw without more or less national embarrassment. Then, I say that those Senators who believe that we have the right should be aligned on one side, and those who believe we have not the right should be aligned on the other side, that we might preserve the right and later deal with the economic question; but we find here the alignment neglecting and subordinating this fundamental principle of right or wrong to the mere temporary makeshift of whether to-day we will withdraw exemption from tolls, or whether we will do it to-morrow.

If exemption from tolls is an economic mistake, then I believe that no Senator who believes that we have a right to pass our ships through the canal free can justify himself in surrendering that right to gain the temporary advantage of to-day, repealing what he regards as an economic mistake by alignment with those who in the very bottom of their hearts believe that we have not the right to grant this favor to our own ships, if we so desire. Once again we find here a division, not on fundamental lines, but upon artificial and purely temporary lines.

If there had been nothing said; if Congress of its own motion, or the President of his own suggestion, influenced purely by economic considerations, had suggested the repeal of the exemption from tolls, I am not so certain but that in view of the vast cost of the canal I should be in favor of at least imposing some burden until we could ascertain by experiment what the relation of tolls to the maintenance of the canal might be; but we could do that any time. We are not, however, repealing the tolls exemption under those conditions. Now, contemplate the condition under which we are repealing the exemption, and see what is left of a mere suggestion—not the assertion of a claim, but the mere suggestion of a claim, of our right to use our own property as we may deem in the best interest of our people.

You have to read this amendment in the light of the history which precedes its adoption. What does that history disclose? It discloses a condition where there is alleged to be such an overmastering danger to this Republic that a great political party is forced to place itself in alignment, at least in the public mind, with the railroad interests of this country to secure the repeal of this tolls exemption, for in proportion as a burden is imposed upon shipping, shipping is, to that extent, less able to act as a factor in reducing rates. Not only is this situation presented, but that party is at the same time forced into the attitude of repudiation of this solemn pledge, made more solemn by its candidate for the Presidency pointing it out and calling attention to it. That is no ordinary condition, I want to remind the Senate, but a condition where to every outsider it must seem that the pressure for this repeal must have been simply terrific.

Every man in the Senate and every man in this land knows that certain great interests in the country fought the building of this canal. They fought exemption from tolls. You can not escape the judgment of the American people that consciously or unconsciously you are favoring the great transportation companies by repealing the exemption from tolls. You are also thrown in the attitude of repudiating your solemn platform pledge; and yet it is suggested that action taken under such pressure as that can be avoided in the mind of the world by a mere suggestion—not the claim of the right, but the suggestion that if there is any right that right still exists.

Not one of its supporters have dared to say that it amounts to the assertion of a claim of right. The Democratic Senators who favor it can not make such a claim, because it would be a most flagrant and uncalled-for criticism upon the President, almost amounting to an insult, for he has said that free tolls must be repealed in order to enable him to deal with a foreign policy. In other words, he has said, in effect, that free tolls must be repealed as a concession to some foreign Government. He does not say what one. To repeal free tolls and not make that concession would be little short of an affront to the President himself, and we can not imagine that those who so complacently follow his command would be guilty of such an affront, for surely he would not stand for an amendment to an act purporting to be a concession which in fact was not.

No. We do not act here to-day in our own right and capacity. We are acting for 90,000,000 people. It seems to me the man who feels that this right is still in the United States should be slow indeed to surrender that right; and yet that is what we do under the so-called Simmons amendment. Why, if this alignment of great interests and this repudiation of party platform is simply to correct an economic policy, it could be corrected some other day as well as now. No. The Simmons amendment is absolutely meaningless. It is simply a play upon words, part of those favoring repeal claiming one thing and the other part claiming something else, but neither insisting that it was an assertion of a right. That was proven last night out of the mouths of some of those who defended this amendment when it was asserted that the original amendment was a claim of right and the admission made that that claim could not and would not be accepted by those who believe that the free tolls should be repealed on account of treaty obligations, and that the amendment as now submitted was agreed upon as a compromise to get votes to repeal the tolls-exemption provision—it was necessary to abandon even a claim of right.

Paraphrasing the language of President Wilson in his New Jersey speech regarding the platform, and reversing the term when he said the Democratic platform was not "molasses to catch flies," the men in control of this measure are much more frank, for they admit by their excuse for its terms that this amendment is molasses with which to "catch flies" for the repeal of the tolls exemption. Here we have a situation where one form of amendment was, perhaps, asserting a right of the United States to exempt its coastwise trade, but that amendment was rejected by the leaders of the movement to repeal free tolls, by those who insist we have no right, and this proposed amendment has been modified so as to be acceptable to men who insist we have no right, and yet it will be insisted by some that it is a reservation. Thus is confusion worse confounded.

We have debated this question here for weeks. Why all this debate? Why all this difference of opinion? Simply because in the early history of this transaction we neglected to use language that would admit of but one construction.

I had hoped that these weeks of debate would teach us one thing. While they might not enlighten us in our views as to the right of the American people under this treaty, I thought they would at least teach us the necessity from now on of using terms and expressions in regard to which there can be no question as to what they mean.

Think of weeks of weary debate over the language of documents, and concluding the transaction with a document framed in language so ambiguous and so doubtful as to be the subject of dispute among those who are framing and placing it in legislation!

We are told in an undertone that foreign dangers demand that we surrender our honor and sovereignty. We may almost feel that we have reached that period of decadence where we are purchasing peace; and yet we propose to celebrate this year the one hundredth anniversary of a peace won by the valor of our ancestors. Amid the very scenes of this celebration we propose, forgetting their valor and their patriotism, to have peace from now on, not won by valor, but secured by the surrender of American honor and American sovereignty in the Canal Zone.

Let us, in this humiliating scene, in the closing hours of this great tragedy, if we are to attempt to reserve anything, at least once and for all put it so plain that no subsequent Senate can spend weeks in debating pro and con what we mean by the language we use. Vain indeed has been the lesson of the past if, with all this complication piled upon complication by the use of obscure language, we now pile another complication upon those already existing.

So I had hoped that in this instance we would at last reach a point where those who believed we had not given away our rights would make an assertion of our claim. There will be time enough afterwards to abandon a false economic policy if we have embarked upon one, but no time afterwards to correct, without more or less humiliation and possible charge of want of integrity, the surrender of our rights if we surrender them at this time.

Talk about arbitration! What will there be left to arbitrate after this amendment is adopted? Imagine, if you can, a lawyer, a jurist, going before such a commission and presenting the claims of this Republic, being met by this pitiful address of the President, and the meaningless array of words in the form of this amendment, and nowhere, from start to finish, a plain assertion that we have a right left to arbitrate.

If we are to give this up, let us give it up once and for all, subject only to the power of Congress again, ignoring complications, ignoring embarrassments, to resume the right, because we will have the power to resume it; or, if we want the pathway of honor unembarrassed by complications and ambiguous positions, let us plant ourselves to-day upon a foundation so plain that no Senate can ever spend weeks again in debating what is meant by the language we employ.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] in his speech this morning referred again to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and said that he had spent some time in trying to ascertain the antecedents of a gentleman who offered a resolution in the House some years ago to the effect that said treaty be abrogated. He discovered that that gentleman, now deceased, formerly resided in the State of Missouri, and had at one time been probate judge, afterwards prosecuting attorney, and left the inference that his claim to fame rested upon the proposition that he undertook to annul the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. In other words, the inference to be drawn from the statement of the Senator from Connecticut was that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty at the time we executed the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was regarded as a substantial, binding obligation upon this country, and that only one person could be found who would offer a resolution to the effect that it should be annulled. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] said that that was overwhelmingly voted down in a few moments. That is now discovered to be a mistake and the Senator's memory was at fault. The Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] a few days ago also referred to the fact that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was a substantial consideration which went into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that in consideration of England's yielding upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty we had granted these rights which now to deny would be an act of bad faith.

Sir Edward Grey, in his note to Mr. Bryce, seems to have laid the foundation for this argument in a statement which I will take the time of the Senate to read:

> If the rules set out in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty secure to Great Britain no more than most-favored-nation treatment, the value of the consideration given for superseding the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not apparent to His Majesty's Government.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty was made in April, 1850. It was made with the view of immediate action for the building of this canal. It was contemplated that the provisions of that treaty would insure reasonable dispatch for the purpose of uniting the two oceans. This is fully developed in the correspondence of Mr. Blaine with Mr. Lowell, and the correspondence of Mr. Frelinghuysen later; also in documents which will be found among our public records. But during the 50 years which elapsed nothing whatever was done. Great Britain gave no encouragement in any direction. The treaty remained a dead letter so far as any action upon the part of any Government was concerned, and while it was not contemplated that either the United States or Great Britain should affirmatively build the canal, the treaty did provide for the encouragement of those nations which should show a disposition to go into the enterprise and that these two nations should protect them.

But 50 years passed and nothing was done. The Senate of the United States, through its committee, one of the strong committees of the Senate, spoke upon this subject, and as this, by men whose obscurity is not a subject for discussion or investigation upon the part of the Senator from Connecticut, I desire to read a portion of it. This report was made in 1891. They say:

> We think it can be justly affirmed that the convention of 1850 has become obsolete, for the convention was based upon the idea of an immediate prosecution of the enterprise of creating this great international water highway, and that neither Government would be found, so far as it regarded the particular question, apart from other considerations, to consider its stipulations as longer binding.
> Not only this consideration is to be taken into view, for the course of events in the enterprise and operations of nations has changed entirely the grand commercial situation of the world. The Suez Canal has been constructed and the Government of Great Britain has become, in substance and effect, its dominant and controlling proprietor, thus securing to that Government, in a very large degree, the control of the east-and-west commerce of the world between the southern and eastern shores of Asia and the whole of Europe, and to a considerable degree the eastern shores of the United States and the other American Republics.
> We think it may be safely affirmed that had the Government of Great Britain in 1850 been in possession of the Suez Canal, the United States would never have consented that any canal across the American isthmus should be under the joint control of Great Britain and the United States, or under any other European control. In this respect, therefore, the immediate declarations and engagements of 1850 between the two Governments in regard to an isthmian canal have become entirely inapplicable, and justly entitle the United States to give its separate aid and encouragement to the construction of such a canal.

The Senate will observe the strong and forceful language of this report, and that is that the treaty had become obsolete, and that there was no longer any inhibition or obstacle standing in the way of the United States to engage separate and alone in the construction of this canal, and that was a number of years before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated. For years before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was concluded the Clayton-Bulwer treaty stood under condemnation by our ablest and most conservative men.

But that is not all—

Says the Senate report—

> One of the provisions of the convention of 1850 most important to the United States and to the preservation of the republican governments on this continent was that which declared that neither party to the convention should "occupy or fortify or colonize or assume to exercise any dominion over Nicaragua, Costa Rica, the Mosquito Coast, or any part of Central America."

I want the Senate to bear in mind that reading of the provisions from the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, because I am going to show in a few moments not only from this report but from undisputed historic facts, historic facts recorded not only by American historians but English historians, that upon three separate and distinct occasions England violated that provision of the treaty, and that she had notice of the fact that the United States, as a Government, regarded it as a violation upon her part long years before the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made.

Indeed, sir, Stephen A. Douglas called the attention of this Government within three years after the making of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty to the fact that it had been violated and was then subject to abrogation and cancellation upon the part of this Government for disregard upon the part of England.

After quoting further facts they say:

> At that time the "settlement" of British subjects, as it was called, at the Belize, on the coast of Central America, was of the smallest dimensions, and had no substance or form of a territorial dominion. British woodcutters were there under an ancient Spanish license of timber cutting, and nothing more. These settlers in a country not belonging to the British Crown had, off and on, attempted to form a kind of local government for preserving order among themselves, and, after going through various phases, had reached the point in 1850 of some local magistrates and an imperial superintendent, merely and clearly for the purpose of preserving internal order among the English adventurers engaged in the lumber trade in that foreign country.
> This was substantially the condition of things when the convention of 1850 was entered into.
> The next step taken, after the convention of 1850, was in 1853, when a legislative assembly was constituted to manage the affairs of the settlement. This was followed by a convention between Great Britain and Guatemala in 1859 for the establishment of the boundaries between what the treaty chose to call "Her Britannic Majesty's settlement and possessions in the Bay of Honduras" and the territories of Guatemala. The country, or the largest part of it, belonged to Guatemala as the successor to all the sovereign territorial rights of Spain in that region; but by this treaty that which was before a licensed industrial establishment became instantly a possession of the British Crown.
> All this has taken place systematically and persistently notwithstanding the declaration of Her Majesty's Government that it should not "colonize or assume or exercise any dominion over * * * the Mosquito coast or any port of Central America."
> If these proceedings of her Majesty's Government, in respect of one of the most important subjects of the convention and in absolute opposition to it, do not discharge the United States from all and every of their declarations and engagements stated in that convention, it is impossible to conceive what could.

A treaty wholly obsolete, three times violated, it was quite proper for the committee of the Senate of the United States to say if that does not relieve us from its obligation it is impossible to conceive what would, and so they say:

> In view of all these considerations, the committee is of opinion that the United States is at present under no obligation, measured either by the terms of the convention, the principles of public law, or good morals to refrain from promoting, in any way that it may deem best for its just interests, the construction of this canal, without regard to anything contained in the convention of 1850.

Mr. POINDEXTER. I wish the Senator would state what was the committee and who were the Senators who made the report.

Mr. BORAH. I shall do so. I thank you.

Mr. REED. What is the book?

Mr. BORAH. It is from Senate Report No. 1944, Fifty-first Congress, second session, filed January 12, 1891.

Now, Mr. President, there is no mistake about that language. There is no mistake about what this report intended to do and the results which should follow. That was a solemn report of a committee of the Senate of the United States to the effect that in morals and in public law and under the terms of the convention far back of 1901 we were absolutely relieved from the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Who was it who said it? John Sherman, chairman of the committee, not a radical, a Secretary of State afterwards, and of long experience, most conservative in his dealing with foreign powers, but always an American; George F. Edmunds, recognized in this country for 50 years not only as a most conservative statesman, but as one of the great constitutional lawyers and one of the leading authorities upon international law, and this was not said in debate or amid the intemperate environments which might color political gatherings, but to this document these men attach their signatures and plant it affirmatively in the chronicles of their country; William P. Frye, whom we all know; William M. Evarts, afterwards Secretary of State, a lawyer of international reputation; J. N. Dolph, not so well known as Mr. Evarts and Mr. Sherman, but those who did know J. N. Dolph know that he was one of the greatest lawyers of the Pacific coast; John T. Morgan, and who in the Senate could hesitate to take the name of John T. Morgan as to our treaty obligations where a question of national honor was involved or of nicety as to our obligations; Joseph E. Brown; H. B. Payne; J. B. Eustis.

That was a unanimous report, no party division, made by the distinguished members of the Foreign Relations Committee under an order of the Senate passed instructing them to investigate the conditions, and what, if any, embarrassment stood in the way of the United States engaging upon this enterprise of its own motion.

The Senator from Connecticut and those interested in this discussion need not go to the great State of Missouri to hunt out some gentleman more or less obscure who had the temerity, as they seem to insinuate, to offer a resolution for its abrogation. Behind him stood the authority of the greatest names in the Senate.

The Clayton-Bulwer treaty from that hour was not regarded in this country as of any real binding force or obligation; and if Great Britain had intimated to the United States that she would stand upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty and the rights under it and would not consent to its abrogation or supersession we would have given the formal notice necessary to abrogate it within a short period and in a most decisive way.

I now call attention to the language of another distinguished citizen and Secretary of State. Mr. Blaine 10 years before this report of the treaty of 1901 had said:

> This convention was made more than 30 years ago, under exceptional and extraordinary conditions which have long since ceased to exist—conditions which at best were temporary in their nature, and which can never be reproduced.
> A more comprehensive objection to the treaty is urged by this Government. Its provisions embody a misconception of the relative positions of Great Britain and the United States with respect to the interests of each Government in questions pertaining to this continent. The Government of the United States has no occasion to disavow an aggressive disposition. Its entire policy establishes its pacific character, and among its chief aims is to cultivate the most friendly and intimate relations with its neighbors, both independent and colonial. At the same time this Government, with respect to European States, will not consent to perpetuate any treaty that impeaches our right and long-established claim to priority on the American Continent.

No one need be unfamiliar with this letter of the brilliant Secretary, so long a leader in the political affairs of his country. This letter of Blaine found a ready response in the hearts of the American people.

Indeed, as early as 1857 Great Britain had full notice of our dissatisfaction with the treaty, as shown by Mr. Blaine's letter to Lowell under date of November 29, 1881, in which Mr. Blaine says, quoting from Lord Napier writing to Lord Clarendon under date of January 22, 1857:

> It is probable that if the pending discussion regarding Central America be not closed during the present summer, an attempt will be made in the next session of Congress to set aside the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. * * * There can be no doubt of the views of the President and Cabinet on this matter.

In 1880 Mr. Cox, from the Committee on Foreign Affairs of the House of Representatives, submitted a report recommending a general resolution directing the President to take steps for the formal and final abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, it being recognized and claimed in said report that all that was necessary was formal notice; that the grounds for abrogation were substantial and sufficient.

Mr. Shackleford in 1900, upon the part of the minority of the House committee, made a report in which he said:

> The Clayton-Bulwer treaty as is so clearly shown by Mr. Hepburn long ago ceased to have any binding force by reason of the conduct of Great Britain. That being true, we should strictly adhere to the Monroe doctrine and stand by our traditional policy that Europe will not be permitted to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. It is to the Monroe doctrine that we as a Republic must look for safety. We should never under any circumstances even tacitly admit that Europe has the right to so much as interrogate us on American questions, much less to limit our action.

There is a vast amount of evidence to the same purport. I wish now to call attention to a foreign writer upon this subject. I am sure that will appeal to some of our friends:

> From the very moment of exchanging ratifications and for 10 years thereafter this treaty was a Pandora's box of difficulties and misunderstandings, many of which remained undetermined till the treaty was abrogated. It is notorious that Great Britain violated it. At one time, indeed, the United States declared that the treaty had outlived its purpose and was voidable at its pleasure, and in accordance with this view negotiated a treaty with Nicaragua (the Frelinghuysen-Zavala convention, dated December 1, 1884), in which the United States engaged to build the canal at its own cost and to enter into a "perpetual alliance" with Nicaragua. While the latter convention was pending in the Senate for its "advice and consent" the political complexion of the Government changed, and President Cleveland, without expressing any opinion as to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, withdrew the Nicaragua convention from the Senate, principally on the ground that its provisions relating to an "alliance" offended against a long-standing policy of the United States. It was never resubmitted.
> Just how much of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, if any, was in force at the time it was superseded in 1901, and what fragments of it, if any, had any practical application to the radically changed conditions is one of the riddles of diplomacy which some modern Œdipus may solve.

That is quoted from a discussion of this subject by Mr. Butte.

Now, Mr. President, I want to go briefly to another phase of this question, and that is to the violation of this treaty by Great Britain. As we observed a few moments ago in reading the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, or the excerpts from it, there was an express provision in it against Great Britain's acquiring any further possessions and territory upon what is known as the Mosquito Coast and in Central America. Early in the eighteenth century the people along the Mosquito Coast had rather withdrawn from the sovereignty and dominion of the Spanish Government and had brought themselves together upon what was afterwards called the Mosquito Coast. This continued until 1740, when the aggressions of Great Britain upon the coast had become so pronounced that it led to a war between Spain and Great Britain.

In 1763 that controversy was ended by a treaty, which treaty was afterwards supplemented in 1783 and 1785. In 1814 there was another treaty entered into between Great Britain and Spain, in which treaty it was especially provided that thereafter Great Britain should be prohibited from acquiring any rights or interest, possession or settlement upon the Mosquito Coast or the islands adjacent thereto.

That, Mr. President, was the exact condition of affairs in Central America at the time when President Monroe announced his policy on the 2d day of December, 1823. I assert without fear of successful contradiction that at the time President Monroe announced the Monroe doctrine on the 2d day of December, 1823, Great Britain did not have the color of a right or of a possession upon the Mosquito Coast of Central America. But, Mr. President, within a few hours after the treaty of Guadalupe Hidalgo was signed between this country and Mexico, by which we took over California and New Mexico and other territory, the English fleet set sail from Vera Cruz for the coast of Central America, entered the mouth of the San Juan River, took possession of San Juan City and changed its name to Greytown, and established what is called a protectorate upon the Mosquito Coast. That protectorate was a fraud, a flimsy, diaphanous fraud, established in violation of the Monroe doctrine and for the purpose of forcing the conditions which were afterwards brought about by the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. It has always been so considered, except by a few Englishmen on both sides of the ocean.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the Senator's permission, I should like to call attention at this time to a reference made by Sir Hans Sloane, a distinguished writer, to some of the circumstances attending the coronation of the first Mosquito Indian selected by the British Government for the high office of King of the Mosquito Kingdom. I read:

> One of the Mosquito chiefs had been taken to Jamaica for the purpose of having him place his country under the protection of England. Sir Hans Sloane has left an account of how, having escaped from his keepers, "he pulled off the European clothes his friends had put on and climbed to the top of a tree."

[Laughter.]

Mr. BORAH. Yes, Mr. President; they were not able to make the European clothes stick on him, but they did make the English sovereignty stick to him. That is the only sovereignty that Great Britain had when we executed the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in 1850, that which she had seized in violation of the Monroe doctrine upon hearing that we had entered into treaty with Mexico, by which we acquired this territory and thereby might have an advantage in the affairs of Central America.

Mr. President, another instance: When the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was concluded Great Britain was occupying the island of Roatan, one of the Bay Islands, off the coast of Honduras.

She was desirous of retaining this island because of its strategic advantage to the San Juan River.

So on the 17th of July, 1852, England erected the Roatan and adjacent islands, known as the Bay Islands, into a British colony in defiance of the Monroe doctrine and the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. She continued to hold these islands for years in defiance of the express terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. British Honduras was first settled by some freebooters or pirates——

Mr. POINDEXTER. Buccaneers.

Mr. BORAH. Buccaneers. Spain sanctioned the British right for wood-cutting purposes, but Spain expressly reserved all sovereignty over the territory.

In 1821, upon the successful revolt from Spain of the Spanish colonies in Central America, the sovereignty over Belize passed from Spain, but did not pass to Great Britain. It passed to the Spanish colonies which had obtained their freedom. But Great Britain conducted her system of encroachment in violation of the Monroe doctrine.

In 1862, when this Republic was struggling for its life, dissevered and broken by its own warring factions, in violation of the Monroe doctrine and the express terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty Great Britain erected British Honduras, which had been in the beginning a mere freebooters' station, into a British colony. Thus, sir, the story runs—a story of broken faith and duplicity, and I challenge its contradiction.

Yet men will argue in plaintive tones and with apparent feeling that we must be regardful of the solemn obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which was never respected from the hour it was signed by Great Britain.

Within 48 hours after that treaty had been signed a British vessel fired upon an American vessel to compel it to pay toll to this fraudulent Mosquito king, and it never has had any sanctity except in the minds of a few American statesmen.

Mr. President, let me call attention now to another English writer upon this subject. I do this in order to engage the attention of some of our friends who have been greatly interested in the English view of this matter. I quote from Dr. Baty:

> The treaty of 1850, in its practical clauses (1 to 7), deals with Central America, and with Central America only. American capitalists were contemplating a Nicaraguan canal. Palmerston stupidly blocked it by invoking the "rights" of an engaging tribe of savages whom he suddenly discovered (without a scintilla of evidence) to be allies of Great Britain, and who have long since been willingly abandoned to Nicaragua. For the modest quid pro quo implied in the removal of this block, Mr. Clayton conceded the self-denying clauses of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850.
> In exchange for Britain's disclaimer of her shadowy protectorate in Mosquito, the States gave up the right to acquire control in all Central America.

Mr. President, our records here are well supplied with ample evidence of the fact that the claim of Great Britain to a protectorate over the Mosquito coast consisted of nothing in the world except Great Britain's marvelous capacity to make use of nothing in a diplomatic encounter.

Stephen A. Douglas said:

> As late as 1850 a convention was entered into between the Government of the United States and Great Britain called the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, every article and provision of which is predicated upon a practical negation and repudiation of what is known as the Monroe doctrine, as I shall conclusively establish before I close these remarks.

Now, mind you, this was a speech of Mr. Douglas made in the Senate in 1853, within three years after the signing of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

He says:

> Since the ratification of that treaty and in defiance of its express stipulations, as well as of the Monroe declaration, Great Britain has planted a new colony in Central America known as the colony of the Bay Islands.

In another speech about this time Mr. Douglas said:

> England seizes every island in the sea and rock upon our coast where she can plant a gun to intimidate us or annoy our commerce. Her policy has been to sieze every military and naval station the world over. * * * New treaties of friendship, seizure of islands, and erection of new colonies in violation of her treaties seem to be the order of the day. In view of this state of things I am in favor of meeting England as we meet a rival; meet her boldly, treat her justly and fairly, but make no humiliating concessions even for the sake of peace. She has as much reason to make concessions to us as we have to make them to her. I would not willingly disturb the peace of the world, but, sir, the Bay Island colony must be discontinued. It violates the treaty.

Yes, Mr. President, treat her honorably and fairly, but make no concessions of any of our rights. That was good doctrine in the days of Douglas, and it will be found in future years that it would have been a better doctrine for these days than the one which we are adopting. The failure to follow Douglas's advice is what has brought us to our embarrassing situation. We ought never to have made the Clayton-Bulwer treaty in the first place, and we ought to have promptly given notice of its denunciation at its first violation. You will recall what James Buchanan said, which has come very near to being a prophecy. He declared, in effect, that if Bulwer succeeded in getting through the Clayton-Bulwer treaty it would entitle him to a peerage, and that in all probability it would involve the United States in war before we got rid of it.

President Pierce, in his message in 1856 to the Congress, said:

> It is with surprise and regret that the United States learned that a military expedition under the authority of the British Government had landed at San Juan del Norte, in the State of Nicaragua, and taken forcible possession of that port, the necessary terminus of any canal across the Isthmus within the territories of Nicaragua. It did not diminish to us the unwelcomeness of this act on the part of Great Britain to find that she assumed to justify on the ground of an alleged protectorship of a small and obscure band of uncivilized Indians, whose proper name had even been lost to history, who did not constitute a State capable of territorial sovereignty, either in fact or in right, and all political interest in whom and in the territory they occupied Great Britain had previously renounced by successive treaties with Spain when Spain was sovereign to the country, and subsequently with independent Spanish America.

Mr. President, John Sherman, in his Recollections, volume 2, page 1096, in speaking of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, says:

> This treaty has given rise to much discussion and has ever since been a hindrance to the great work it proposed to advance. The British Government has repeatedly violated the treaty by extending its possessions and strengthening its influence in that part of the world.

What did Great Britain put into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty as a substantial consideration? What did she have to give to the United States for the signing of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty that the United States in return should cripple her sovereignty to deal with her internal commerce for the rest of her national existence? What was this great consideration which Great Britain transferred to us that we should do the unexampled and unheard-of thing of curtailing and circumscribing our sovereignty as a Government? The London Times, although it is a great advocate of this repeal, said a few days ago that it must be conceded in behalf of the United States that if the United States should ever indicate a desire to deal with the domestic commerce of Great Britain, it would be resented; and yet the question of keeping and preserving competition between the great transcontinental railways in the United States and the great waterways of the country—and a more vital question to its people does not exist—is to be hampered and compromised and circumscribed in consideration of what? The Clayton-Bulwer treaty which had lain obsolete for 50 years and had been repeatedly violated by the Government which was claiming its rights under it.

I am perfectly aware, Mr. President, and it is proper that I should say before leaving this point that Mr. Olney and others who came to deal with this question thought it unwise to wholly disregard the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, but purely as we do now with reference to so many things, not because there was any substantial right or vital force and effect in the treaty, but out of a fear of offending the English nation, or perhaps I should say out of our extreme desire at all times to retain the friendliest relation with that country.

Mr. President, concluding upon this proposition, I assert, as a matter of historic truth, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, in the first place, was founded upon a false claim, to wit, a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast Indians, which, in fact, did not exist; second, that it was founded upon a violation of the Monroe doctrine; third, that as a treaty it had been obsolete for 40 years; and, fourth, that it had been repeatedly violated by England. In the language of John Sherman, George F. Edmunds, John T. Morgan, and William M. Evarts, if that does not constitute a release from a treaty, how could a nation be relieved from a treaty?

I am aware that no formal notice of denunciation was ever given by the United States of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I am aware that, technically speaking, it can be contended that therefore it was still in effect. My answer to that is that we had a right to give the notice, that in substance and effect the treaty was void, that all that was necessary was a formal notice, for which there was just grounds and had been for years. And although it was technically in effect, it was in substance of no consideration and of no value and something which ought not to have been taken into consideration to the extent of waiving any substantial rights in the making of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and in my opinion it was not taken into consideration for that effect, and no such effect was intended by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

Mr. Hall, a leading English authority on international law, says:

It is obviously an implied condition of the obligatory force of every international contract that it shall be observed by both the parties to it. In organized communities it is settled by municipal law whether a contract which has been broken shall be enforced or annulled; but internationally, as no superior coercive power exists and as enforcement is not always convenient or practicable to the injured party, the individual State must be allowed in all cases to enforce or annul for itself as it may choose. The general rule, then, is clear that a treaty which has been broken by one of the parties to it is not binding upon the other through the fact itself of the breach and without reference to any kind of tribunal. * * * There can be no question that the breach of a stipulation which is material to the main object, or if there are several to one of the main objects, liberates the party other than that committing the breach from the obligations of the contract.

It can not be contended that the breach of the covenant against acquiring more territory in Central America was not a breach of one of the main objects of the contract. It was violated in one of its essential and most important parts, and it was well within our right at any time during the last 20 years to have terminated it by the mere giving of notice. As a matter of morals and of conscience it was already terminated.

I have inquired as to what Great Britain put into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty in the way of consideration. Very briefly, I want to ask what she has taken out?

In the first place, Mr. President, let us observe how this canal unifies and makes compact and solidifies, as it were, the British Empire. I assert that this canal, even with its freedom from tolls to American vessels, is of infinitely more advantage to England than it can be to the United States as a commercial proposition. If the contention made here is the correct contention, it would have been much better for the United States if John Hay had gotten England to spend $400,000,000 to build the canal, $10,000,000 to pay for the right of way, and $250,000 every year thereafter for all eternity, and to have kept it up and maintained it, and given us what England takes out of it without spending anything. It would have been much better to have had the other end of the treaty for the United States.

This canal will shorten the distance between Liverpool and the ports on the west coast of the United States nearly 5,700 miles. Will some one undertake to estimate the advantage of that to Great Britain as she goes on in her imperious way taking control of the commerce of the world? Is it possible to measure the worth of that shortened route to England, dependent as she is for existence upon her capacity to carry on the commerce of the world?

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New York?

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. O'GORMAN. When the Senator from Idaho speaks of the distance being shortened through the Panama Canal by 5,000 miles, does he mean that it will be a saving of 10,000 miles in the round trip?

Mr. BORAH. That is my understanding of it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. That is the fact.

Mr. BORAH. Yes.

The reduction from Gibraltar is about 5,000 miles; between Liverpool and Honolulu the canal cuts off 4,400 miles; between Liverpool and ports on the west coast of South America the distance is shortened 5,000 miles. The distance from Great Britain to British Columbia is lessened about 6,000 miles as compared with the route by Cape Horn, and not less than 10,000 miles as compared with the route by China and Japan. The distance from Liverpool to Wellington and New Zealand is shortened by 1,564 miles. The approximate distance from Halifax, Nova Scotia, to Vancouver, by way of water, is lessened 7,000 miles. So this will reduce the cost of transportation from the eastern and western Provinces of Canada very considerably indeed.

Mr. President, those figures alone give Great Britain in this situation an advantage which it is impossible for the human mind to estimate. We know Great Britain's place in the industrial world to-day. She is the mistress of the seas; and it does seem as if our Republic is cowering about to provide that she shall continue to be the mistress of the seas. We have built here a canal without a cent of cost to Great Britain, without a dollar of expense in the way of finance, and without any political obligation, which is of more advantage to Great Britain than any single physical event happening in the last hundred years; and yet our friends here say that the United States in its struggle for the commerce of the future must handicap and circumscribe itself after having given Great Britain this tremendous advantage in the fight, without a dollar's compensation from her. If I am not mistaken, Mr. President, Great Britain sees it in just that way, and she would have been satisfied had we promptly—as we had a right to do—rejected her claim or contention. It will be a gold brick that we hand to the English nation if she gets a few dollars in the way of advantage in tolls, if she loses the favor and the friendship of the United States in the future, as she has sacrificed it and forfeited it several times in the past. This matter has aroused a sentiment in this country which England could ill afford to arouse. Our memories are short when dealing with one who would be a friend; but lying back in history are undisputed facts which will feed a rearoused feeling of antipathy. It was unwise for England, and it was unwise for those who would serve her on this side, to undertake or to bring about this sacrifice of our rights.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Idaho yield to the Senator from New Jersey.

Mr. BORAH. I yield.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. If the Senator will permit me, he just made some citations of distances without giving the authority. Now, I want to give the real, genuine article—the English authority. I have here a clipping which I cut from the London Times of date February 25, 1914. In this article the London Times says:

FUTURE DEVELOPMENTS.

With the opening of the Panama Canal and the inevitable changes in sea routes between the Atlantic and the Pacific, there will come, sooner or later, enormous developments and a practical revolution in commerce. Probably the developments will be greater, or at any rate more rapid and immediate, to the northward of the canal than to the southward, not because the countries to the north have in themselves greater natural wealth, but because they have a larger population and more money at their command; and perhaps most of all because of the character and initiative of the people of the United States and of Canada.

The United States, from the advantages of her position on the Atlantic side, will gain most in every way by the canal, and her advantages, if she is prepared to take them up, should begin with the opening. She will hold a commanding position for capturing the greatest share of the trade of the Pacific coast of South America. But the American foreign carrying mercantile marine is comparatively small, and it is fairly certain that, as in the case of the Suez Canal, British ships will outnumber those of any other nation using the Panama Canal for a good many years to come.

The canal will bring Callao 4,320 miles nearer Liverpool by steamer, reducing the distance from 10,230 miles to 5,910 miles, and saving about 14 days in time. To Valparaiso the shortening in distance will be 1,813 miles, making it 7,185 instead of 8,998 miles, and the saving in time will be about 6 days. But there will not necessarily be any saving of time for passengers, excepting so far as faster steamers may be put on south of Panama. To Valparaiso the fastest route for passengers will probably be still via Buenos Aires and the Cordillera. It is probable that in a few years the nitrate trade from Chile to Europe will be diverted through the canal instead of being carried on by sailing vessels round Cape Horn.

This is English testimony that our friends are so fond of favoring.

Mr. BORAH. I will quote from the same authority. The London Times, under date of December 31, 1913, says:

The canal will be a boon to Europe. While the United States has built it, and glories in it, its commercial importance to the United States is a bagatelle as compared to its importance to the world's foreign trade.

It says further:

The promise of the United States that it would build the canal as a contribution to the world's commerce may be fulfilled more literally than was intended.

This entire article, Mr. President, seems to have been written at a time when it was supposed that the tolls question was settled, and therefore those estimates were made in contemplation of tolls exemption to American ships.

Again the London Times says:

The new Panama Canal will shorten the distance from Great Britain to British Columbia by over 6,000 miles as compared with the route via Cape Horn, and no less than 10,000 miles as compared with the eastern route via China and Japan, while the ports on the west coast of South America will be nearer to Canada than the Argentine Republic. It can readily be judged from the above what tremendous advantage will accrue to Canada as a result of the opening of the Panama Canal.

Again the same authority says:

With the Panama Canal open to shipping the distance will not only be reduced to the ports of the United Kingdom and of Europe but new markets in the West Indies and the Latin republics of the east coast of South America will be opened up to Canadian products. Where the products of the British Columbia coast have been insufficient to supply vessels with return cargoes supplemented by some of the millions of bushels of grain from the middle west of Canada the export traffic is likely to be as good, if not better, than the import traffic.

And notice this particularly, rather significent, to my mind:

The Canadian Northern Transcontinental Line will, it is expected, be completed in 1914, the year before the Panama route is in full operation. The kinks will have been worked out of the line and it should be in excellent condition to afford grain shippers facilities to the markets of the world.

The Outlook, a publication in London, said a short time ago that upon the basis of the crop of 1912 the farmers of Alberta alone would receive an annual benefit of $200,000,000 by reason of the opening of the canal. It added these words:

> It is easy to see that it is not far hence when farmers of Alberta and Saskatchewan will receive a free gift from this canal of something in the neighborhood of $250,000,000 a year in foreign rates saved.

Will anyone argue against the advantage it would be to the western farmer of the United States to have free canal tolls that there might be kept alive and in full force and effect, as President Wilson said in his preelection speech, full competition between the railroads and waterways and the markets. I find no better language to express myself upon this subject than the exact language of the President:

> We do not want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

I would not violate the plain terms of a treaty to protect the farmers of the United States, and they would not ask it. But to sacrifice their rights and their interests under the terms of a treaty construed in our favor by some of the ablest minds of the age, to my mind, amounts very nearly to a crime.

Mr. President, it will be a signal triumph, indeed, for English diplomacy when this bill shall have become a law. It will complete another chapter—aggressive, far-seeing, and masterly—in the diplomatic history of that indomitable and far-seeing people. In that chapter it will be recorded, to begin with, how the English nation forced a strategic advantage on the coast of Central America in violation of the Monroe doctrine, and how we submitted to it.

It will be recorded how by sheer persistency and courage that nation circumvented the same policy, this boasted policy of our own people, by the terms of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, every line of which was in contravention of the policy which lifted into exceptional and permanent fame the name of the fifth President of the United States, a policy which has been considered essential to our peace and to our supremacy on the Western Continent. It will be further disclosed in this chapter of diplomacy how a vigilant nation using as a base of action an obsolete and twice or thrice violated treaty secured a new treaty by the terms of which she steps from under all the expense and all the responsibility and retains all the advantages of this tremendous enterprise, tremendous not only in its cost in energy, health, and life, but tremendous in the responsibility which it imposes upon its builder and owner. And then it will be there further recorded how, taking advantage of a situation supposed to be somewhat strained between the United States and other countries and our own lassitude and drifting, our own want of a vigorous and well-defined foreign policy, it caused Presidents and Cabinets and political parties and Senators and Representatives and Congresses to change their views and their votes, caused a strong and puissant nation to accept the construction of a treaty by a foreign power, humiliatingly confessing our heretofore ill and rashly considered act, and finally ignominiously to consent to the imposing upon our own property, our own soil, a perpetual servitude and yield up no less than the sovereign power of controlling our domestic commerce. Is not this triumph enough for English diplomacy? Is not this the crowning glory of that long line of diplomatic statesmen from Woolsey to Grey, and is it not humiliation enough for us? Is there more to follow? Shall we expect England, following up her position and her irrefutable logic finally to say, "Your ships of war shall follow the degradation of your ships of commerce"?

The secret of all this triumph, Mr. President, is that an Englishman is always an Englishman. The power and prestige of his mighty nation are always close to his heart. While other people and nations talk of universal peace and the brotherhood of man this great power proceeds upon the theory that the best way to have peace is to have the prestige and the power which shall command it. While other nations talk of yielding in deference to a sentiment, she reaches out for advantage and pursues with remorseless logic every favoring incident to its final fruition.

Sir, they tell us that we must respect and abide by our treaty obligations. They warn us that we must be careful of our national honor; that we stand in peril of forfeiting our honor among the great nations of the world, whose long and devious histories are one continued story of treaties made and broken, of alliances formed and treacherously betrayed, of obligations assumed and selfishly denied, of broken pledges, wars, and dishonor.

Of course, Mr. President, if we have made a treaty that bound us to build the canal and then yield its partial control to others, there would be nothing left for us to do but to bow in humiliation and submit to the servitude of our folly. But we do not get anywhere by crying "National honor." For the whole question is, What is the treaty, and are we violating it? Are those who contend for free ships any less sensitive to American honor than those who contend for British advantage? Are those who believe that our treaty does not bind us to yield to a foreign power or the embarrassing of our domestic commerce any less men of honor, any less regardful of national honor, than those who believe that the treaty intended to give and does give vital control of the canal to other nations? Were the Pharisees the only keepers of decency and honor, of integrity and personal probity, simply because they exploited their virtues by praying while standing upon the street corners and by occupying high seats and doing much talking in the synagogue?

Mr. President, we are bound to observe our treaty obligations. But let it be known also that we are bound to protect our treaty rights. We have no more right to disregard the one than we have, through false and maudlin sentiment or baseless and cowardly fear, to surrender the other. We believe our rights under this treaty are as we have interpreted them to be by the law which we are now about to repeal. We believe these rights are vital to the welfare of the American people, and we believe the surrender of them is unjust, unnecessary, unprecedented, and un-American. You may force a surrender now, but you will restore these rights in time. Pressure may win the victory for an hour, but this issue will be settled at the bar of public opinion in the open forum, where all these great questions are to be ultimately settled when they are settled right, and where the millions of people will construe this treaty not in fear and trembling, but in honor and also in courage.

Mr. President, the American people had come to look upon this achievement as peculiarly and distinctly the achievement of American genius. It fed their pride and strengthened the sentiment of nationality. For centuries the scheme of uniting the two oceans had tormented the ambition of the civilized world. But the scheme had remained without fruition. England, with her vast wealth and commercial prowess, seemed wholly reluctant to engage in the task. The brilliant and resourceful people upon whom rested the glory of conceiving and constructing the Suez Canal essayed the task and failed. It was distinctly an American triumph. It stood out as a monument to her gigantic energy and a tribute to her immeasurable genius. Our people seemed to feel the pride of individual accomplishment; it seemed to them commensurate with and the culmination of that restless force and power which in a little over a century had subdued and cleared a continent and built upon it the only successful Republic yet appearing upon this earth. Yes; it was their triumph. They willingly and ungrudgingly paid the countless millions which it cost. It had stirred again the spirit of vastness which sometimes sleeps but never dies out of the American mind. And they cared nothing for expense of wealth or life in its building.

Our people felt it gave us a closer union commercially and a firmer and more compact Republic in the hour of peril. They felt it was theirs exclusively, entirely and alone theirs; that the title was in their Government and as inviolate as the fortifications which guard its entrances; and that its use by and dedication to the outside world rested alone in the broad principle that we would not pledge special friendship or cripple any nation's commerce through discrimination and favoritism. That it was not ours, with all the advantages and privileges incident to ownership; that it was not ours to be used for the augmenting and building up of our commercial supremacy; that it was not ours to the extent that it might further and advance the strength and powers of the Republic in the tremendous contest for the future commerce of the world never, sir, was entertained by the American people for a moment. They believed—and I assert that John Hay, scholar, statesman, diplomat, and patriot, believed—that no possible promise was out and no limitation upon our action save that as to all users and customers who should feel it advantageous to comply with the rules established, they should be treated with impartial and equal justice.

I look forward, sir, fifty and a hundred years hence, when every foot of our public lands will have long since been occupied, and when there will no longer be any outlet for the congested centers into which foreign nations will still pour their wan and hungry thousands. And I remember that the real test in the tendency among a people to establish classes begins with the exhaustion of public lands. I look forward to the time when this Republic will have to find relief and work for her crowded and complex population, for her energy, her industry, and for labor in extending our commerce and commanding the business of the sea. The hiving millions upon the Atlantic seaboard will be reaching for the trade of the west coast of South America and for all the trade of the Pacific seas, and striving to hold our own for the increased appetites and wants of the rejuvenated and aroused millions of the Orient.

The Atlantic and the Pacific will commercially be neighbors then, and we will want no passageway with a clouded title upon it between us. We will in that day, sir, find ourselves in a close and deathlike grip with the mistress of the sea for the markets of the outside world, for the trade and commerce by which we can furnish business for our mills and work for our people, for there can be no such thing as a republic after the hour in which her working people fail to find employment at a living wage.

At that time the Panama Canal will be as vital as indispensable, its complete and unlimited use in our contest as essential as the arteries of trade which permeate our inland and overland business. It will bear no "limitation upon our freedom of action," in the language of Earl Grey, at that time. How puny and small will be the question of a subsidy at a time when we will be compelled to take care of our merchant marine. How vain and delusive will seem the dream of universal peace when, though cannons may not roar, the fight for markets and their loss will just as certainly and more certainly endanger the Republic.

I want this canal without a cloud upon its title, without a partner, without anything which will militate against its use to the advantage of our own commerce as against the world—leaving all other nations upon an equal footing as between themselves, but giving us all the advantage of ownership—I want to know that it is ours to be used as we would, so far as our individual interests are concerned. Yes, I repeat, ours to be used as we would, without let or hindrance in any way, shape, or form so long as all customers are put upon an equal footing. That, sir, was the spirit and purpose of John Hay, and those who construe his work otherwise, those who ignore his plain words:

> The canal is to be an entirely American canal. * * * When constructed it is to be exclusively the property of the United States, and it is to be managed, controlled, and defended by it—but slander the illustrious dead; and that, sir, in the end will be the judgment of the American people.

I make no concealment, sir, not only of my great disappointment that this bill is to pass, but I make no concealment of my loathing for the manner in which it has been brought about—the forces through and by means of which this betrayal is to be encompassed and brought to pass. It had its origin in duplicity, in deception of the American electorate, and broken promises to those whose interests alone we are here to represent. After diplomacy had practically brought the matter to a final and favorable conclusion certain powerful and selfish interests which have fought the building of the canal from the beginning remained active and revived the fight, and for a time the forces are to win and all who assist shall share the glory of assisting in crippling and bartering away a portion of the sovereignty and supremacy of the Republic.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if "the Panama Canal has been given away"—and the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] asserts that it has been—it was given away by a Republican administration and a Republican Secretary of State. I do not think it has been given away; upon the contrary, I deny it; but the canal will not be given away by observing the conditions of an international compact with Great Britain, followed by another with Panama. If it has been given away at all, it was given away by entering into the conditions of the international compact in question. If the treaty be "a hard bargain," it is the entering into it and not the keeping of it that is reprehensible.

The idea that the canal was not ours to exploit in favor of our trade is our own idea, first broached by our own Government under a Republican administration; and the part of the international compact which makes the pledge not selfishly to exploit it was made upon the initiative of a Republican Secretary of State of the United States and in his language. The Senator from Idaho speaks of "slandering the illustrious dead" because we undertake to observe the conditions of a contract entered into by Secretary Hay, about whose meaning and intention the Senator makes some dispute. Secretary Hay, if slandered at all by the assertion that he intended to exact equal treatment to the commerce of all nations, including our own, is slandered from his own grave, out of his own mouth, for there has been read into the RECORD, not once but several times, a communication from Secretary Hay giving his own construction of the language here in dispute; and Secretary Hay in that letter said that it was intended that the ships and commerce of the citizens of all nations, including the United States, should be treated equally.

So much for that, Mr. President. All of that is a part of the rhetoric, the oratory, the linguistic dialectics contributed by the Senator from Idaho to the debate; and Senators themselves can not believe what they say, that others have "slandered" him, even if it were slander to attribute to him the intent which he attributed to himself. But it is not slander; it is high praise of his sense of justice. The Senator from Idaho knows as well as I know that if there has been any "foolish or hard contract" entered into, if we have "given away a great canal," which otherwise we might have constructed as our own in every sense, without limitation or restriction or condition, all that is not done when we observe the condition. It was done when we entered into the contract. It is only common honesty to keep the contract after we had plighted our faith.

The Senator looks forward to the day when one branch of the English-speaking race "shall be in a death-to-death grip" with another branch of the English-speaking race "for the commerce of the world." His Republican raising leads him to use that warlike figure of speech. Trade is not a matter of "death-to-death grip" at all. The richer the other nation is the richer yours is, because it argues only the more you can buy from them and the more you can sell to them to the profit of both. No nation on the surface of this earth ever was enriched by the poverty of another. These two great branches of the race "in the foremost file of time" will not be engaged in a death-to-death grapple. They will be engaged in generous emulation, trading with one another, and making money out of one another, as they have been doing ever since we became an independent sovereignty upon the surface of this earth.

Great Britain is not our enemy; she is our best customer. We are not her enemy; we are her best customer. All this warlike imagery when applied to trade and commerce came from the old, foolish mercantile system, inherited now chiefly by its modern representatives in America. It prefigures that trade is somehow a thing wherein one side or the other must lose, whereas, as a matter of truth, it is a thing wherein both sides gain. A man sells a thing because he wants the money more than the thing. He buys a thing because he wants the thing more than the money. In either event he is profited by the transaction; and the other man, actuated by precisely the opposite preferences, is also profited, for the same reason, by the same transaction.

The Senator from Idaho drew upon his rhetorical if not poetic imagination for a picture of a certain time which he had in his mind, and one sentence after another followed in the approved style of oratorical exclamation, each beginning, "At that time, I see, Mr. President," and "Mr. President, at that time I see." Now, what did he see? He saw nothing but a perpetuation of the old war of greed and the survival of the fittest for hostile conflict; that is all. He can not see beyond that. And he is not alone in that respect; "there are others" like him. When he draws a picture it is an emphasized picture, an accentuated picture, of the old evils of the old and dying past.

"At that time," he says, "we will be a Nation that will permit no limitation upon ourselves." If so, then we will be a barbarous Nation.

Mr. BORAH. The Senator misunderstood me. I said no limitation upon our actions with reference to this canal.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, the Senator went further than that. After stating it as a desired goal, he went to the isles of the sea, and he went to South America, and he indulged in what Tom Reed called "geographical eloquence" of that sort to a very considerable extent. But whether in connection with the canal or in connection with our trade and commerce generally a people who look forward to "a time when" they will permit no limitations upon themselves are a barbarous people, and if they remain of that opinion until that time comes they will remain a barbarous people.

Civilization does not consist in saying to the world, "I permit no limitations upon my power in trade, or power in war, or power in the use of a public utility, or power anywhere else." It consists in saying, "In the interest of the world and of humanity and of my own people, I impose upon myself limitations." What are those limitations? The limitation of justice, the limitation of righteousness, the limitation of fairness, and, in so far as equality is necessary to constitute those limitations, the limitation of equality, too.

But to what purpose, with what intent did the Senator speak? What could have been the object of this long diatribe about various people who at various times thought the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was out of existence and obsolete? Can it be possible that the Senator from Idaho does not know that no matter what private individuals expressed opinions to that effect, two Democratic administrations and two Republican administrations in this country have acted upon a different opinion? Has he no longer reverence for McKinley and for Roosevelt in his own party? I do not ask him to have any reverence for Cleveland or the Democratic Party; that would be, perhaps, drawing upon his generosity too much; but he stands here and argues, debates, indulges in flowers of speech, and indulges in denunciation, first fulminating cannon shots and then sticking in a poinard under somebody's shoulders, and all for what? To prove ostensibly, at any rate, that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was obsolete and dead and amounted to nothing, when four American administrations have recognized it as in full force and effect, and when the very Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which is now in existence between us and Great Britain, in the very forefront of it where it is superseded, acknowledges that without the supersession it is still all in force and effect. And after supersession a part of it, the very part he is complaining of, is to continue as an abiding pledge for the two nations.

The Senator from Idaho knew, just as well as I know, and just as well as other Senators know, that there is only one way of putting an end to a treaty among nations, and that is by notice of abrogation. The Senator from Idaho knew, as well as anybody knew, or could know, or ever will know, that there never had been any notice of abrogation given in connection with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. He knows that every time we have sought negotiations with either the Nicaraguan authorities or the Colombian authorities, even prior to the Panama Canal, we also entered into negotiations with Great Britain in order to change the conditions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. The Senator goes further than that, however. He not only knew all that, but he forgot that there are men equally as respectable as the men of whom he spoke who entertained a different view all the time.

I find here on page 4990 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, volume 33, some utterances from a man whom I regard as a man of almost perfect intellectual integrity. He happens to be the leader of the minority in the other branch of the National Congress at this moment; a man whose weight and force I have felt, and whose character I have respected. What does he say? Speaking of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty upon May 2, 1900, he says:

> For ten years this [the treaty] was a source of constant friction and frequent communication between the two Governments, but finally, at the end of about 10 years, all sources of complaint in regard to the attitude and action of Great Britain in these matters were removed to the satisfaction of the administration of President Buchanan, who, in his message to Congress December 3, 1860, stated that—
> "The discordant constructions of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty between the two Governments, which at different periods of the discussion bore a threatening aspect, have resulted in a final settlement entirely satisfactory to this Government. In my last annual message I informed Congress that the British Government had not then 'completed treaty arrangements with the Republics of Honduras and Nicaragua in pursuance of the understanding between the two Governments. It is, nevertheless, confidently expected that this good work will ere long be accomplished.' This confident expectation has since been fulfilled. Her Britannic Majesty concluded a treaty with Honduras on the 28th November, 1859, and with Nicaragua on the 28th August, 1860, relinquishing the Mosquito protectorate. Besides, by the former the Bay Islands are recognized as a part of the Republic of Honduras."

Some time ago, meeting a man accidentally I called his attention to this fact, and he said, "Yes; but that was after we had a million of men under arms and a giant navy, and she no longer dared refuse." As a matter of fact, it was done, as Mr. MANN says, under Buchanan's administration, before the war.

Mr. MANN goes on in his language:

> In my opinion, it may therefore be fairly stated that while the action of Great Britain during the 10 years following the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty might have fully justified a notice on our part of the abrogation of that treaty because of its nonfulfillment by Great Britain, still when Great Britain finally yielded to our contention and gave up the possession about which we so strenuously complained, that cause of complaint was entirely removed, and we would have no right now to insist that the treaty is abrogated already or that it should be now abrogated because of the action of Great Britain immediately following the making of the treaty.

So much for Mr. MANN.

There sits to my left the senior Senator from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], at that time a Member of the House. I shall not praise him in his own presence. In the same debate, he says:

> I say we owe a degree of comity to England also in this great enterprise. We can not go ahead regardless of the rights of foreign powers or foreign peoples. An international canal is what it will be.

The Senator from Idaho is wrong also about Mr. Cooney, whose name has been brought into this debate. He seems to think that Mr. Cooney thought the treaty was abrogated. Mr. Cooney, on the contrary, made a long speech to the House in which he said the treaty was not abrogated, and ought to be abrogated, and therefore gave notice of the amendment to which I referred this morning.

By the way, while I am upon my feet I will say that when a man has been twenty-odd years in public life he ought not to trust his memory very much. I had a recollection, as I thought, of that proposition of Mr. Cooney's being voted down by an overwhelming vote. I must have gotten it from the fact that there was an overwhelming sentiment against it, and he therefore, after having it read and giving notice that he would offer it, did not offer it, because I have looked through the RECORD, and I have found no record vote at all upon the subject. Mr. Cooney, however, made a speech to the House in which he said that "the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is in full force and effect," and that we can not have a canal satisfactory to us without having England consulted about it; and he therefore gives notice that at the proper time he is going to offer an amendment for the purpose of abrogating it. Here is Mr. Cooney's language, a part of which the Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] read the other day.

By the way, I want to say in this connection, that I knew Mr. Cooney. I knew him very well. He was a Representative from the State of Missouri, an Irishman by derivation, a man of good standing, of good character, and good sense.

Mr. Cooney said:

> There is a general opinion throughout the country that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is as dead as Hector and that somehow Blaine was the Achilles that slew it and dragged it to pieces at his chariot wheels. If it is dead, its body has been kept in a mighty healthy state of preservation, for every politician fastens the same dead body to his rolling car and plays "the insulting victor" as a prelude to urging the Government to a hasty building of the canal. I can not believe that any Member of Congress regards the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as dead or that its provisions are less binding on this Government than they were when executed and confirmed 50 years ago.

In that connection Mr. Cooney read an article from the Washington Times newspaper, in which the Times newspaper said that "it would be unnecessary and vicious legislation" to abrogate the treaty, because it would be recognizing its validity; and then Mr. Cooney adds:

> It is just such vicious literature and false declarations that have caused the widespread opinion that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is dead.

And so forth.

There was at that time in the House of Representatives the most remarkable catch-as-catch-can debater, except Thomas B. Reed, whom I ever personally knew. Thomas B. Reed was the most remarkable rough-and-ready debater that the English-speaking race has produced, except, possibly, Charles James Fox, of Great Britain. On page 5008, in this same discussion, I find what Mr. Grosvenor, the man to whom I refer, had to say. Mr. Grosvenor was the chosen confidant of Mr. McKinley upon the floor of the House of Representatives, as everybody then a Member of the House knew. Mr. Grosvenor says:

> Mr. Chairman, the discussion has taken so wide a range that I can not hope to cover in the five minutes I shall ask for all the phases presented. I want to emphasize a little strongly the remark made by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GILLETT].

Mr. GILLETT of Massachusetts was one of the most distinguished Republican members of the Foreign Affairs Committee of the House of Representatives—> who said that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was still obligatory upon the United States. I do not think there is any doubt about that, and I think that no man with ordinary intelligence—

The Senator talked about strong language this morning. I do not believe in strong language. I believe in fitting language, but old Grosvenor did now and then draw it a bit strong. He said:

> I think that no man with ordinary intelligence, whether he is a lawyer upon international lines or whether he is a man of ordinary common sense, will for one moment understand or attempt to argue that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty has been abrogated by the act of the United States or by that of England.

There served with me in the House, and with several of you, one of the most lovable men that ever lived—bright, variable of fancy, of poetic imagination, eloquent, and logical, all combined—Dolliver, of Iowa. Dolliver indulged in a statement which I shall read. I am quoting only from men who have since somehow made themselves distinguished. I am not quoting myself or 12 or 13 or 14 other men taking part in the debate who have never achieved any great place in the world. I am trying to confine myself to the men who afterwards carved out for themselves a place in the hearts of the American people, and that Dolliver did. He not only had the traits of which I have spoken, but he had great courage; and when he found out that he had been going in a direction that was wrong he faced himself clear about and went in a contrary direction, though he sacrificed many friends.

Here is what Dolliver said:

> I have read a good many of the treaties which we have with foreign countries—

He had, among other things, an exquisite sense of humor, as this first line or two shows:

I have read a good many of the treaties which we have with foreign countries, and about the only one of them I am able to thoroughly understand from the language of it is the Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850. I have read the opinions of statesmen and diplomatists about that treaty, and my judgment fully concurs with the judgment spoken here yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

Who was he at that time? Why, Mr. Hitt, of Illinois; and there never served in this body a man, in the old time or now, who had so completely at his finger ends the foreign relations of the United States as Mr. Hitt, of Illinois.

Dolliver said:

My judgment fully concurs with the judgment spoken here yesterday by the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Affairs [Mr. Hitt], that that treaty is in force and that no policy ought finally to be put into the form of law in this country which is not accompanied by a negotiation for the modification of that treaty.

That is pretty strong language, too. In the House the reporters put in parentheses the word "Applause" whenever the generous hearts of generous men give it; and the following is followed by a notation of the applause which Dolliver received:

I believe, also, that this canal ought not to express merely the military prowess of the American people. I cherish the hope and the conviction that the world's civilization has advanced beyond that. I would have this canal express the aspiration of our people for a larger commerce and for a permanent peace among the civilized nations of the world. I take no interest in and give no consent to that argument, which is based upon a narrow view of patriotic duty, which claims that we should own this canal and operate it mainly as an instrument of war. As such an instrument it is not worthy of this age nor this Nation. It is worthy of us only as it expresses the national aspiration for peace and for enlarged commerce which will reflect the progress and spirit of our age and of our civilization.

Most of that quotation from Dolliver is not pertinent to what I was saying; but I could not help reading it, because it is evident that Dolliver, too, had in his mind "some future time," a time that was not the time apostrophized by the Senator from Idaho [Mr. BORAH] in so many sentences beginning "At that time, Mr. President, I see."

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, what was the date of that debate, if the Senator please?

Mr. WILLIAMS. This was on May 2, 1900.

But why all this "love's labor lost"? What is the object of this sort of contention by the Senator from Idaho? It is a familiar trick of the skilled dialectical as well as of the dueling fencer that when he sees he must give way in his tracks he changes the form of attack or the form of offense. The Senator from Idaho, knowing that he could not stand upon the ground that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty was not in effect at the time we entered into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and that it was, in part, continued in the latter treaty, which must control our action here; knowing that it had been recognized by every administration all the way down from when Buchanan said that our quarrels with Great Britain and our assertions of her violation of the treaty had been removed by her coming to our position and correcting her past misconduct; to when Secretary Olney, under Cleveland's administration, having been requested to look into the matter, and having looked into it and reported back that it was binding and in full force and effect; to the time when the great statesman who was the Secretary of State who negotiated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty so acknowledged it; knowing that McKinley and Roosevelt had so acknowledged it; that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty itself so acknowledged it; that the treaty with Panama so acknowledged it by making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, containing a part of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, a part of itself—knowing all this, or having lately learned it to his surprise, the Senator from Idaho comes into court at the eleventh hour to try to prove that, notwithstanding our conduct as a Nation, notwithstanding our solemn compacts recognizing it, notwithstanding the sanctity of treaties, the thing was obsolete and nonexistent, dead as a plantation mule of the vintage of 1800, because some Senate committee at some time reported that in their opinion it ought to be dead, and because a few other gentlemen here and there said that in their opinion it ought to be dead, "because it had been violated."

What was the object of this fencing? It was to change base in the presence of the enemy. McClellan found that that was about the most dangerous maneuver of warfare when he was advancing on Richmond. Gentlemen generally find it dangerous when they resort to it. Even if you are going to quote individuals, the mass of individual opinion is against the opinion of the gentleman quoted by the Senator from Idaho. But individual opinion is not the thing that you appeal to in a matter of this sort. You appeal to national action and national conduct and official utterances and international compact.

Now, one or two other things, Mr. President, and I shall take my seat. The Senator then goes at a considerable expenditure of time and words to demonstrate that Great Britain is going to get a whole lot of advantage out of this contract and that we are not going to get as many benefits out of this solemn international contract between the two greatest—at any rate, most civilized—nations on the surface of the earth, and that because we are not going to get as many benefits out of the contract therefore the contract ought not to be regarded. I once had a man come to me and enter into a contract for five years in connection with clearing up and putting under cultivation for crops to belong to him certain land. He came to me one day, after a year or so, and in a bland, honest-looking way, said, "John, I will have to 'rue back' on that contract." I said, "Why?" He said, "Because that contract is not profitable to me." I said, "Suppose it had turned out not to be profitable to me, would you have rued back?" "Oh, no," he said; "but I have got to rue back now." I said, "I do not see that." "Well," he said, "John, I have got to where you have got to let me. All I have got to do is to refuse to go on with it. All my property is in my wife's name, and you can not do anything with me." So I had to let him rue back. This was naive, but not honest.

What does the Senator mean by getting up here and arguing for 15 or 20 minutes that this compact will result in greater profit to Great Britain than to us unless he wants to appeal to the dishonest spirit of greed that exists in the hearts of too many men in the world, who regard a contract as sacred and inviolate only when it is profitable?

The Senator says that this contract as it exists to-day, as it was construed by Hay and by Choate, and as it will be construed by the Senate of the United States for the nonce—until it shall be admitted to arbitration for final decision at any rate—gives Great Britain more benefit than it does to the United States of America, and says that it would have been better for us if we had let Great Britain build the canal and give ships of our citizens an equal use with hers? But suppose that to be true. I am rather inclined to think that, in dollars and cents, it is true. I am rather inclined to say that if we had allowed the Government of Great Britain, or France, or Austria, or Germany to build it, and giving us equal rights to its use, equal charges, and all that, with just the same contract with either of them that Great Britain has with us, then, so far as mere money and mere commercial advantage is concerned, we would have gotten more out of it then than we are ever going to get out of it now. But why make that argument unless it be made with a view of producing a desire in greedy hearts to violate the contract because of that fact?

But the Senator must not forget this: We get, in addition to commercial advantages, military and naval advantages which Great Britain does not get. In the case of a war between ourselves and Great Britain we can use the canal in mobilizing our fleets and armies and Great Britain can not. That is agreed; it is disputed by nobody.

That is not all. In addition to the mere commercial advantages that are to flow to us, we get transportation advantages that, in their effect upon railway rates across the continent, will be beneficial to the entire people.

It is not a mere question of money, but, to take the Senator upon his own ground, suppose it were. If it were, then, of course, it would have been wiser for us to have permitted Great Britain to build the canal and to give us the right to its equal use. But you would not have had any canal. That is the answer to all that part of the Senator's argument. Great Britain would not have built it. She did not have the same strategic reason for building it that we had. She had no longer the same commanding commercial advantage, for she now owned the Suez Canal. She then entertained no idea of building it. There was no way whereby we could force her to build it.

The people of the United States generally, I think, would have preferred, though I am not sure of that, that the French had succeeded and built the canal. Under our arrangement with them we had equal use of that canal with all the nations of the world, commercially, after it was built. The only difference was that their canal was to be, from a military standpoint, absolutely neutral, and that in time of war we ourselves could not have used it. We therefore could not have mobilized our fleets from the Atlantic to the Pacific, and vice versa.

But the answer to the whole argument is this, and it is the only relevant answer; it is not whether the contract is profitable to us more than others or not; it is not whether "we ought to have made the compact" or not; it is not whether "we ought to have abrogated the Clayton-Bulwer treaty" and taken things in our own hands or not, no matter what the consequences of war might have been. The thing is, What did we agree to do. Under what restrictions, limitations, and conditions did we undertake to construct and operate the canal?

All the balance of the argument which has taken place between the Senator from Idaho and me this evening has been absolutely irrelevant to the issue. Whatsoever rights have we got under the deed of grant from Panama, those rights we shall assert. To assert anything less would be unmanly. To assert anything more would be barbarous and uncivilized and contemptible. Then in Heaven's name let us find out as soon as we can from some definite tribunal what those rights are.

Some Senator here proposed not long ago to leave the adjudication of the question to our own Supreme Court. Such is the contempt the American mind seems to entertain for the other sovereignities upon the surface of this earth—equal sovereigns with ourselves. If anybody had gone to that Senator and suggested that we should leave the interpretation of this treaty to the King's Bench in Great Britain or to the lord high chancellor there he would have jumped high enough to have gone through the skylight above our heads. We would not turn over to the judiciary branch of another Government the decision of an international dispute. And yet one of the fairest men and the best—such is the state of national egotism into which we fan ourselves by constant Fourth-of-July speeches—made perhaps what would have been perhaps the most unfair and most insulting proposition that has ever been suggested for the termination of a difference between one sovereign people and another.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to detain the Senate more than, at the outside, five minutes. The Senator from Mississippi has referred to the views of Hon. JAMES R. MANN, the distinguished Representative from Illinois, now leader of the minority in the House, a man of unquestioned capacity in public affairs, as to the final obligations of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I am quite willing to take Mr. MANN'S view of it, and I will read Mr. MANN'S view at the present day. Mr. MANN, in his speech in the House of Representatives March 31, 1914, in discussing the Panama Canal tolls bill, which is the bill we have before us, quotes approvingly this language:

> The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, as is so clearly shown by Mr. Hepburn, long ago ceased to have any binding force, by reason of the conduct of Great Britain. That being true, we should strictly adhere to the Monroe doctrine and stand by our traditional policy that Europe will not be permitted to intermeddle with cis-Atlantic affairs. It is to the Monroe doctrine that we as a Republic must look for safety. We should never, under any circumstances, even tacitly admit that Europe has the right to so much as interrogate us on American questions, much less to limit our action.

That was quoted by Mr. MANN from Mr. SHACKLEFORD'S report and approved by him in his speech upon the 31st of March.

Mr. WILLIAMS. What is the language approving it?

Mr. BORAH. I will read that in a minute. He also quotes from the report of the bill reported by Mr. Hepburn. He also quotes from the language of Secretary of State Frelinghuysen to the American ambassador to Great Britain, Mr. Lowell, dated May 8, 1882, in which Mr. Frelinghuysen called attention to the fact that the treaty had become obsolete. Now, Mr. MANN said:

> Could Great Britain refuse us? Could England decline to permit this Government on its own terms to construct what the world for 400 years had been hoping might be constructed? Could Great Britain say, "That which we want, that which is in the interest of our shipping, that which the world desires, that which you are willing to give out of the fullness of your heart and your treasure, we will not permit because of an antiquated, outgrown treaty of more than 50 years ago"? [Applause.] She could not, she did not dare refuse, and the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was negotiated.

Mr. MANN in his speech on the 31st of March, 1914, argues that the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, while it had not fallen upon notice for abrogation, was, in fact, obsolete and antiquated and outgrown, and that Great Britain did not dare to rely upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty because of the fact that it was regarded as obsolete and no longer binding.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Will the Senator permit me to quote again from Mr. MANN his exact language at the time of which I spoke?

Mr. BORAH. The Senator quoted him a while ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. The language of the Senator from Mississippi ought to be understood. He said that he regards the minority leader in the House as one of the most clearly intellectually honest men he has ever known.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am not going to take that back. I have no idea of doing it. If Mr. MANN has changed his opinion, he has changed it because he thought he had reason to change it.

Mr. BORAH. I have no doubt about that.

Mr. WILLIAMS. But I think he was merely quoting other people and did not express his own opinion.

Mr. BORAH. He is quoting other people for the purpose of basing his conclusion thereon as to fact, as he says here that the treaty was "antiquated and outgrown." Now, Mr. President, I stated in my remarks a few moments ago that there had been no formal notice of the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Before that there had not been any formal notice of the abrogation, and it is also true that that is the way to get rid of a treaty.

I perhaps was not clear and explicit in my expression, but the idea that I intended to convey to the Senate was that while it had not been formally noticed for abrogation, as a matter of fact it was obsolete; that, as a matter of fact, it was antiquated and outgrown, and, as a matter of fact, it had on three different occasions been violated by Great Britain, and the only thing that the United States had to do was to give the formal notice of abrogation.

In other words, Mr. President, the United States had the right to give the notice and there could have been no exception to the notice if it had been given; the Clayton-Bulwer treaty would have ended without a formal notice. The only reason why we did not give the notice, in my judgment, when you weigh the evidence upon the question, was simply out of the desire upon the part of the United States to retain at all times the friendliest relations with Great Britain. But I repeat, Great Britain never dared, as Mr. MANN says, to rely upon the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. Had Great Britain intimated that it was her purpose to do so, the formal notice of abrogation would undoubtedly have been given.

It is not a question of the technical condition of the treaty, but what was the substantial consideration which Great Britain put into the Hay-Pauncefote treaty for which Earl Grey said we should return the favor that is now claimed and charge vessels engaged in our coastwise trade in order that there may be equality between our vessels and those of Great Britain? Mr. President, I want to read again a few words from Mr. Hall, a leading authority upon international law, an English authority, in which he states:

> The principle which has been mentioned as being a sufficient test of the existence of obligatory force or of the voidability of a treaty at a given moment may be stated as follows: Neither party to a contract can make its binding effect dependent at his will upon conditions other than those contemplated at the moment when the contract was entered into; and, on the other hand, a contract ceases to be binding so soon as anything which formed an implied condition of its obligatory force at the time of its conclusion is essentially altered. If this be true, and it will scarcely be contradicted, it is only necessary to determine under what implied conditions an international agreement is made. When these are found, the reasons for which a treaty may be denounced or disregarded will also be found.
> The general rule, then, is clear that a treaty which has been broken by one of the parties to it is not binding upon the other through the fact itself of the breach and without reference to any kind of tribunal.

That is the substance of what I intended to present to the Senate. As I said in my remarks, technically it had not been noticed for abrogation, but, as a matter of fact, it was an obsolete, antiquated, outgrown treaty which might have been noticed if the United States had seen fit to do it. It had a perfect right to give notice.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Has the Senator ever read Secretary Olney's statement in reference to the matter?

Mr. BORAH. I have.

Mr. WILLIAMS. If the Senator will pardon me, then, for calling his attention: Just a little more recently Secretary Olney said:

> This announcement of President Buchanan—

Which is the announcement which I read to you a moment ago, and I will not now repeat—> was received by Congress without a symptom of dissent.

You remember that was the announcement—that, no matter what our earlier causes of complaint might be, Great Britain had made amends for them, and had entered into a treaty with Nicaragua which we asked her to enter into, and, with the other country—I think, Costa Rica—had given up the Mosquito Coast contention, and so forth, and that therefore we could no longer claim that she was doing us any international harm or was violating the treaty.

I will say that President Buchanan was not only President of the United States, but he had been one of our most distinguished diplomats, and very much more distinguished as a diplomat than as President. He had very little executive ability and very great diplomatic ability.

I read:

> This announcement of President Buchanan was received by Congress without a symptom of dissent.

I shall now read the language to which I want especially to call the attention of the Senator from Idaho, following the above:

> And since that time every administration, and, with a single exception, every Secretary of State has dealt with the Clayton-Bulwer treaty as a subsisting and binding instrument.

Now here is the exception:

In 1866 Mr. Seward, writing to our minister at St. James, queries whether, as the renunciatory clauses of the treaty relate to a proposed canal, they will operate forever if no canal should ever be begun. While thinking they would not, still the question being an open one, he declared that neither party could fairly do anything contrary to the spirit of the treaty, and he therefore instructed the American minister to quietly ascertain the disposition of the British Government to favor our acquiring coaling stations in Central America, notwithstanding the treaty.

So you see every American administration and every Secretary of State except one—and he only in this very qualified manner, merely querying and not asserting—has admitted the full force and effect of this treaty ever since Buchanan announced to Congress that Great Britain had accorded with our wishes, and that we had and could have no further cause of complaint against her.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment reported by the committee as amended by the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS].

Mr. KERN. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. THOMAS (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT]. As I understand that if present he would vote in accord with myself on this matter, I shall vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Transferring my pair in accordance with my announcement on the last roll call, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], and in his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. He has requested that I observe the pair on the Simmons amendment, which I shall do, and refrain from voting. If permitted to vote, I should vote "nay."

I desire to say in this connection that while the Senator from Pennsylvania desired to vote for the Simmons amendment, if present, he would vote against the bill on its final passage.

Mr. ROOT. I have been requested to announce the unavoidable absence from the city of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and that, if he were present, he would vote "yea" upon this amendment. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], who, I am informed, if present would vote "nay." For myself I vote "yea."

Mr. CHILTON. As I have stated, I have a pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL] and the Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] has a pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. We have decided to transfer our pairs to those Senators so that we may both vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Transferring my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], I vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 57, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—57.

So the amendment of the committee as amended was agreed to.

Mr. WALSH, Mr. NORRIS, and Mr. GORE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Montana.

Mr. WALSH. I now reoffer the amendment offered by me this morning.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Let the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana first be stated, and then the Chair will recognize the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to submit a proposition, both to the Chair and to the Senator from Montana.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will delay the reading of the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana, in order that the Senator from Nebraska may make his inquiry.

Mr. NORRIS. My parliamentary inquiry is this: Whether an amendment adding to the text of the bill now pending would not take precedence over the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana to strike out all the text of the bill and insert a new bill?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], as stated last night or this morning, proposes to add to the text of the bill which it is proposed to strike out by the amendment of the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. The amendment of the Senator from Nebraska, therefore, would be first in order.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire, Mr. President, to offer that amendment. Of course the Senator from Montana understands that I do not wish to interfere with him, but his amendment, I think, would more properly come after my amendment has been voted on.

Mr. WALSH. I shall be obliged to leave the Chamber in the course of half an hour, and will not be able to be here again during this debate. I shall speak either upon my amendment or upon the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator that I do not expect to address the Senate on the amendment I shall offer, and, unless some other Senator speaks in opposition to it, I do not believe there will be any debate. I should like, however, to have a roll call on it.

Mr. WALSH. I do not desire to debate the question of parliamentary practice at this time; but I am unable to recall now any parliamentary rule that gives precedence to one amendment to a bill over another amendment to a bill.

Mr. NORRIS. To obviate any difficulty, since the Senator desires to leave, I will ask the Chair this question: If I waive the right which the Chair says I now have, will it be in order, after the disposition of the amendment of the Senator from Montana, assuming that it be defeated, to offer the amendment which I intend to propose?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has stated that, where a motion is made to strike out the text of a bill and insert other matter, the friends of the text of the bill are entitled to have it perfected before the motion to strike out and insert is put to the Senate. That is the custom, as the Chair understands. If the question is put on the amendment of the Senator from Montana, then, of course, the text of the bill will still be open to amendment, as the bill is pending as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. NORRIS. In order to accommodate the Senator from Montana, who says he desires to leave, I will not insist on the right which I believe I am entitled to now, and I will not offer the amendment at this time.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understood the Senator from Montana to offer an amendment to strike out all of the bill after the enacting clause.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion of the Senator from Montana, as the Chair understands, is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert his amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator from Nebraska offers an amendment to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Nebraska has not offered an amendment, but he simply made a parliamentary inquiry of the Chair, whether, if he should offer an amendment to perfect the text which it is contemplated to strike out by the Senator from Montana, it would take precedence over the motion to strike out.

Mr. NORRIS. Simply as a matter of accommodation to the Senator from Montana, I do not offer my amendment now. I think I will have ample time to offer it after his amendment is disposed of.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. The amendment of the Senator from Montana is to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert certain language which he has presented. Rule XVIII specifically provides:

But pending a motion to strike out and insert, the part to be stricken out and the part to be inserted shall each be regarded for the purpose of amendment as a question; and motions to amend the part to be stricken out shall have precedence.

So that very clearly the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska would be in order even after the Senator from Montana has presented his amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair has so stated. The Senator from Nebraska does not now offer his amendment, as the Chair understands. The Senator from Montana is recognized.

Mr. WALSH. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert the following:

That section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, be, and the same hereby is, amended by the addition thereto of the following provision, namely:

That nothing contained in this act shall be deemed to repeal any provision of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, or to affect the judicial construction thereof, or in anywise to impair any rights or privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the treaties of the United States relative to tolls or other charges for the passage of vessels through the Panama Canal, and that when any alien, whether natural person, partnership, company, or corporation, considers that the charging of tolls or the enforcement of any other regulation under and pursuant to the provisions of this act violates in any way any such treaty rights or privileges, such alien shall have the right to bring an action against the United States for a redress of the injury which he considers himself to have suffered, and the district courts of the United States are hereby given jurisdiction to hear and determine such cases and to decree the appropriate relief, and from the decision of such district courts there shall be an appeal by either party to the action to the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. President, the purpose of the amendment offered by me is to secure from the Supreme Court of the United States a decision of the legal question so very stoutly debated upon this floor as to whether the exempting clause of the canal act is or is not in contravention of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. If at the time this debate was entered upon such an adjudication had been made, everybody, as a matter of course, would feel happy in the enlightenment that came from the opinion of the Supreme Court upon this question.

If the decision should be to the effect that the act is in violation of the treaty, I apprehend that no one would rise in this body or in the other branch of Congress and urge the rejection of the act. Undoubtedly it would be repealed without further debate or further consideration. On the other hand, if the decision were otherwise and it was held that the act is not in contravention of the treaty, this question would be presented to this body solely as one of economic policy.

It must be regretted by every Member of the Senate that this important question of policy is resolved under the conditions which now confront us. There are certain Members of this body who are extremely desirous of giving expression to the policy reflected by the law as it now exists; but they will not vote to retain it on the statute books, being convinced that it is in violation of the treaty. On the other hand, there are those who do not believe in the economic policy of the question but are fearful that voting for the repeal will be an admission that we do not have rights, which they are anxious to assert.

If a decision were arrived at by the Supreme Court of the United States, it would be determined simply as a question of domestic policy; but if this bill passes, we abandon a policy which many Senators regard as a wise one.

The distinguished Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], for whom I have the very greatest affection, suggested a few moments ago that by this amendment one party to this contract sought to impose upon the other and upon the world its own construction of the treaty. Why, that is not the purpose of this amendment at all, Mr. President and Senators. The Senator from Mississippi is exceedingly anxious to have this question submitted to arbitration. He wants to repeal the exemption clause, and thereafter he desires that the controversy existing in relation to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty may be submitted to some arbitral tribunal.

Why, Mr. President, what lawyer are you going to get to argue this case before an arbitral tribunal when he will be confronted with the arguments that have been advanced in this body throughout the course of this debate to the effect that we have no rights at all that are to be arbitrated? How will any man be able to stand up against the arguments that will be advanced upon the other side, utilizing the material furnished by the distinguished Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT] and the others who have followed him in his views concerning the construction of this treaty?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, does the Senator think that any of that would be admitted as competent testimony before any court of arbitration in the world?

Mr. WALSH. Why, Mr. President, it is not a question of competency at all. It is not a question of testimony; it is a question of being answered by arguments out of the mouths of our own people. It is not a question of testimony; it is a question of how on earth you are going to make an impression upon a tribunal concerning the meaning of this treaty when you are confronted with the most powerful arguments out of the mouths of your own citizens and your own public officials. It does not involve questions of fact concerning which you have access to evidence. This question is one of law; it relates to the true interpretation of a written instrument. This question will be determined by adherence to certain well-known canons of construction.

But, Mr. President, if you shall adopt this amendment and the matter shall come before the Supreme Court of the United States, and that great tribunal—than which there is no greater ever constituted by the genius of man—shall resolve all of the doubts we have concerning this matter, and shall declare and publish to the world, and give their reasons for the faith that is in them, that this act is not in contravention of the treaty, then the counsel for the United States can stand before any tribunal of arbitration in the world and stoutly advance the cause of the United States; and that is the purpose of this amendment.

Mr. President, it is not for the purpose of imposing upon Great Britain or upon anybody else our contention concerning this matter. It is simply for the purpose of a guide to our action in the future to determine what shall be our internal policy in relation to the use of the canal—whether it is a wise public policy to allow our vessels to go through the canal free, or whether it is in truth, as it has been denounced here, an iniquitous subsidy. We should determine that problem upon its own merits. As it is now our decision means nothing.

The next advantage would be that if we do submit it to arbitration we would have something on which we could go before a tribunal in the hope, at least, of a favorable determination.

Another thing, Mr. President: There is nothing new at all about the character of legislation that the amendment suggested by me contemplates. We have a general statute imposing tonnage duties upon all vessels entering our ports from foreign shores, but we exempt our own coastwise vessels from those tonnage duties. It was suggested, no doubt, when this act was passed, that if we did that we should violate certain treaties which we have with foreign countries; and the Congress of the United States, not desiring that our great Nation should labor under any such imputation, simply added a clause to the act which reads as follows:

Section 4227 of the Revised Statutes:

"Nothing contained in this title shall be deemed in any wise to impair any rights and privileges which have been or may be acquired by any foreign nation under the laws and treaties of the United States relative to the duty on tonnage of vessels or any other duty on vessels."

So that if any nation shall contend that this act which exempts our coastwise vessels from the payment of tonnage duties, while it imposes those duties upon vessels engaged in the foreign trade, is in contravention of a treaty, it may have the matter determined in some court; and the Supreme Court of the United States will be called upon then to determine whether the act does, in fact, violate the treaty; and if it does, then the foreign vessel is entitled to exactly the same exemptions that are accorded to our coastwise shipping.

We followed the same precedent in this very Congress, because, when we passed the tariff act and provided that commodities carried in American ships entering our ports should be entitled to a 5 per cent advantage in the matter of customs duties, we also provided that that section was not to be deemed in violation of any treaty, the language being as follows:

SUBSECTION 7. That a discount of 5 per cent on all duties imposed by this act shall be allowed on such goods, wares, and merchandise as shall be imported in vessels admitted to registration under the laws of the United States: Provided, That nothing in this subsection shall be so construed as to abrogate or in any manner impair or affect the provisions of any treaty concluded between the United States and any foreign nation.

So it is open to any man importing goods into the United States in a vessel not of the United States to bring his proper proceeding, and insist, if he cares to do so, that this act is in contravention of the treaty, and have the adjudication accordingly; and steps are being taken to determine whether such conflict does or does not exist.

The amendment proposed by me is exactly in line with these examples of our legislation upon this subject, and simply adds a provision by which a review in the Supreme Court of the United States is assured and expedited.

Reference to this provision of the tariff act reminds me that although we have heard much about this exemption of our coastwise vessels passing through the Panama Canal as being a subsidy, the challenge which has been repeatedly made here on this floor to those who have undertaken thus to stigmatize that legislation, the challenge to tell why this advantage thus given to American ships of 5 per cent in the matter of customs duties with respect to goods carried into our ports in American vessels is not equally a subsidy has not yet been answered. I have yet to hear anyone point out how there is any distinction between that and the exemption which we now seek to repeal, nor have I heard anybody endeavor to point out any difference between the two. If the one is a subsidy, the other is a subsidy.

Mr. President, I insist that the failure to tax is essentially different from a subsidy. Even the distinguished Senator from Kentucky [Mr. JAMES], who declaimed so eloquently the other night against this exemption as a subsidy, was silent upon the challenge that was made repeatedly here upon this floor as to why this is not a subsidy in exactly the same sense. And do you notice, Mr. President, that this measure was referred to the committee of which the distinguished Senator from the State of Kentucky was an honored and influential member? We all relied upon the scrutiny, upon the jealous care of the distinguished Senator from Kentucky, lest any provision imposing a subsidy upon the people of the United States should by any chance creep into that bill. It seems to have gotten there, nevertheless.

Mr. President, another challenge has been entirely unanswered, and that is that if this is a subsidy, so likewise is the exemption from tolls that has been enjoyed in reference to every canal in the United States.

We have asked the Senators to distinguish between the Panama Canal and the Soo Canal. We have insisted that if you are going to tax the vessels that go through the Panama Canal, because to allow them to go through free is to accord to them a subsidy, you must tax the vessels that go through the Soo Canal, because to allow them to go through free is to grant a subsidy. The system should be uniform.

My esteemed colleague, who has a justifiable horror of subsidies, sought to distinguish between the Panama Canal and the improved rivers and harbors of this country; and he pointed out, and very justly, indeed, that there is an essential difference between improving a natural waterway over which everybody has practically the natural right to travel, contributing only a little of the total value of it for the purposes of navigation, and a canal, an artificial highway, the whole value of which is given to it by the work of man.

I do not think the distinction is one of principle, but I recognize there is a distinction. I observe, however, that my distinguished colleague did not go further, as he might have done, and tell us how we can escape the obligation, if we are consistent in this matter, to impose duties and tolls upon the passage of vessels through the Soo Canal.

Mr. President, that canal is the outlet of our country to the commerce of the world for the surplus wheat we produce. I was down before the Interstate Commerce Commission this morning arguing the cause of the railroad commission of my State against the railroads operating there, asking for reduced freight rates upon the grain that we raise in our fields to feed the people of this country. Think of it. In 1909 we exported 100,000,000 bushels of wheat, and last year only 28,000,000; and the time is at hand when, unless our resources are developed to the very utmost, we must depend upon foreign fields for bread for our people.

We are trying to supply that bread. In 1909 we raised 6,000,000 bushels of wheat in Montana, and in 1912 we raised 20,000,000, and we can raise 100,000,000 bushels of wheat there if we could only get freight rates that would allow us to ship our product to market. That product passes through the Soo Canal in immense quantities. I should like to know whether it is to be the policy of the Democratic Party and this Congress to apply the principle that the exemption of tolls to vessels in passing through a canal is a subsidy to be rebuked and derided, and thus shut out the only possible way of utilizing our great fields and their products.

In 1906 the Commissioner of Commerce and Navigation told us:

> The canals of the United States still used for commercial purposes are stated by the New York World Almanac for 1905 as being 37 in number, with an aggregate length of 2,443 miles, the total cost of their construction being about $180,000,000. The most important of these, aside from that connecting the Great Lakes, of course, is the Erie Canal, 387 miles in length, with 72 locks and a depth of 7 feet. Next in length is the Ohio Canal, from Cleveland, Ohio, to Portsmouth, Ohio, 317 miles in length, with 150 locks and a depth of 4 feet. Next in length is the Miami and Erie Canal, from Cincinnati to Toledo, 274 miles in length, with 93 locks and a depth of 5½ feet.

I wonder, Mr. President, whether we are going to-day to lay down a principle that, followed to its logical conclusion, will compel us to put toll gates upon every one of these canals?

I read a word further, when speaking of the Soo Canal and about the tremendous tonnage of iron ore which passes through that great waterway. Mr. President, 72,000,000 tons of freight went through it during the year 1913 as against only 20,000,000 tons through the Suez Canal. In the same report we read as follows, after speaking of the tremendous tonnage of iron ore that goes through it:

> The most important part of the traffic through the Soo Canal, however, is not iron ore, but wheat and flour and other grains. The value of these items in the canal traffic is one and a half times that of the iron ore and equal to $84,000,000, or nearly a third of the valuation of the total commerce through the canal. In volume the traffic has grown from 3,500,000 bushels of wheat and 600,000 barrels of flour in 1881 to 63,250,000 bushels of wheat and nearly 9,000,000 barrels of flour in 1896. The last figures account for a large fraction of the 467,000,000 bushels of wheat raised in the United States in 1896, being, in fact, almost equal to that portion of the crop exported. The movement of wheat through the canal just about equals the total receipts at Buffalo and Erie.
> It is not, however, possible to give the canal alone the credit for having developed this wheat trade. The production of the wheat was only made possible by the construction of railroads through Minnesota and the Dakotas, and these same railroads provide a means of getting the wheat via Chicago. But if all-rail rates had to be paid, Minnesota and Dakota wheat and flour could not compete so well with that from the country near the eastern markets as it does by having water rates from Duluth to Buffalo. It should also be borne in mind that railroad building in Dakota and Minnesota began on a large scale only after the enlargement of the canal, when it was seen that they could connect with a through direct water route to Buffalo. The canal has therefore been an important factor in developing wheat production in the country west of Lake Superior.
> Besides wheat there has been a considerable traffic in other grain, but this first assumed large dimensions in the year 1896, when 27,000,000 bushels of grain other than wheat went through the canal, as against 8,000,000 bushels in the previous year.

Not only that, Mr. President, but the copper, the product of our smelters, the output of our mines, also finds its route to market through this great waterway.

Mr. President, this is called a subsidy simply for the purpose of deluding the mind and clouding the issue. It has no relevancy, as I think, to this debate or the real question involved in this discussion.

But, Mr. President, why should we not determine the economic advantage involved here upon its own merits, unembarrassed by the consideration whether it is or is not in violation of the treaty? In other words, is not the logical, the reasonable way to determine this question to submit this matter, in the first place, to the adjudication of a great tribunal that we have constituted for that purpose, and then act in accordance with the advice which it gives us?

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, as my distinguished colleague necessarily has to leave the Chamber very soon, I wish to say at this time a very few words in reply to one phase of his remarks. My colleague in the course of his able remarks impliedly addressed a question to me as to why I do not consider the exemption of ships from the payment of tolls for passage through the Soo Canal as a subsidy. According to my understanding, through the provisions of a treaty we have with Great Britain, by permitting both our own as well as British ships to go through the Soo Canal free from tolls we gain the right of freedom from tolls for our ships through the Welland Canal, in Canada. We thereby get something in return for free passage through the Soo Canal, and it is not a gift outright to private beneficiaries. We get something for it. Therefore it is not a subsidy. We get a compensatory benefit or return.

Furthermore, the Soo Canal is an inland canal, an internal domestic waterway, and is not on the same footing with a great interoceanic international canal.

Furthermore, and as my last answer, if toll exemption through the Soo Canal be a subsidy, I see no reason for extending the subsidy. One subsidy does not justify another.

As to the provision of our tariff law which reduces the tariff rates of duty on certain classes of imported goods shipped in American bottoms, I will say here that I did not refer to it in my recent brief address before this body upon the pending bill because I did not deem it of any importance. I will say now, in relation thereto, that in theory and reason, as far as practicable, I am a free trader. I believe in admitting all imports free of tariff duties, except in so far as is necessary to raise revenue for the Government. If we admit some classes of goods with a less tariff duty than other classes, or even on some ships with a less duty than on other ships, I do not see that anybody is injured thereby. We are simply getting less revenue for our Government, and I do not see that anybody has a right to complain about that, because nobody has a natural right to get goods free into our country. It may only be done by the permission of our Government, which must look out for its revenues, and may raise them as it may please. If we choose to admit any class of goods free, it is our privilege.

As to subsidies, I wish to say that I believe giving an American shipowner two or three thousand dollars in the equivalent of cash by putting his ship through the Panama Canal free, without any return whatever, the actual outlay by us of that much money is giving a special class something for nothing at the expense of the American people. I believe that conforms to the definition of a subsidy. It is the worst kind of subsidy—giving something for nothing.

That is all I will take the time to say now in my humble way in answer to the inquiry put to me by my colleague and by way of reply to his remarks on the subject of subsidies.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I understand if the Senator's proposition is adopted it will be a substitute for the whole bill.

Mr. WALSH. Yes; that is correct.

Mr. SIMMONS. And there will be nothing left of the bill except a provision that any corporation or party who may claim to be injured by the imposition of tolls may bring suit in the Supreme Court of the United States to determine the right.

Mr. WALSH. He may bring it in the district court, and his appeal is to the higher court.

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; he may carry it to the Supreme Court; but the result of all this discussion would be, if the Senator's amendment prevails, that we would simply give a foreign subject who might claim that he was wronged or injured as the result of this exemption a right to go into court and have the right determined.

Mr. WALSH. Undoubtedly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. [Putting the question.] The noes seem to have it.

Mr. WALSH and Mr. LA FOLLETTE called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL]. The Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] has a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. We have arranged to transfer those pairs, so that we may both vote upon this question. I vote "nay."

Mr. ROOT (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I again announce the necessary absence of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and state that he is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the senior Senator from Massachusetts were here, he would vote "nay" upon this question. I believe the Senator from New Hampshire would vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT. In this connection I desire to state that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

Mr. MCCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair upon this proposition with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER], but in accordance with the transfer suggested by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON] I will vote. I vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating my last announcement and the transfer of my pair, I vote "nay."

The roll call having been concluded, the result was announced—yeas 34, nays 53, as follows:

YEAS—34.

Ashurst	Cummins	O'Gorman	Smoot
Brady	Dillingham	Page	Sutherland
Bristow	du Pont	Perkins	Townsend
Burleigh	Jones	Pittman	Walsh
Catron	La Follette	Poindexter	Warren

NOT VOTING—8.

Borah	Gallinger	Oliver	Robinson
Fall	Lodge	Penrose	Vardaman

So Mr. WALSH's amendment was rejected.

Mr. NORRIS. I send an amendment to the desk and ask to have it read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. After the amendment just adopted add the following:

The protest heretofore filed with the Government of the United States by the Government of Great Britain denying the right of the United States under said treaty with Great Britain to discriminate by exempting vessels of its citizens from the payment of tolls when passing through said canal is hereby recognized as presenting an international question suitable and proper for settlement by arbitration.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, as I intimated a while ago, I do not care to discuss this amendment. The question has been, I think, rather fully debated, and unless there are some speeches made in opposition to it, I do not care to take up the time of the Senate now in debating it, but I will ask for the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I yield to no one in the desire for the settlement of international controversies by arbitration. If this question had been left to an arbitral tribunal, it would have been an example for the world and would have given a great impetus to the cause of peace. But I am unable to vote for this amendment.

There were two ways in which to settle this question of the exemption of coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls. One was by arbitration and the other by legislation repealing the exemption provision in the act of 1912.

There are many Senators on this floor, and I count myself one, who would have preferred to settle this question by arbitration, but on investigation it was manifest that such a course was impracticable. It required two-thirds of the Senate, and that two-thirds was not available. Consequently the other method was chosen, of a bill to repeal the provision in the act of 1912. We have been proceeding along that line, and for one I desire that the bill be as free from collateral material, as free from complication, as possible.

I was unwilling to vote for what is called the Simmons amendment because I thought a succinct, clear declaration on the subject was best.

There is another point in this connection. The formulation of a proposition for arbitration belongs to the Executive department and the Senate. Suppose we adopt this amendment declaring this to be a subject for arbitration, what will be accomplished? It must come here to the Senate and the question then arises, Will two-thirds of the Senate agree to arbitration? I think it very doubtful whether that proportion can be obtained

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. May I interrupt the Senator for a moment?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I will ask the Senator if it is not a fact that the Senate of the United States passed a general arbitration treaty here about two years ago and we never heard from Great Britain about it since.

Mr. BURTON. Not on this question. The request was made for arbitration by Sir Edward Grey, and in one of his——

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I do not mean with reference to this particular question, but a general arbitration treaty. We amended it, it is true, but it was adopted by the Senate and we never have heard from Great Britain since in reference to it.

Mr. BURTON. May I ask the Senator from Oregon if he speaks of what is called the Taft arbitration treaty?

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. Yes.

Mr. BURTON. Those treaties have never been submitted, I take it. Our own Government does not want to submit them because they were so changed from their original form as not to carry out the purpose for which they were framed.

Whether at a future time this question ought not to be submitted to arbitration is another matter, but in this bill and at this time I think we should by the enactment of legislation make the declaration that we do not believe that coastwise shipping should be exempt from the payment of tolls; whether the argument be that it is contrary to the treaty or that it is a wrong economic policy does not matter. Either is sufficient.

That is all, Mr. President, that I care to say upon this subject.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, I am opposed to submitting this question to arbitration in any form. If the law as it stands to-day is in contravention of any treaty we have, then I believe that the executive departments should at once proceed to make new treaties to supersede those that we now have and settle through diplomatic channels whatever differences there may be as the result of this law.

To my mind this is a question relating to domestic commerce, and I would no more vote to submit this question to arbitration than I would to submit the question of freight rates that might be charged on the transcontinental railways or the question as to whether we should improve the Mississippi River and permit vessels to use that river, when thus improved, free of charge. It is purely a domestic question; it is of no concern to Great Britain any more than would be a tariff levied upon English goods or any other kind of a domestic question that we might deal with here in the American Congress.

I do not care to prolong the debate, but I want to add that this is an American policy, this is a question involving political and economic policies of our Government. Two years ago the American Congress and the Executive declared in favor of the policy of the free passage of American ships through the Panama Canal when it was completed, when those ships were engaged in our domestic trade. That policy was indorsed by every political party in the last campaign and by every candidate for President before the American people. Since the election the present administration has changed its policy; it has adopted another policy. The policy which it now promulgates by demanding this legislation will be a political question before the American people for years to come. It will be a subject of political controversy until another Congress is elected that will again deal with this question. I will not vote to complicate that political question in any manner whatever by submitting it to a court of arbitration. If a court of arbitration should declare against our right, I would not be in favor of recognizing its decree any more than I would be in favor of permitting a court of arbitration to determine whether or not we should construct a railroad in Alaska.

Believing as I do, I want to say, as it seems now this bill will pass from the American Senate to-day, that from this day forth there will be a controversy before the American people as to whether the tollgate shall be restored upon American highways. The tollgate is a relic of the past, only injected into this controversy for political expediency for some strange and unknown reason; but it is a relic of the past, and the people of the United States will not restore it. This Congress may do it temporarily by action brought about I believe through the intrigues of great railway corporations and those who are interested in their finances. The sagacious ways by which those corporations have obtained this victory through an administration pledged to stand by the people against predatory wealth—the diplomatic intrigues by which they have connected with this propaganda men who do not believe in the domination of our national interests by these corporate interests has been one of the interesting episodes in recent American politics.

Mr. MYERS. Mr. President, I should like to interrupt the Senator for a moment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Kansas yield to the Senator from Montana?

Mr. BRISTOW. I do.

Mr. MYERS. The Senator from Kansas having declared that in his belief this movement for repeal of the toll-exemption law is brought about by the transcontinental railroads, I assume he does not share in the belief of some Senators on the other side of the Chamber that it was brought about by foreign conditions and the desire of the Chief Executive of the country to better some of our relations and dealings with foreign powers.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President, it was stated by the distinguished junior Senator from Michigan a few days since in this debate that the lobbyist for these railroads, their representative, who appeared before the Committee on Interoceanic Canals two years ago and fought this provision, who remained in this Capital three months with the chief counsel for the Harriman interests and fought this measure—it was stated on this floor by the junior Senator from Michigan that after this bill was passed this lobbyist or representative of these railroads went to Canada and from Canada to London, and that soon after that visit this controversy was again precipitated in this body, and I believe that the Senator from Michigan knew what he was saying when he made that statement, and that he spoke accurately.

Holding these views, believing that this controversy is such as I have indicated, I do not propose to vote for the arbitration of a question that is of such vital concern to the domestic interests of the people of the United States.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I ask your indulgence for a few moments to state why I am against this amendment. The proposition stated in this amendment is to arbitrate whatever differences there may be between Great Britain and the United States with reference to the subject matter of this legislation. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has proposed an amendment of the same general character, providing that the President shall enter upon negotiations with Great Britain to make an agreement for a special tribunal before which these questions of difference may be arbitrated. I am also opposed to that, or to any proposal to arbitrate our rights in and over the canal.

I have already stated, Mr. President, my firm opinion that the United States of right exercises absolute sovereignty over the Panama Canal and over everything connected with it. I have no doubt that the United States has an absolute right to govern, regulate, and control that canal. I regard the regulation of the canal as a purely domestic matter.

I am not voting to repeal that clause of the act of 1912 exempting coastwise vessels from tolls because I think that policy would be volative of our contractual obligations with Great Britain as embodied in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. I have stated my position with respect to that question with sufficient elaboration on a former occasion during this debate. I merely say this much in reaffirmance.

I am voting to repeal the tolls-exemption clause of the Panama Canal act of two years ago because I am uncompromisingly opposed to the policy of allowing American coastwise vessels to pass through the canal without the payment of tolls, because I think the exemption of our coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls would be a subsidy granted to a monopoly; and I have stated the grounds of my convictions in this behalf on the occasion to which I have alluded.

Mr. President, holding the views I do with respect to all these matters covering this whole controversy, I can not consent to arbitration as proposed in the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska; I do not believe that the differences involved constitute an arbitrable question. Whether we shall allow preferential tolls to any class of American shipping, I regard as a question which belongs to us alone. I would as soon think of submitting any other domestic question that might be named to arbitration because Great Britain or some other nation might challenge our rights with respect to it. I would not, for example, consent to arbitrate a question involving our right to place limitations upon immigration from any country; but I would as soon think, Mr. President, of arbitrating that as of arbitrating the question as to whether the United States is the master, the landlord, the sovereign owner of this waterway, or to arbitrate our sovereign right to control this canal according to our own pleasure. I am not willing to vote now or hereafter to arbitrate any question of that kind.

My friend from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] challenged me on yesterday, asking how I could vote against an amendment he had offered to the pending bill, making, as he thought and claimed, a broader assertion of the American right to do the things I claim we have the right to do. I answered him then that I thought that the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS], and agreed to by the Senate, was in all reason ample and sufficient to cover the ground the Senator sought to cover by his amendment to that amendment, and that I believed that the Senator from Utah, being hostile to this legislation, was seeking only to embarrass its passage. He denied that that was his immediate purpose in offering the amendment, but declared in the same breath that he was more than willing to do anything he could to imperil the enactment of this bill. And now I wish to say that it is a little strange to me that a Senator holding such pronounced views as does the Senator from Utah as to the title and right of this Government to do as it pleases with that canal, and to do it, I say, as a matter of absolute right, could consent to submit a question of that kind between this and a foreign Government to arbitration. I think I am a better friend than is the Senator from Utah to the doctrine of American sovereignty over and of the American right to dominate and control the Panama Canal. I will not vote for this amendment, nor any other like it.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, I shall be exceedingly brief in stating the reasons why I do not feel like supporting the amendment offered by the Senator from Nebraska at this time.

We are considering a bill, which has already passed the House, for the repeal of a statute. I regard the question of our right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt our vessels passing through the canal from tolls, if the high contracting parties under the treaty differ about it, as presenting an arbitrable question under our arbitration treaties; but I say we are considering the repeal of a certain clause in a United States statute. The House has passed a bill accomplishing that purpose. The Senate proposes to concur in it with an amendment, I take it. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] in effect states that in the opinion of the Senate a question presented by a certain diplomatic communication by the foreign office of Great Britain to our State Department raises a question for international arbitration. Whatever may be the merits of that, I do not think it wise for us to attach that kind of an amendment to this House bill.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Certainly.

Mr. WEST. If a matter of arbitration were annexed to this bill, would it require a two-thirds vote of the Senate?

Mr. BRANDEGEE. No, Mr. President. This is proposed as an amendment, I take it, and if adopted would be adopted by a majority of the Senate; but it deals with a subject which, if it were here upon its merits and any effective action were to be had upon it, would require a two-thirds vote of the Senate.

If the Senate should adopt this amendment by a majority, we would stand in this position: That the Senate by a majority vote had declared that a matter was recognized by a majority of the Senators to be arbitrable, although two-thirds of the Senators declined to submit it to arbitration.

That, in my judgment, fairly represents the fact of the situation as it is within the view of those of us who talk with each other and know what the situation is.

While I think it is a commendable purpose that the Senator has, and I think the question of the right to exempt is an arbitrable question, and while I would vote to submit it to arbitration if the proposition were here, and would gladly constitute one of a two-thirds majority of the Senate, if it were procurable, to do it, I do not quite recognize the propriety or the necessity of attaching it to the simple repeal of a domestic statute.

Many Senators have given their individual opinions that the questions about this exemption which have been raised by Great Britain are arbitrable. If the statute which creates the exemption is repealed, I do not have the faculty of looking into the future so as to be sure that there will be any occasion for any arbitration at all, nor do I think it is necessary; and perhaps it may not be wise for us to attempt to express opinions by a majority vote that could not be carried by a majority vote into practice, nor to attempt to decide questions which are not before us. I think it is a wise practice, where it is observed, for a court to decide the question that is presented to it, but not by obiter dicta and sayings in passing to intimate anything about some question that is not pending before it.

Furthermore, to attach a question of this kind to the House bill is, in my opinion, to intermingle into a plain question of legislation a question possibly concerning a treaty or a diplomatic matter with which the Senate might have some concern in the future, but with which the House probably has no concern at all. Furthermore, it creates another matter of difference of opinion between the House and the Senate. We have no knowledge that the House will accept the amendment we have already put upon this bill, and to plunge the House, whose Members may not consider themselves so deeply versed in treaty matters and the functions that hitherto have been confined to the President and the Senate, into a discussion upon this question, which never has been before them, is, in my opinion, to enter upon a work of supererogation, and to attempt to explore some territory that it is not necessary to be acquainted with for the proper solution of the problem now before us.

Therefore, while expressing great friendliness to the general proposition of the Senator, I shall be compelled to vote against the proposed amendment at this time.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President, I shall not pretend to say that there will not remain a controversy for determination after this bill is enacted into law, and yet there might be much justification for the statement that the consummation of the work now contemplated by a majority of the Senate will leave nothing for arbitration.

In international relations Governments speak through their respective heads. The head of this Government has publicly declared that the contention of the British Government with respect to the interpretation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty is the correct one. I do not think it fair to the present Executive, and I am sure it will be unfair to the people of the United States, to involve the President of the United States at this time in the proposed arbitration.

Do you expect him to stultify himself? The President of this Nation has told the world that the British contention with respect to this treaty is the correct one. Do you expect him to appoint arbitrators to show the error into which he has fallen?

If the embarrassing task were placed upon him of selecting arbitrators, who would be selected—those who share the view of the President or those who are opposed to it? And if he should select—as he would be justified in doing, if you provide for this arbitration at this time, with your knowledge of his attitude and his belief—three arbitrators sharing his opinion with respect to this disputed interpretation of the treaty, what would be their attitude in a court of arbitration? Could it be anything else than a confession and an admission that the British construction of this treaty is the correct one?

Why, Mr. President, if there ever should come a time when this controversy must be arbitrated, that time is not now. No matter how you conceal your proceedings with respect to the pending legislation, you are giving notice to the world that the American Congress is vindicating the judgment of the American President, who has declared that the British contention is the true one, and that we have been guilty, under another administration, of an act of base violation of international obligations.

No, Mr. President, do not embarrass the President of the United States at this time by requiring him to participate in your proposed arbitration; and, more than the embarrassment to the President, do not embarrass the 100,000,000 people of this country, whose rights, in my judgment, are being sacrificed by the legislation that the majority of this body proposes to-day to put through.

I shall vote against the proposal to arbitrate this question.

[Mr. NEWLANDS addressed the Senate. See Appendix.]

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate only a very few minutes. I want very briefly within that time to say why it seems to me that it was proper to offer this amendment on this particular bill.

The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. BRANDEGEE] has said that while he is in favor of arbitration as a general proposition, and I know he is, he is opposed to putting it on this bill because the treaty-making power consists of the Senate and the President, and this is a bill which must also be passed by the House of Representatives and can be passed by a majority of both Houses, while a treaty must have the affirmative vote of two-thirds of the Senate.

I confess that one of the reasons I offered this amendment to the bill in the way I did was because I feared that when a treaty of arbitration on this proposition came before the Senate it would be difficult to get two-thirds of the Senate to ratify such a treaty. In my judgment the placing of this amendment in the law would have a moral force to assist in securing this two-thirds vote on any treaty of arbitration made in pursuance of such a law. If we passed this law with this amendment added and it thereby became a law, having the approval of the House of Representatives and the signature of the President, it would be a great argument, a great moral force, toward securing the necessary two-thirds vote for the ratification of any treaty made in carrying out such a law. It is quite evident from what several Senators have said and what quite a large number have during the discussion privately said to me, men who are recognized as leaders in the great arbitration movement of the world, who are Members here of the Senate on both sides of the Chamber, that these men do not agree with me that it is proper to attach this amendment to the bill.

While I am firm in my own belief I can not help but recognize the fact that these men, many of whom have had more experience in the arbitration movement than I, some of whom have been leaders in the world in that movement, should be considered and that I ought to concede something to their judgment. I can see that the amendment will not get all of the votes even of its friends, and therefore the showing in its behalf might do harm rather than good. Besides I do not want to put the friends of arbitration in an embarrassing position, quite a number of whom feel it their duty to vote against the amendment because they believe it improper to put it on this bill.

I wish to say just a few words further in justification of my offer of the amendment. What is this dispute that I propose to declare by the amendment is a fit subject for international arbitration? It is stated in the amendment. It is the claim, on one side, of Great Britain that we have no right under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt the ships of American citizens from tolls when passing through the canal. On the part of the United States Government it is claimed that we have such a right. That is all there is to it. All of that dispute arises out of the treaty. There is nothing involved in it except whether, under that treaty, we have a right to make that exemption.

It is wrong to confound that question with the domestic question involved in this law. There is a domestic question—a question of national importance—connected with our economic policy involved in the bill, in addition to the international one. To my mind, I say, I know no reason why this amendment should not be adopted, and yet some Senators, who believe in the principle enunciated by the amendment, think that that is an objection to putting it on the bill. I think we ought to differentiate the two propositions before us. The repeal of this law involves, as I see it, two questions. One is that it is a proper economic policy for the Government of the United States to exempt its vessels from tolls when passing through the canal; that is, regardless of the international question, assuming, for the sake of the argument, that there is no question but we have a right to do it, and assuming therefore that England has no right to be considered, and that neither has any other country of the civilized world any claim or right to be considered. But there is another question involved, and it is to that other question—the international question—that the amendment particularly applies. That is the question arising under the treaty—our right to exempt our vessels from tolls.

I have heard one Senator say here to-day that even though we submitted it to arbitration he would be opposed to abiding by the judgment of the tribunal that did it.

Of course I assume even that Senator, when he comes to deliberate, would take back that statement. I can not conceive how a citizen of the United States, when his Government has entered into a solemn treaty, would violate a judgment rendered on that treaty by an international tribunal which had been agreed to by our Government.

The Senator from Missouri says that he would no more arbitrate this question than he would arbitrate whether we should admit immigrants to our country from certain countries of the world. But we have no treaty with the balance of the world that immigrants shall be admitted. We have here an agreement with England, a contract put in writing. It is not a question now as to whether it is good or bad. Personally I do not believe there is anything in it that hurts us or that there is any danger in it for us. It seems to me that we can afford to take but one position, that after that international agreement it is our duty as representatives here of the people of the United States to see that there shall be no stain upon the honor of our country, and that we will abide honestly and honorably by every agreement into which we have entered.

Now, there are a great many Senators—I think practically all the Senators—who agree with me in that proposition, but for other reasons, some of which I have enumerated and some of which I have not, think that it is unwise to put this amendment on this bill.

I do not want to embarrass those Senators who conscientiously believe in arbitration. This amendment does embarrass some of them, because it will put them before the country and perhaps put the country before the world in a false light on this proposition.

I do not believe we can afford to decline to arbitrate this dispute between Great Britain and this country under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is conceded that it is a dispute and that it is an honest dispute that honest men, of equal ability, of world-wide reputation, after giving it careful study, disagree as to just what the treaty means and as to whether or not we have the power to exempt our vessels from tolls.

It seems to me that we are assuming to ourselves something that no man and no nation has a right to assume, to say we will be alone the arbiters of the agreement which we enter into. We will decide them as best suits our fancy. It was said by another Senator here that it was compared to freight rates on transcontinental railways, and he said he would not submit that question to arbitration.

Of course nobody expects him to. Nobody has proposed to submit that to international arbitration, but as a matter of fact let us apply the principle. I believe that illustrates it. We have an arbitration tribunal to pass on transcontinental freight rates in this country, the Interstate Commerce Commission. It would not be right to say to the shipper, "You can fix a rate." It would not be right to say to the railroad companies, "You can fix them without appeal to any tribunal or to any court." We have found that out from experience, and so we have provided an arbitration tribunal. There is not a question between individuals in all the civilized world where men are so liable to disagree but what civilization has provided an arbitration tribunal. One great hindrance to international arbitration, in my judgment, is that there are not existing in advance courts and rules of courts to try and determine the disputes between nations as they arise.

Now, Mr. President, for the reasons that I have given it seems to me that it would be unwise to press this to a vote, and therefore for those reasons, Mr. President, I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I presume the amendment can not be withdrawn without unanimous consent.

Mr. NORRIS. I think I have a right to withdraw it, but I will withhold the withdrawal if the Senator wants to be heard on it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I do not rise for the purpose of objecting, although I think I have the right to object; but I want to say a word or two about the matter before it is disposed of.

I am personally very strongly in favor of arbitrating this question. I recognize, as the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] has so well said, that the situation in this Chamber just now is not of a character that will probably secure the favorable votes of several Senators who believe as heartily as I do in that proposition. I think it ought to go upon this bill, but a number of Senators who are very much in favor of the bill think that it would endanger it, and for that reason they do not intend to vote for it, although they believe in the principle.

I will say frankly that the fact that it might endanger the bill would not deter me from voting for the amendment. In fact, if there could be any circumstance which would commend it to me more strongly than it is commended, it would be the fact that it would endanger the bill.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Is that the reason why the Senator favors arbitration?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; that is not the reason why I favor arbitration; but as strongly as I favor arbitration and as strongly as I favor this proposed amendment, I would favor it still more if I was quite certain its adoption would defeat this measure.

But, Mr. President, I am sincere in my advocacy of the principle of international arbitration. As much as I am opposed to this bill, I would not do anything that would throw the slightest obstacle in the way of the final accomplishment of the end in which I believe so strongly. I think there is a great deal in what the Senator from Nebraska says, that a vote upon this arbitration proposition now as an amendment to this bill would not receive a majority, and the attitude of many men who would vote against it would not be understood in the country, and in all probability a false notion would arise from that that the Senate is opposed to arbitration.

I think that would be a very unfortunate result. There will be an opportunity of voting upon this question. The Foreign Relations Committee of the Senate has reported the resolution which I introduced which requests the President to open diplomatic negotiations with a view of bringing about arbitration. So the opportunity will not be lost, even if the amendment is not put upon this bill.

The Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE], in the course of the apology which he made a short time ago for voting against the amendment that I offered last night, rather insisted that I was inconsistent in supporting arbitration while I believe so strongly in the American side of this controversy. Why, Mr. President, that is exactly the situation that arises in every lawsuit. I insist as strongly as I know how that I am right in a controversy, and my adversary insists as strongly as he knows how that he is right, and we are both absolutely sincere. The only thing to do under such circumstances is to submit the controversy to arbitration. Of course, a controversy of that kind would go to one of the regularly established courts. Now, we are in exactly the same situation here. Senators and others, like myself, believe in the right of the Government of the United States to exempt the ships of its citizens from the payment of tolls for the use of the Panama Canal. Personally I have no doubt in my own mind about that at all; but the Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], one of the ablest lawyers not only in the United States but in the world, takes the opposite view of the question. I respect his view; I respect his intellectual honesty; I know that if I can claim intellectual honesty for myself, I must accord intellectual honesty to him and to others who take the same view of the matter that he does. We have in that situation lawyers, present and former Presidents, former Secretaries of State, arrayed against one another upon this question; and there is presented the ideal case for arbitration.

Mr. President, we shall have to arbitrate this question one of these days or it will remain a thorn in our side for years and years to come. Let us not forget the trouble we had over the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, which dragged its slow length along for 50 years of continual bickerings and differences of opinion between the two countries, when there was in reality nothing of really serious importance about which to disagree. We have now a matter of great importance to disagree about. Does anybody imagine that the repeal of this tolls-exemption clause by this proposed law is going to end this controversy? Not at all. This discussion is going to be with us for 50 years to come, unless we settle it in some way. It will rise up from time to time as a disturbing difference between this country and Great Britain. I do not think those disturbing conditions ought to exist. I pray God that for all time to come these two great English-speaking nations will remain friendly and at peace with each other. I think there never has been a case presented in all the history of the world that so much calls for arbitration as does this. I feel so strongly about it that I would not even in this situation do anything that I thought would throw the slightest impediment in the way of the final accomplishment of the thing which I hold so much at heart.

For that reason, Mr. President, while I should be glad to vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], while I should be glad to offer my own amendment and have it voted upon for the reasons that I have stated, I shall not object to the withdrawal of the proposed amendment, and I shall not offer my own.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. Mr. President, thus far in this long and sometimes interesting debate I have held my peace. If all had said less and thought more, a vote could have been had a month ago with not a change in the result. Let us hope—all of us, at least, who believe in full and free debate—that no such frequent repetition of this experience will occur, as to force a cloture rule on this body. My experience in the other House of Congress may be responsible for my impatience at the endlessness of talk here. When everybody except the orator is worn out some means will by and by be brought to bear that will silence him. I have listened to all this with credit to myself. [Laughter.] To some of it I have listened with profit and to much of it with interest.

Mr. President, I shall not go into the history of the treaties or even the terms of the treaty now existing between us on the one hand and England and the balance of the civilized world on the other. There is no need to do it here. The whole ground has been covered so often and so fully that I forbear to repeat the history of the negotiations. The whole question to my mind is so clear that I wonder at our differences. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty of 1850 was caused by our protest against English aggression on the east coast of Nicaragua and on her seizure of Tiger Island that blocked the east entrance to any canal across that Republic. The Monroe doctrine began to assert itself, and the United States was in a mood to sever peaceful relations with England. The treaty settled all differences. England afterwards gave up her claim of a protectorate over the Mosquito Coast and her claim to Tiger Island. Neither nation was ready to dig the canal. Neither ever contemplated that either would build it, but both, out of abundant caution, agreed that if the Nicaragua canal was built they each, and both together, would secure its neutrality against any effort otherwise by any nation on the earth. Nothing was said in this treaty nor in any of the negotiations leading up to it which in any way affected our coastwise trade, for at that time no purpose had been shown on our part to undertake such a mammoth enterprise. The great accomplishment was so remote that the insignificant question before us now was never in the contemplation of the high contracting parties. The clause in that treaty guaranteeing equality of "all nations" using the canal to be built probably thereafter by the combined efforts of several or many nations, or, as then contemplated, by a possible syndicate underwritten by the credit of several Governments, bears a very different meaning under largely different facts. I never could understand why the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ever agreed to by the Senate, though abundant alleged reasons have been assigned in this debate. I find no satisfaction in those reasons, or conviction in their favor. But I see nothing in that treaty which leads me to believe that our coastwise trade was involved or even contemplated by the parties negotiating it.

Mr. President, the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was made in the light of and in clear view of our law regulating our coastwise trade, which had been in operation for near a hundred years. No intendment of its repeal by this extraordinary method can be reasonably indulged. Under that law no ship of any other nation could engage in that trade along any part of our American coast. There could be no discrimination where there could be no competition. As no one could compete, no one could complain. If there could thus be no ground of complaint against us by reason of excluding all other nations from this particular business, it is incredible that either of the high contracting parties, by using the term "ships of all nations," did not mean all competing nations and nothing more. The very rules laid down in the treaty for the government of the canal by the United States makes any other construction impossible to my mind. If our law was to be repealed, it would have been mentioned somewhere in the treaty or in the negotiations leading up to it. If England had intended to claim, or we to concede it, the words "including the ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States" would have been inserted. Common frankness required that a clear intent to repeal the laws of either nation should have been at least mentioned somewhere. There was no such intent. It was an afterthought with England. At the time the treaty was made England was only interested in seeing that in the deep-sea trade of the world, of which she was the unchallenged mistress, that no discrimination against her and in favor of any rival should at any time be possible in the use of the canal. She had no other care then. She should have less now, for outside of every expectation at that time, we bought and own the right of way across Panama. We made treaty with that Republic inconsistent with England's present claim, yet she made no protest. We almost doubled the capacity of her bottoms by shortening the pathway of the seas in her trade through the canal. We built the locks; we dug the canal; we fortified it at an expense of brain and energy and money that excite the wonder and deserves the gratitude of all the children of men. England, in her own behalf and as quasi trustee for all foreign maritime nations under this treaty, does herself scant justice in making objections which she has urged.

Mr. President, I do not believe, for reasons already stated, that the treaty involved in any way our coastwise trade. In this judgment I find myself opposed to many of the ablest minds and purest patriots in this country. There is a divergence of opinion in England on the question, in Germany, and France, and probably all other interested nations. The President believes that the term "all nations" used in the treaty applies to the ships engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States. So believing, he has had the courage to appeal to us to keep sacred our national promise and preserve our national honor from stain. Having this conviction, and seeing his duty under it—knowing the clamor it would cause and the false motive which would be assigned—he nevertheless, with high purpose and supreme courage, advised us to do what he believed was our great duty to do, and what he would have done if he had the power. For this he is denounced as being a tool of England—un-American in heart—by those having some purpose to injure him or the party of which he is the head. A man who would violate his conception of the obligations contained in a treaty would not hesitate to violate a private contract. There is no need of denunciation or abuse of high-minded, patriotic men who differ on the construction of language in a contract. I am, however, gratified to find myself in thorough accord with the President in his declaration that freedom from tolls of American-owned ships is a mistaken domestic policy. On that declaration every Democrat who feels as I do can heartily unite in suppressing the subsidy granting free passage through the canal of ships owned by certain Americans, while the balance of our citizens are taxed to pay for its upkeep. I would not vote for this repeal bill if by such vote I would concede England's contention that the treaty bound us to repeal it. I would not vote for this bill without an amendment saving every American right of ownership and sovereignty over the canal. I have said this much to many of my constituents, and said the same to the President in the early days of this debate.

I expressed my purpose to vote against the bill as it passed the House, and I would vote against it now except for the amendment, which leaves us free to do as we please as to the imposition or exemption of tolls. So firmly am I of the opinion that we are not bound in respect of our own shipping through our own canal that I do not see even a question of arbitration in the alleged dispute. I am not sustained in this attitude by many more able and experienced Senators, who now honor me with their attention. I accord to every one of them motives as pure, patriotism as large, and sincerity as great as I claim for myself. None of us here are un-American. No man on this floor, and, indeed, no American in any assembly anywhere, will do anything or say anything or feel within him anything that would surrender a national right to any prince or power on the earth. Our native-born and all true and worthy sons of our adoption share equally that sentiment. There never has been, there never will be, a President of these United States who will lower our banner in the face of any flag on earth. Partisan prejudice, for purposes of its own, may assail with calumny as brutal as that cast against Washington and Jefferson and Jackson, yet all of our Presidents will, as these great heroes did, rise triumphant in history, with no blot or stain or wound on their honor, integrity, or patriotism.

Mr. President, I have, without presenting the treaty and without any purpose to answer arguments from the opposing side in this controversy, rapidly given the reasons which direct my course in relation to it. The other and controlling question here involved merits brief attention. I refer to the plain, open, bare-faced subsidy in this exemption of tolls. A ship owned by an American corporation is no more an American ship than a locomotive engine on any of our railroads is an American engine. Each is private property, owned by private parties, and both are engaged in transporting persons and freight for private profit, and both will charge all the traffic will bear, whether you do or do not subsidize the one by large money which the user of the canal should pay for its upkeep, land grants and the other by paying out of the Public Treasury Is this the expiring wail of the vigorous ship-subsidy sentiment so rampant in this Chamber when the Republicans were in power?

If this is the small burglar's jimmy by which you hope to break into the Treasury vaults for larger sums to be vainly applied in subsidies to our over-seas trade, you will find at last that no subsidy, however great, will ever restore to us a profitable merchant marine. A private business which takes its profits from the public Treasury is a parasite, not an industry. It is an obligation, not an asset. The county poorhouse equals such business as that, in producing prosperity. In fact, the poorhouse has the advantage in that public money reaches forth help to those who need it. Your subsidy doctrine fulfills the scripture curse, "To him that hath shall be given and from him that hath not shall be taken even that which he hath."

No, Mr. President, you can not be impoverishing the people in aid of any business make that business profitable to them. No amount of subsidy will keep our ships on the sea a day after the subsidy is withdrawn. England's present supremacy in the sea-carrying trade is natural. In no way is it due to the superiority of her seamanship or the courage of her sailors. Nor is it occasioned by her laws, any more than we can regain our former place in ocean trade by an edict of Congress. Burden that edict as grievously as you please with subsidies from the people's pocket, yet you will fail to "fret the sea with ships." The reason is obvious. Man is a land animal, and he never took to sea until forced into it by harder conditions on his soil. There never has been, and there never will be, a seafaring nation, carrying trade and exchanging products between the ends of the earth, that has not a crowded population at home, with land inadequate to produce subsistence for its people, where wages are low and no chance to live except by trading products with other people. Man will not leave home and family—abandon wife and children—to face the manifold perils of the sea, when a safer and easier competence meets his equal labor on land. No mighty continent with boundless resources such as ours, can ever hope to compete successfully with a landless people on the sea. With a business too profitable to neglect, with an easy market at home for the products of their labor, men would be fools to take to the sea for a living. These causes, these conditions, have driven our merchant marine out of business. A ship is a tool of commerce.

There was a time when along the inhospitable and unproductive coast of New England we made the cheapest and best ship in the world and manned it with the best sailors. For the time we held supremacy over the sea trade of the globe. The great middle and far West was undeveloped and scarcely known. The New Englander was forced to the sea, just as the first great sailors had been driven from the land in the days of Hiram, King of Tyre, when the landless and manufacturing Phœnicians, the Canaanites of Bible history, exchanged their wonderful cloths dyed in Tyrian scarlet and purple for the food, spices, and jewels of the East and the gold and silver of the Iberian coast. Like conditions to-day would on this continent produce like results. If we had no profitable land, we would be great sailors. If we had no homes, we would go to sea. Having both, we stay on land and let him carry for us who can do it cheaper than we. Subsidies are both wasteful and unavailing, as well as unjust and sinful, against the many forced to suffer extortion for the benefit of the few. Whenever an assault is designed on the taxpayer's pocket the predatory interest invariably wraps itself in the American flag and that proud emblem of the free represents in action a freedom to pilfer from those least able to contribute their means to the maintenance of such "patriotism." I for one will not cast a vote for any subsidy when I see it. If I erred in voting for free tolls, I should retrieve it at the first opportunity. My excuse for such vote, if any excuse can exist, was because the free-tolls provision was a plank in the Democratic platform, and little attention was called to the effect of such a plank. A promise to do an injury to a confiding people, even though contained in a party platform, is more honored in its breach than in its observance. A subsidy has no business in a Democratic platform.

If by some hook or crook or subterfuge or mistake such doctrine gets into it—a doctrine so violative of our party history and Democratic tradition—the beneficiaries may learn now that such a scheme can not avail to accomplish its purpose when the case is fully understood. I am blaming no man who thinks that he is bound by his party platform, no matter what a few delegates to the convention may have written in it, even though contradictory planks appear. I am finding fault with no man on this side for the view he takes of his obligation or the course pursued by him in effectuating it. I would concur with my Democratic friends in their vote for free tolls if I believed, as they declare, that a vote otherwise recognizes England's right under the treaty to demand that tolls shall be laid on our coastwise ships now, henceforth, and forever. I would go with them but for the amendment now adopted, which directly declares our sovereignty over the canal and our right to do as we please about the tolls question. It surrenders nothing to England's claims, but, on the contrary, asserts that we do not surrender any rights we have by collecting these tolls on all ships using the canal True, the President in his message to Congress said that the free-tolls statute was in plain contravention of the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. For reasons already stated, I find myself unable to agree with him in that conclusion. The President in the same message also said that free tolls to ships owned by citizens of the United States was a mistaken domestic policy. In that finding I fully concur, and that consideration alone directs my course and controls my vote. Discarding, as I do, all question of the treaty or its claimed relation to our right of free action, I am quite free to determine that the few shipowners using the canal for their own profit shall pay their part of its upkeep rather than that all the balance of the people shall be taxed to keep the canal in repair for them. Everybody knows that the canal will not be self-supporting. A large deficit, amounting to many millions, will annually occur. Somebody has to pay this. Is it fair to you, farmer, miner, artisan, mechanic, that the rich American shipowner can use your property without paying a cent for the use while you are forced to pay for its construction, for its upkeep, for its defense, and the wages of the men who lift and lower his vessels through the locks; pay the men working for the benefit of the Ship Trust, while no hope of any return to you is in sight except the usual unkept promise to give back to the people the money extorted from them by taxation.

No matter who advocated such a monstrous doctrine, no matter in what platform it was written, no man is wise enough, no man potent enough, no party great enough to redeem it from palpable wrong and flagrant injustice. That particular plank contradicts, as I have before said, not only the time-honored doctrine of the Democratic Party, but is itself directly contradicted by the same platform in which it occurs. Besides all this, that free-toll plank has been directly repudiated by three-fourths of the delegates who were serving in that convention, as shown by letters, over their own signatures, sent to a Member of this body. Not one in twenty of them ever knew, when voting for this platform, that such a plank was in it.

The claim is being urged by these taxgathering shipowners that the transcontinental railroads will be benefited by imposing tolls on these ships. We all know that the railroads have been so conducted as to leave the public mind prejudiced against them, and this fact accounts largely for such use of this prejudice by the shipowner to blind the people while he asks the public to pay his bills. Have we reached the point where prejudice against one robber is to be used as a shield favoring another attempting to rob? Can even a just prejudice against an old wrongdoer invite a new wrongdoer into the field of successful exploitation? I personally do not believe that free toll through the canal, by reason of the close corporation engaged in sea transportation, and also by the long distance in passage, and also by the certain freight-rate agreements that would otherwise be made between the ship and the railroad, will in any way, tolls or no tolls, very much affect, if it affects at all, the price which the consumer will pay for the products carried by either.

The railroads can no longer charge what they please. The Interstate Commerce Commission fixes its rates. They can no longer impose at will whatever burden the traffic will bear. The whole loud cry that this legislation is in aid of the railroad amounts at last to no more than an appeal for a subsidy—a plea that if you do not let us into your pocket the other fellow will steal from you. The one's aggression has been curbed by law. Shall we give another monopoly free rein? Our duty is to keep the hands of both out of the Public Treasury. It can easily be done by the Interstate Commerce Commission fixing just and fair rates for rail transportation, and the law requiring from sea transportation its fair and just share in the upkeep of our canal.

The free tolls will not, in my best judgment, aid the consumers in my State or in any other State similarly situated. I do not believe that free tolls will prove of much, if any, benefit, even to seaport cities; and even though such policy would help such cities, it certainly will not help them to the extent of the loss to all the people of the United States, which would be occasioned by compelling them all to pay for the expense of keeping the canal in operation and repair, for the benefit of the users of the canal who pay nothing toward its support. The coastwise trade of the United States is a monopoly, made so by our law. It has no competition. It is fully protected. It needs no contribution from the people. The time for subsidies and special privileges is luckily passing. Let us hope it has passed for all time to come.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I should like to say, for the information of those who are not familiar with locks and canals, who do not live upon them, that in the State which I in part represent we have two systems—a lock and canal on which a toll is charged, and another which is conducted by the Government and is free and open to all that come to use it; so we are familiar with both. We see them day by day, every day in the year, and have seen them for years.

In one instance the locks were owned by a private corporation, and a toll was charged of 50 cents a ton, and it entirely killed all of the traffic upon the river. It died. It went into the hands of the railroad company which had a line of railway along the river. In the other instance it is free and open to all the steamers which come to it, and there is an independent line of steamers and a lower freight rate up and down that river in consequence of the freedom from tolls.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. LANE. Of course, it is in the nature of a subsidy.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Oregon yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. LANE. I do.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator will pardon me, I wish to make a parliamentary inquiry. What is before the Senate?

Mr. LANE. The tolls question, as I understand—Panama Canal tolls.

Mr. SIMMONS. Is there any amendment pending at this time?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In answer to the inquiry of the Senator from North Carolina, the Chair will state that the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] asked leave to withdraw his amendment. As the amendment has not been amended, and the yeas and nays have not been ordered upon it, under Rule XXI of the Senate he is entitled to withdraw it. The amendment is not before the Senate for consideration. The question before the Senate is the bill itself.

Mr. SIMMONS. I beg the pardon of the Senator from Oregon. I did not mean to interrupt him. I simply wanted to find out whether the amendment is now pending or not.

Mr. LANE. I do not wish to occupy any of the time of the Senate. I wish to say to them, for their information, and without prejudice either for or against the question, that we have both systems. The one wherein a toll was charged has killed off the traffic on the river. In the other case, where there are no tolls, which I presume is in the nature of a subsidy, the same as the case of the Panama Canal, traffic on the river has been kept open and alive, and the freight rates have been lowered.

That is the result of the experience of the people who have tried the two plans.

Mr. RANSDELL. Mr. President, on the 2d of this month I introduced an amendment which I propose to offer at the proper time. I shall detain the Senate but a few moments to explain it before having it read. It provides that the passage of this act shall not be held to mean that the coastwise trade of the United States is affected by the Hay-Pauncefote treaty.

My purpose in offering this amendment is to show, if possible, that this country did not violate any pledge or obligation or contract of any kind when the tolls act was passed two years ago. Coastwise commerce is interstate commerce. It is domestic commerce. It is commerce in which England has no interest. Hence the treaty-making power, in making the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, had no right to include the coastwise commerce, if there was any attempt to include it; and my contention is that there was no such attempt.

Section 8 of Article I of the Constitution provides that Congress shall have power "to regulate commerce with foreign nations, and among the several States, and with the Indian tribes"—Congress, not the Executive and the Senate. Another article of the Constitution authorizes the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to make treaties between this Nation and a foreign nation. A treaty is a compact between two sovereignties concerning matters which relate to them, and it must be confined to matters of interest to those two sovereignties.

What interest has England in our purely domestic affairs? What interest has England in our rules and regulations concerning railway business between New York and Chicago, or St. Louis and Cincinnati, or New Orleans and Galveston? Those are purely domestic affairs.

What interest has England or any other foreign country in our copyright laws, our patent laws, our police and quarantine regulations? Absolutely none; and if the treaty-making power attempted to interfere in or regulate any of those matters it would be so clearly ultra vires that it would have no force or effect whatsoever.

COMMERCE FROM ONE AMERICAN PORT TO ANOTHER.

The commerce along our coast, which from the very beginning of this Republic has been confined to American vessels, is just as much a domestic, internal, interstate affair as police regulations, copyrights, patents, or railroad regulations—certainly just as much.

You may say that we are going to pass a law now in which the whole Congress is participating. Yes; we are; but many people expect to vote for this bill because they say we made a bargain with England and, hard bargain though it be, we must stand by it as honorable men. They say we are morally bound and obligated by the terms of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to treat our coastwise vessels exactly the same as we do the vessels of foreign countries passing through the Panama Canal.

If I can demonstrate to you, as I believe I can, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty could not in any way affect this interstate commerce, I will at least have shown that there is no moral obligation imposed upon us in this matter; and that would be a very important thing from my viewpoint, for I am one of those men who stand by a contract when I make it; and if our Government made a contract with Great Britain it ought to stand by it, no matter how hard it may be to do so.

I wish to read very briefly from an eminent authority on this subject, and will ask the careful attention of the Senators. I shall detain them but a few moments. I read from page 170 of volume 5 of the Digest on International Law, by Mr. John Bassett Moore. He says:

> That a treaty can not invade the constitutional prerogatives of the legislature is thus illustrated by a German author, who has given to the subject a degree of elaborate and extended exposition which it has received from no writer in our own tongue:
> "Congress has under the Constitution the right to lay taxes and imposts as well as to regulate foreign trade; but the President and Senate, if the 'treaty-making power' be regarded as absolute, would be able to evade this limitation by adopting treaties which would compel Congress to destroy its whole tariff system. According to the Constitution, Congress has the right to determine questions of naturalization, of patents, and of copyright. Yet, according to the view here contested, the President and Senate, by a treaty, could on these important questions utterly destroy the legislative capacity of the House of Representatives. The Constitution gives Congress the control of the Army. Participation in this control would be snatched from the House of Representatives by a treaty with a foreign power by which the United States would bind itself to keep in the field an army of a particular size. The Constitution gives Congress the right of declaring war; this right would be illusory if the President and Senate could by a treaty launch the country into a foreign war. The power of borrowing money on the credit of the United States resides in Congress; this power would cease to exist if the President and Senate could by treaty bind the country to the borrowing of foreign funds. By the Constitution 'no money shall be drawn from the Treasury, but in consequence of appropriations made by law'; but this limitation would cease to exist if by a treaty the United States could be bound to pay money to a foreign power. * * * Congress would cease to be the law-making power, as is prescribed by the Constitution; the law-making power would be the President and the Senate. Such a condition would become the more dangerous from the fact that treaties so adopted, being on this particular hypothesis superior to legislation, would continue in force until superseded by other treaties. Not only, therefore, would a Congress consisting of two Houses be made to give way to an oligarchy of President and Senate, but the decrees of this oligarchy, when once made, could only be changed by concurrence of President and of a Senatorial majority of two-thirds."

Mr. President, it is well established that the assent of the House of Representatives and the whole Congress is necessary to any legislation affecting appropriations or changing the revenue laws. It is preposterous, sir, to think that the President and the Senate can affect the revenue laws of this Nation. Yet if the construction which many have given to this provision be taken, the President and Senate have by treaty with Great Britain affected our revenue laws, because this is a revenue measure. We propose to raise revenue by imposing tolls on our coastwise commerce passing through that canal. That question came up in a very interesting way a great many years ago. President Washington had a controversy with Congress in regard to it, and the subject is so well expressed by a great Virginian, Mr. Henry St. George Tucker, in a letter to me under date of May 28 last, that I read from it because it conveys the idea much better than I can express it. He says:

> In the line of your argument let me call your attention to this fact: Under the Jay treaty, 1796, the House of Representatives, by vote of 63 to 36, asserted its prerogative to examine and deliberate upon all treaties that carried appropriations (or changed the revenue laws). President Washington, you will remember, denied the claim of the House. I have only finished an examination of this question in the last two days, and find that every President from John Adams to McKinley (except William Henry Harrison) has sent one or more treaties to both Houses of Congress which contained either appropriations or changes in the revenue laws for their action, showing that the victory won by the House in the Jay treaty fight was complete, for none of the Presidents in the time named followed the example of Washington.

Mr. President, I do not wish to take the time of the Senate for any elaborate discussion of this matter. I simply wish to make it clear that the House of Representatives was not a party to the Hay-Pauncefote treaty; that it is a necessary party to any law, to any regulation affecting interstate, international, and domestic commerce, and as it is a necessary party that this treaty could not affect our domestic commerce without violating the Constitution. If that be true, then we have a perfectly moral and legal right to do as we please concerning the tolls, and at the same time, sir, the fair thing to do, the open, honorable thing, is for the Senate to go on record in asserting the well-known, well-established right of the House of Representatives to a participation in any such measure as this.

Bear in mind that the House of Representatives originated the great law that gave us the $400,000,000 to construct the Panama Canal, and that for 10 years it has originated the great appropriation bills under which we have carried on this colossal work. Bear in mind that the House of Representatives is very close to the people of this country, closer in many ways than the Senate. They were entitled to participate in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty if it was to affect our domestic commerce.

Mr. President, let me repeat that that treaty does not, it can not, under the plain terms of the Constitution and the law of the land affect in any way our coastwise commerce.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana [Mr. RANSDELL] to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I offer an amendment, which I send to the Secretary's desk as a substitute for the bill. I will not ask that it be read. All Senators are familiar with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It need not be read. Let it be stated.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. The Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] proposes to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That the second sentence in section 5 of the act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912, which reads as follows: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," shall be suspended and shall not take effect as a statute of the United States until July 1, 1915, on which date it shall have full force and effect as a statute law of the United States. It is further provided that the proper authorities operating said Panama Canal, who shall, prior to said date, collect tolls levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States, are hereby directed to set apart all such tolls so collected and retain the same in a separate fund until July 1, 1915. On that date, or as soon thereafter as possible, such tolls so collected shall be returned to the parties from whom they were collected, provided no contrary disposition has been made by law prior to that time.

That so soon as practicable after the passage of this act the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to appoint a commission, consisting of not less than three nor more than five persons to be selected by him, for the purpose of meeting a like commission to be appointed by His Majesty the King of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland and of the British dominions beyond the Seas, in a diplomatic conference to be held at such time and place as His Britannic Majesty and the President of the United States may agree upon. The purpose of such diplomatic conference shall be to take into consideration the controversy now pending between Great Britain and the United States as to the proper construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, so far as the provisions of the same involve the right of the latter to regulate by its own legislation the levying of tolls upon vessels engaged in its coastwise trade and passing through said Panama Canal. It shall be the duty of such diplomatic conference, acting in the light of the discussions that have already taken place, to seek, in an equitable and friendly spirit, some practical solution of the entire question now at issue, which will worthily round out a hundred years of peace and friendship by respecting and conserving the interests and honor of both nations. The conclusions reached by such diplomatic conference shall be reported at its close to the Governments of Great Britain and the United States by their respective commissioners; but such conclusions shall not be binding upon either Government until accepted by both, and duly ratified upon the part of the United States by the necessary and appropriate legislation.

That the expenses and compensation of the said commissioners to be appointed to attend said diplomatic conference upon the part of the United States shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the Department of State according to law.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I realize that the Senators are weary and I am not going to prolong the discussion of this question by an elaborate or exhaustive analysis of the amendment proposed by me. I am convinced that the edict has gone forth, the minds of the Senators are made up that certain things shall be done, and that those certain things will be done by the Senate I have not the slightest doubt.

Mr. President, whatever may be done I trust will redound to the honor and welfare of our common country. It is a source of some regret that my sense of public duty leads me to differ from the President and a majority of the Democrats on the question at issue. I am devoted to my party, because I think it stands for the best things in American politics. Its interests are not only of personal concern, but of national moment. I regret to differ from the President of the United States, for whom I entertain most cordial good will and for whose learning I have great admiration, and whose patriotism I have never questioned. But, Mr. President, I have a duty to perform. I have obligations to absolve which I can not neglect or ignore. I believe that the perpetuity of this Republic depends upon the honesty and intelligence of the individual voter, and the fidelity, patriotism, and intelligence of the representatives of the people in the performance of their respective functions.

It has been said in the public press that I have criticized the President of the United States; that my attack upon him was "bitter." It has also been said that I had taken a "lick at the Secretary of State, Mr. Bryan." Mr. President, there was and is no bitterness in my heart toward those gentlemen, and the statements that I have bitterly attacked them has not enough of the elements of truth in them to make a well-developed decent piece of fiction. There is no feeling save that which should animate the soul of every self-respecting, intellectually honest man in this Republic for these distinguished officeholders. That I have criticized them I do not deny. They are subjects of criticism. They ought to be criticized when they deserve it. When they say and do that which I disapprove, or from which I disagree, ordinary self-respect and fidelity to my constituents demands that I should say so. There is no intellectual progress possible without liberty of thought and freedom of speech.

> I honor the man who is willing to sink
> Half his present repute for the freedom to think:
> And after he has thought, be his cause strong or weak,
> Will sink t' other half for the privilege to speak.

But in doing it no man can truthfully say that I have done it in a spirit of hostility. Mr. President—

> I honor the man, born and taught,
> That serveth not another's will,
> Whose armor is his honest thought
> And simple truth his utmost skill.

I know the disposition of the supersycophantic, the servile swingers of the incense pot in which is burned every vestige of independence, intellectual self-respect, and political honesty of their dwarfed souls and meager intellects, in order to delight the olfactories of those in authority. I know men of that character will impute to me improper motives, or motives of hostility to the administration. But what they may say or what they think is of little consequence or concern to me. Their purpose or hope doubtless is to get closer to the throne. Their vicious vaporings will vanish as a bad odor—the effluvium of a decadent mentality and decrepit manhood—which will be remembered by me only with mingled emotions of pity and regret.

Mr. President, the disposition of some people to apotheosize the officeholder, to hedge him about with a divinity which negatives the idea of fallibility, can not be considered by me with any degree of tolerance. The President of the United States is but the hired man of the American people. He is not a ruler, as my learned, eloquent friend, the ornate Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] has characterized him. He has been chosen by the people to perform a definite function, to hold his office for a fixed, definite period of time. He is simply an employee of the Nation, whose acts are subject to proper and legitimate criticism, and to whom should be given advice and counsel by all lovers of the Republic. It is only by the exchange of experiences, the attrition of ideas, and the friction of suggestions that the eternal truth shall be evolved. The only ruler in this Republic, Mr. President, is the man or the woman who deposits the ballot.

The President of the United States occupies the greatest office within the gift of any people on earth. The office of a United States Senator is a great office. The office of governor of a State is a great office; that of Representative in Congress is a great office, but I repeat the greatest and most vital function performed by any citizen or any man in this country is that performed by the man or the woman who casts the ballot.

I want to say furthermore that all the people have more sense and their judgment is more to be relied upon than the wisest man on earth. I would rather trust the feeling of a people than the intellectual processes of some men. The President may make mistakes, Congress may make mistakes, the legislatures of States and governors of States may make mistakes, but the people in the performance of the supreme function of citizenship can correct those mistakes. They can wipe them from the statute books just as a school-teacher will efface the sum that the pupil has worked upon the blackboard.

I want to say further in this connection that no reform in all the ages of the world has ever been effected that did not originate with the people. It is also true that issues grow out of the conditions of the people rather than originating in the brain of individual statesmen. Our Government has not passed the experimental stage yet. A century and a quarter is but a span in the life of a nation. Every election in the history of this Republic is a crisis. We to-day are writing history which few of us, I dare say none of us, understand the real meaning and significance of. We do not realize the consequences that will flow from our acts to-day. Some one has wisely said that the most striking thing that history teaches is the unmindfulness of what is taking place on the part of those who are prominent actors in what have proven to be the great turning points of time.

The country is safe as long as the individual citizen realizes his power and performs his function properly, and the servants of the people, the officeholders, the Representatives, the Senators, and the President, shall be faithful to the people. The only light which we have to guide us in the darkness of the future is the light which shines out from the experiences of the past.

No, Mr. President; I am not antagonistic to the President in the performance of his duty. I would have him guided by that spirit of patriotism, that love of country—I would have him imbued with that sublime spirit described by Markham when he said:

God give us the Cromwell fire to make us feel
The common burden and the public trust
To be a thing as sacred and august
As the white vigil where the angels kneel.
We need a faith to go the path untrod,
The power to be alone and vote with God.

No; I am not indulging in idle or unfriendly criticism, nor is it my desire to cause any friction in the Democratic ranks, because I realize that unanimity of sentiment, concert of action on the part of the Democracy of America means much, not only for the Republic to-day but in the years to come.

Mr. President, in the settlement of this controversy or this question I have proposed an amendment. The purpose of that amendment is to authorize the American and the British Governments to appoint commissioners who shall meet in the spirit of friendship to which we are committed by treaty and shall discuss the differences between the two nations on this question and if possible report to their respective Governments a satisfactory settlement.

Senators will remember that the last word of Secretary Knox to the English ambassador was, when the proposition was made to arbitrate this question, "We have not reached that point, and your suggestion is premature; we have not exhausted all diplomatic resources, and until that shall be done the suggestion of arbitration is not to be considered." Of course I do not quote Mr. Knox literally.

By this method the subject would be taken from the domain of partisan politics. It would enable the Democratic administration to solve the problem without violating pledges to the people. It would avoid the deleterious effect which must necessarily follow the repudiation of platform pledges. I know of nothing more regrettable, Mr. President, than for the plain, honest citizen to lose faith in the veracity, the honesty, and sincerity of the public servant.

Now I am not going to delay the vote upon this question by longer discussing all of the issues involved, but I have been somewhat amused and interested at the importance that has been ascribed to and the stress that has been placed upon the question of subsidy. I listened with great interest to the speech made by the junior Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] on yesterday. His candor was refreshing; the affluence of his eloquence charming; his arguments were cogent; and I think he completely convinced every Senator who honored him with his ear that this subsidy argument is an afterthought; that it is an intellectual expedient, resorted to to justify the betrayal of platform promises.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, will the Senator from Mississippi yield to me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SAULSBURY in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VARDAMAN. With pleasure.

Mr. JAMES. The Senator from Mississippi has said that the question of subsidy was an afterthought.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The argument of subsidy, I said.

Mr. JAMES. How does the Senator make that statement comport with the memorandum which was written by President Taft at the time he signed the bill, a clause of which we are undertaking to repeal, and in which he very boldly and very plainly stated that it was a subsidy?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Because I know that the Senator from Kentucky would never have put the stamp of his approval on that platform if he had thought this exemption was a subsidy. He could not have done it and maintained his intellectual honesty and been true and faithful to his constituency.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Mr. President, there are two declarations in that platform directly in opposition to that subsidy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Did the Senator call attention to the conflict?

Mr. JAMES. No; I did not call attention to the conflict.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Did the Senator tell the people whom he asked to vote the Democratic ticket that we were double-dealing with them?

Mr. JAMES. There was no conflict and there is no conflict in the platform, so far as the Democratic Party is concerned. The Democratic House of Representatives itself cast a majority vote against the identical thing that the Senator is contending for.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I know of no man——

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Who has insisted more strenuously and more eloquently and more earnestly than has the distinguished Senator from Kentucky upon the literal enforcement and observance of the Democratic platform.

Mr. JAMES. But did the Senator himself state to the convention or to the committee which had under consideration this platform that when they indorsed the act of the House of Representatives they were indorsing their vote in opposition to this subsidy for which the Senator is so eloquent in his speech?

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; I never thought it was a subsidy any more than I thought it was a subsidy to indorse the plank in the platform which I and Representative BROUSSARD wrote in favor of river improvements.

Mr. JAMES. Now, if the Senator did not think it was a subsidy, why did he say in the speech that he formerly made that after consultation with his people—he seemed to think that that was necessary—he would vote, or perhaps he might vote to make ships pay the expense of putting them through the canal.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, I will tell the Senator why. I do not know that it would be an injustice to make the ships that go down the Warrior River pay to the Government a slight tariff for the privilege of carrying coal to New Orleans—or the Mississippi River or the Ohio River or any other river. That is a mere economic question.

Mr. JAMES. Why, then, Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, does not the Senator vote here as the representative of the great people of Mississippi to make this monopoly pay $2,000,000 a year into the Treasury rather than to put it upon the bending backs of the tillers of the soil of Mississippi?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will tell you why I do not. It is because that is not the issue involved in this controversy. The President of the United States has made the issue; the President of the United States in his address to Congress made the issue. It was not a question of tolls.

Mr. JAMES. The President of the United States said that it was economically unsound.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Yes; and he said——

Mr. JAMES. And by that he meant that it was a subsidy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. If the President of the United States had felt that way, the President is too candid and honest a man to have left it in the form that he did.

Mr. JAMES. He stated that, and I do not know of anybody in this country who is more capable of expressing himself.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not think anybody ever read his speech that way except the Senator from Kentucky.

Mr. JAMES. Ah, the trouble with the Senator from Mississippi is that in his love for this monopoly he has lost sight of the real Democratic tendency and trend and faith.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. JAMES. The President of the United States said that it was economically unsound, and by that he meant that it was a subsidy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The intimation that the Senator from Kentucky makes that I am in love with any trust or with any subsidy is absolutely without foundation in fact, and the Senator knows when he states it that he says that which is not true and that he makes an unjust charge against me.

Mr. JAMES. Oh, Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi need not fret himself into such excitement about that.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator from Mississippi is not going to permit the Senator from Kentucky to put words into his mouth or to impute to him an improper motive.

Mr. JAMES. I was not doing that, Mr. President, but I was stating what I believe to be the fact—that those who vote for this bill are voting a subsidy in the interest of a monopoly.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator is in error when he states that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators should speak one at a time.

Mr. JAMES. I will state to the Senator that when he votes for this bill he votes to give a subsidy to a monopoly. I do not mean to ascribe to the distinguished Senator any unworthy motive. I mean that he, as a Senator from Mississippi, is casting a vote the purpose of which is to exempt this monopoly from the payment of tolls, and I say that is a subsidy.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Of course the Senator from Kentucky is entitled to his opinion. I trust he has one, and I hope it is not borrowed, and I hope also it is the result of his own intellectual processes.

I am not going to delay the vote upon this question longer by discussion of the subsidy feature of this debate; but I do resent any efforts on the part of any Senator, or on the part of anybody else, to put upon me or those who hold the views that I do the odium of supporting any form of trust or subsidy.

It is quite unfortunate, I think, Mr. President, that distinguished Senators would sacrifice what I believe to be candor, and would employ this questionable expedient in order that their fellow Senators may be put in a false light. It will not work; the American people can not be deceived.

Mr. HUGHES. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from New Jersey?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I yield to an interruption.

Mr. HUGHES. The Senator is criticizing other Senators for lack of candor and for incorrectness of statement, and yet the Senator himself said a while ago that the cry of subsidy was purely an expedient and an afterthought. I happen to be one of those men who voted against this proposition two years ago, before any question of American sovereignty was raised.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Did you call attention to it during the campaign?

Mr. HUGHES. My vote called attention to it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Did you call attention to it during the campaign before the American people?

Mr. HUGHES. I am calling it to the attention of the Senator now, that as a Member of the House of Representatives I voted against this proposition before there was any question of sovereignty raised. I voted against it, and so did a majority of the Democrats of that body on the ground that it was a subsidy—I recognized a subsidy in its new guise. I had seen it under many guises. I simply say to the Senator that recklessness of statement is no more becoming in him than it is in others. He casts a reflection not only upon me, but he casts a reflection upon nearly the whole delegation of the State of Mississippi, for, if my recollection serves me aright, they voted as I did at that time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I do not doubt it, and yet those same Representatives went before the American people upon this platform. They approved what the President had said; they approved the platform; and they did it, not believing it to be a subsidy, but because they thought, as the President had said, that it was going to facilitate commerce between the States. If they did not think that way about it, they should have declared themselves against it.

Mr. HUGHES. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. They thought, as the President said it would, that it was going to make cheaper rates for the farmer. That is the way they interpreted it. If the President of the United States had asked that the exemption clause be repealed because it was a subsidy, it would have put the matter in a very different light. The question before the Senate, however, is not whether it is a subsidy, but whether we shall maintain sovereignty over that canal. That is the paramount issue with me.

Mr. HUGHES and Mr. JAMES addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To which of the two Senators does the Senator from Mississippi yield?

Mr. HUGHES. If the Senator will permit me, I do not like to interrupt him, and there has been enough of this debate; yet I think perhaps it would be well for me at this time to call attention to the quoted declaration of the President of the United States on this subject. I happened to be the man who introduced him at the meeting where he made this declaration; it was I who caused him to make it; and the declaration that he made was not with reference to the exemption given to American vessels, but it was made, and anybody who reads the language can see that it was made, with reference to the action of the Senate and the House of Representatives in forbidding American railroad-owned ships from going through the canal.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Does the Senator mean to create the impression that the President did not intend to say to those farmers what he did say?

Mr. HUGHES. I say that the President said to those farmers exactly what he intended to say, which was that the Congress was wise in preventing railroad-owned and trust-controlled ships from going through that canal, because, in the nature of things, railroad-owned ships would not compete with the railroads; and the conditions brought about by the refusal of Congress to permit these particular ships to use that canal would result in competition and cheaper railroad rates. I was there and introduced him and listened to his speech and gave him the information.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The President was discussing the bill which permitted American coastwise vessels to go through the canal free of tolls.

Mr. HUGHES. The President was discussing the refusal of Congress to permit railroad-owned ships to go through that canal. I was there and heard him make the speech.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Then I suppose the reporter reported him incorrectly.

Mr. HUGHES. The reporter reported him absolutely correctly, according to my recollection; and no fair reading of the speech can support the construction which the Senator is endeavoring to put upon it.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, Mr. President, I am incapable of understanding the English language if it does not mean what I have said it means. The American people believe it means that; and of all the planks in the platform that was the one which the President stood upon to induce the farmers of the country to support the Democratic ticket. Its merits and virtue were most prominent.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. SWANSON in the chair). Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Kentucky?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Certainly.

Mr. JAMES. I understood the Senator a moment ago to complain that the President of the United States had not in his message to Congress, in asking for this repeal, placed himself upon the ground that tolls exemption was a subsidy. Now, what I should like to know is this: If the President had in his message taken the position that the exemption clause ought to have been repealed because it is a subsidy, whether or not the Senator from Mississippi would have supported the President?

Mr. VARDAMAN. I will tell you what, if I had been consulted about it, I should have advised. If the President felt that free tolls was economically incorrect, if the President had felt that it was violative of the treaty obligations of this country with Great Britain, I think it would have been his duty to have called the attention of Congress to that fact and to have stated to Congress that he had changed his opinion about it; that he had not during the campaign correctly interpreted the treaty——

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Now, wait a moment, until I answer the question——

Mr. JAMES. Certainly; I just wanted to make a suggestion.

Mr. VARDAMAN. That he had not correctly interpreted the treaty, and that he was going to call the attention of Congress to it; and after they should have had an opportunity to consult with their masters, the people, at the November election, to ask them to repeal this clause, because he believed it was violative of our treaty obligations and was economically incorrect. I think that would have been all right. We would have then been able to have consulted with our masters and to do what he now asks us to do, if we think best, without violating party promises or betraying any trust. Now, I want to say in this connection——

Mr. JAMES. Just a moment——

Mr. VARDAMAN. I am no more in favor of special privileges than any other Senator upon this floor.

Mr. JAMES. Then, Mr. President, if I understand the Senator from Mississippi correctly, his reason for voting against repealing this subsidy is that, according to his judgment, the President in his message did not place before the Congress the proper reasons why it should be done.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; that is not true. My reason for voting against it is that the issue is not the question of subsidy, but the question of sovereignty over the canal.

Mr. JAMES. But I asked the Senator this question: If the President had placed it upon the ground of subsidy, would the Senator then have voted for repeal?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Not at this time; no.

Mr. JAMES. I am not talking about this time; I am talking about any time.

Mr. VARDAMAN. No; not now. When we shall have made the proper declaration and announced to the world our sovereignty over the canal, then I am in favor of taking up and considering the economic question involved.

Now, Mr. President, in conclusion, when I contemplate this deviation from the paths of rectitude which the distinguished citizen from Nebraska, Hon. W. J. Bryan, now Secretary of State, has marked out for the faithful Democrats to follow, when I think of this repudiation of a solemn promise, when I consider this servile surrender of a sovereign right over the Panama Canal, without justification or excuse, I am reminded of the fiery words which came burning from the heart of the prophet of old, pleading with the faithless children of Israel, when he exclaimed:

The ox knoweth his owner and the ass his master's crib, but Israel doth not know, my people doth not consider.

Mr. WEST and Mr. WILLIAMS addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I had not intended to say any more in the debate on the pending question before the Senate. I endeavored, however, a few days ago, when the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN] delivered his speech, to obtain the floor to answer the strictures and criticisms made not only against the President of the United States, but against every Member of the Senate who may vote for the passage of the pending bill. What was the utterance of the Senator from Mississippi on that occasion, in spite of which he respects the high standing of the President and the Senators who see fit to oppose the position he here assumed? Here are his words:

I shall follow no man or body of men who carry the red flag of party infidelity, who will sanction the violation of a solemn platform promise.

That is the declaration he made on the floor here last week when he delivered that notable address. Is not that a charge of party infidelity, because they see fit to ask the repeal of this bill, that sanctions, in my judgment, the highest sort of subsidy?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, will the Senator from Georgia pardon an interruption?

Mr. WEST. No, sir; I do not wish to be interrupted.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator refuses to be interrupted.

Mr. WEST. I want to make my short deliverance to the Senate. Now, let us see if the junior Senator from Mississippi, in assuming this position, is correct.

We remember—and I censure nobody who took different positions in those great campaigns—the days of free silver and sound money. In 1892 the Populist Party adopted a free-silver plank, and we, on the hustings and platforms of the country, were appealing to the people in favor of sound money. In 1896 the Democratic Party adopted free silver in its platform. What was the result of it? It resulted in splitting the Democratic Party in twain, and Palmer and Buckner were nominated on a sound-money platform. There were thousands of Democrats in this country who, notwithstanding they did not believe in 16 to 1, stood by their party organization. That was the result at that time.

Let us go further and see whether his accusation is founded in good party politics. What about Samuel J. Randall? He opposed the very central thought there was in the Democratic Party. The Democratic Party opposed protection for protection's sake; but Sam Randall was a protection Democrat. What did the Democratic Party do for him? In 1876 they elected him Speaker of the House of Representatives in spite of the position he took; and they not only elected him for that term but they elected him for three consecutive terms. Yet he opposed the very central idea there was in the platform. That was the situation.

Now, what is a platform, and how is it made up? It is made up in the time of excitement and of the different factions opposing each other in their party. It is nothing but concession; and I may say here, and I say it boldly and fearlessly, that no platform in its entirety is ever legislated into law.

Here is an apparent contradiction in the platform. A good many people—I, for one—have never agreed with that platform. I was in a foreign land when it was made, and I was absolutely astounded when I found out that this plank was incorporated in the Democratic platform, because it was in absolute contradiction to the policy that the Democratic Party had adopted for years.

There has been much criticism indulged in on this side. I have tried to be indulgent and to allow the Senators who occupied the opposite side of this question to view it as they saw fit. There has been charged here to the Carnegie Foundation the expenditure of $30,000. Who knows but that the shipping interests have spent a hundred thousand dollars in order to secure the defeat of this bill?

Mr. VARDAMAN. Have you been offered any?

Mr. WEST. Do not say that to me.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Well, you are making an intimation that somebody else has been influenced.

Mr. WEST. I did not say so. I said——

Mr. VARDAMAN. You said——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will please come to order. The Senators will please take their seats.

Mr. WEST. I did not say they had been bribed or otherwise.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senators will please take their seats. The Sergeant at Arms will see that the two Senators are seated.

Mr. WEST. No; I am not going to sit down. I am not through.

Mr. VARDAMAN. The Senator can not make an intimation of that kind.

Mr. WEST. I did not intimate it.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia made no intimation that there was any influence exerted on Senators.

Mr. WEST. I certainly did not make any.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The two Senators must be seated. The Senator from Georgia will proceed. He is entitled to the floor.

Mr. JAMES. Mr. President, the Senator from Georgia has a right to go on.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. WEST. I did not even say that $100,000 had been spent. I said, Who knows but that $100,000 might have been spent in mailing out literature in attempting to mold sentiment, possibly? You all know it has been done in the past, and it will be done in the future. The charge has been made here, however, of party infidelity; that the President of the United States is guilty of party infidelity, and the Members who see fit to follow him in the support of this bill seeking the repeal of free tolls. Then Senators come here after saying "the red flag of party infidelity."

I never have been unfaithful to the Democratic Party. I have stood by the Democratic Party, though there have been things in the platform that I seriously objected to and that I would not support.

An illustrious representative from near me, Henry G. Turner, declined the nomination in 1896 because they required him to subscribe in that platform to free silver. There are many of you here who know that he was an illustrious gentleman, distinguished, honest, and fearless. I have charged no Senator, nor do I expect to charge any Senator upon this floor, with being bribed, and I am not going to charge anyone with party infidelity and failure to keep platform pledges. I myself do not stand for free silver, yet I did not separate myself from the Democratic Party.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, it is a fortunate thing in the history of the United States Senate that, as a rule, debates here are carried on coolly and calmly and logically. It is a fortunate thing that this is an arena where men reason together, and do not simply shake their locks at one another.

Now, Mr. President, I make it a point to debate with Republicans. I do not publicly debate when I can help it with my party colleagues upon this side of the Chamber. I have been very glad to hear my colleague's speech this afternoon, because it has proven that possibly some of the things that he was reported to have said in the Washington Post in a public interview, all in quotation marks, were not true. My colleague said this evening that he "had uttered no word of bitterness" during this controversy, "had felt and feels none"; and he has intimated that if anybody did say he had uttered any word of bitterness the person saying it had uttered "a falsehood so diaphanous that it was not quite respectable fiction." I believe that was the language used by him. He added that the newspapers had attributed bitter expression to him, from which I infer he meant that they were "fictionists"—that, I take it, is another way of saying slanderers or liars.

I do not know whether my colleague always knows whether he is uttering words of bitterness or not. I have sometimes doubted if he was a measurer of his own language or if he knew precisely what his own utterances meant in English. As he illustrated just a moment ago, he is a very excitable man, with great intemperance of thought and of expression.

I am inclined to think that the Washington Post, in these quoted interviews which I hold in my hand—interviews in quotation marks—has uttered "untruths so diaphanous that they are not worthy to be considered as ordinary, decent fiction." Certainly it, or its reporter has, if my colleague has "uttered no word of bitterness."

Mr. VARDAMAN. What is the Senator reading from?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am going to read now from what purports to be your interview in quotation marks published in the Washington Post of Monday, March 30; and I want to ask my colleague as I go along whether this great sheet, which has represented here only one side of this controversy——

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the senior Senator from Mississippi yield to the junior Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do.

Mr. VARDAMAN. I decline to answer any question the senior Senator from Mississippi may propound to me.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The Senator declines beforehand? Very well, then, Mr. President. I am not astonished, but I will say this: I am not to be thrown off of my guard, nor off of my temper, by any amount of bad feeling shown by that utterance. Of course there must be a great deal of bad feeling in the heart of a man who declines to answer any questions before the questions are asked merely because they are being asked by a given individual, who has a right to ask them in seeking the truth.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair desires to state, before the discussion proceeds further, that the rules of the Senate will not permit any reflection on any Senator.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, if I know it, I have made none. The Chair will call my attention to it if I have made any——

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, if the Senator will yield for a moment, the junior Senator from Mississippi misunderstood me. I said——

Mr. WILLIAMS. Oh, well, I do not yield for that purpose.

Mr. WEST. Yes; but I want to state——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. WILLIAMS. I do not; not for that purpose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Georgia has not been yielded to by the Senator from Mississippi. The Senator from Mississippi will proceed.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, as I said a moment ago, I am delighted to know that this sheet, which has represented only one side of this controversy, which has reported the speeches of only one side of this controversy, which has been engaged as one of a chain of papers which has been doing that, which has given in full the speech of every man who was opposed to the repeal of this law, and which has said that the others on the Democratic side of the tolls question only "also spoke," has uttered falsehoods about my colleague so absolutely diaphanous that they are not even quite decent fiction, because my colleague has just said that he has indulged in no word of bitterness in this entire controversy, and if this interview, and a part of which was quoted the other day by the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. GOFF] in my colleague's presence with the view of ascertaining if he had uttered them, be true, then my colleague would have uttered many words of unprovoked bitterness. But as my colleague has said he has not uttered any word of bitterness, then these statements in this interview must be falsehoods; and I want to put upon record the falsehoods of this infamous interview, so that all men may know how it has slandered my colleague. I wanted to do this with the aid of my colleague's denial, but as he refuses to answer I can not have that great aid. The Washington Post quotes him as saying:

He deplored the position President Wilson has taken, and characterized Mr. Wilson's canal message to Congress as an affront to the intelligence and patriotism of every Member of Congress.

It is a bit bitter to say that a Democratic President's public address was so weak and so unpatriotic as to be an "affront to the intelligence and patriotism of Congress." This is an alleged quoted interview. I go on:

I have no more respect for the integrity of a man who will violate a pledge made in the performance of a public function than I have for a man who accepts a bribe to control his official conduct—

Declared the Mississippi Senator.

Now, remember that this is right after he is reported as having said that he deplored the position taken by the President and regarded it as an affront to the intelligence and patriotism of every Member of Congress. To whom was he referring if not to the President?

I agree with Mr. Bryan—

And by the way, Mr. President, I am a little glad that some of the extreme utterances of Mr. Bryan are coming home to roost. I know how political platforms are formed and shaped, and so does almost every man here. Upon the great, salient questions which have engaged the attention of the country and around which public sentiment has been crystallized they are carefully worked out. Every word almost is carefully chosen. The expressions are the result of the utmost deliberation. Then, when those are through with, a subcommittee of a subcommittee reports back to the main committee certain minor things of every description, and they are incorporated in the main document with very little attention, especially if represented or thought to be "vote getters." We all know that.

This paper says that my colleague said "that a man who would win office on a platform and then violate it after getting into office is an embezzler of power," quoting Mr. Bryan, "and guilty of a crime of as great moral turpitude as a soldier who would betray his country in time of war."

cratic platform. It can not be true that my colleague said that. Those would be bitter words, indeed, and bitterly dealt and received.

This is all in connection with the position of the President, which my colleague charges with being a violation of the Demo-

This alleged interview, under quotation marks, goes on:

"It is not that I love President Wilson less," said the Senator, "but that I love the people of the United States and my obligations more"—

And so forth.

Let me come to the next one. Here is the one:

"The President has made the issue squarely upon the right of the United States to control and manage its own property in the canal. The American people spent $400,000,000 to build that canal. It is constructed on property belonging to the United States Government. It is ours just as much as if it were cut through the territory across the continent from New York to San Francisco, and the American people are not going to be misled by pusillanimous assaults made by certain pliant, sycophantic followers of the President.

The italics are mine.

If his followers—Democratic Senators and Representatives—were guilty of "pusillanimity" and "sycophancy" in following the President, then he, of course, was guilty of "pusillanimity" and tyranny in having them follow him. But the interview, purporting to be in the words of my colleague, continues:

The American people are not going to be misled by pusillanimous assaults made by certain pliant, sycophantic followers of the President against Senators and Representatives who insist upon carrying out the party's platform pledges.

Then, there follows something that makes me certain that this sheet must have slandered and calumniated my colleague. It makes me certain that it did so, when it put these words of bitterness in his mouth, while he denies ever having uttered any word of bitterness, and thus, by his denial of ever having done so, gives the falsehood direct to this miserable interview.

Here follows the part of it that I say corroborates my colleague's general denial, though he fails to make a specific denial, either when interrogated by Senator GOFF the other day or by me now, because in the next part of the interview he "deplores any personalities."

Now, of course no man would have gone on and spoken about his colleagues in the Senate as "sycophantic followers," of cowardly or pusillanimous conduct, and "deplored personalities" right afterwards, because that would have indicated a desire to indulge in personalities himself but not stand them from anybody else, to have insulted others and then begged for mercy. That never could have happened and I know did not happen; it must not have happened.

Then I read again—all this is an alleged quoted interview:

The proposition to yield to the dictates of an European power in this matter is pitifully humiliating.

To say that a Democratic President or a Republican President or any President of the United States is "yielding to the dictation of an European power" is to accuse him of lack of patriotism and lack of courage both at the same time.

My colleague says he is indulging in no bitter utterances, and I know he is not if he says so, and therefore this last purported quotation from him must have been untrue:

I want to say in this connection—

So this alleged quotation from my colleague goes on—that it is no justification for perfidious and sycophantic betrayal of them—the people—to say that the President of the United States advises it.

"A perfidious and sycophantic betrayal" advised by the President of the United States. This surely can not be true, because if my colleague had stated that he would have accused nearly all the Democratic Senators upon this floor and nearly all the Democratic Representatives in the House, besides some highly respected Republicans in both Houses, of "sycophantic and perfidious betrayal," and would have accused the President of inviting it—"advising" it—instigating it. Betrayal is the lowest of vices.

Now, I want to get back to the point at issue. My colleague said this evening in his speech that "the edict has gone forth." He began that way. Mr. President, we are not obeying any "edict" of any man who ever wore breeches. We are as self-respecting American citizens as my colleague or any others in this country. It is a very common thing for men in a common party to go together, and in going together to concede differences in order that the team may pull the wagon together. Every man of common sense knows that there must be team work or else there can not be any good done for Government, and hence to accuse every man who concedes a preferential opinion of his own in order to secure a great party purpose of "obeying an edict" is not measuring one's language. Being persuaded by reason and influenced by loyalty is not "obeying an edict." Only slaves "obey edicts."

His speech this evening speaks of "servile surrender." Servile" means slavish—conduct befitting a slave. In a speech the other day he solemnly warned the President of the United States against "flatterers," and quoted the old prayer of Epictetus, I believe it was:

Guard me against flatterers and make me open my heart to those who would criticize me.

That is the sense of it, even if I have it not literally.

I am glad my colleague made this speech. I was glad when I heard him say to-day of the President that he was "a man whose patriotism he had never questioned." I knew when he said he was a man whose patriotism he never questioned he had not said what the Washington Post said he said, to wit, that he had advised a servile and pusillanimous and abject surrender at the dictation of a foreign power.

Now, Mr. President, about whether this is a subsidy or not, upon that question—

Let the galled jade wince; my withers are unwrung.

It is wonderful how they all do wince when the word "subsidy" is heard. Why? Because this exemption is a subsidy, it was a subsidy, and it always will be a subsidy, because it granted a special privilege to a special class; and even if you quarrel about the right to use the technical word "subsidy" in connection with it, it still violated the very fundamental keynote of the original Jeffersonian Democracy as announced in that political sermon on the mount, Jefferson's first inaugural address to the people of the United States, which declares against "special privilege to special classes." Every Senator here knows that when you exempt one class of vessels passing through the Panama Canal from the payment of tolls and you subject all other vessels to it, then you have "by legislation granted a special privilege to a special class," and that is an indirect, if not direct, subsidy.

Gentlemen have said, "What is the difference between that and letting the ships go through the Sault Ste. Marie Canal and go through the Lakes or the Ohio River or elsewhere?" The difference is too plain for a Democrat to need to discuss it. In the latter case all commerce was exempt from tolls, none of it subjected to it. Every ship and boat could go through and no tonnage was taxed. There was no special privilege t a special class; there was exemption for all. If to-morrow we would pass a law here relieving from tolls all ships passing through the Panama Canal there would be no subsidy there, because it would be equal treatment for all and special privileges to none.

Now, Mr. President, it has been a habit of mine all my life to do my debating with the other side. The time always comes when words that are uttered in bitterness will leave stings behind them that are not easily cured. Therefore I have uttered no words of bitterness this evening. I am glad to learn that the statements made by this sheet purporting to be a quoted interview with my colleague are untrue, or else that my colleague has since moderated his views. With either I am equally delighted.

Now, I want to say this much more: My colleague could not have said these things because every Representative in Congress from his own State of Mississippi except one voted with the Senator from New Jersey, then a Member of the House, against this exemption of shipping from tolls. They voted and argued against it because they regarded it as a subsidy. Therefore, my colleague could not have denounced the men who thought this was a subsidy as merely "raising a false issue," resorting to a "pretext," "an afterthought." Yet that is what I thought I heard him say this evening. He knew, as he knows now and as I know, that they are honest men of honest purposes.

I believe there was one exception, one Representative from Mississippi, one of the most honest and loyal and true Democrats, who voted the other way—my colleague's way. He was not actuated by any bad motive when he did it, and not one of the other seven was actuated by any bad motive when they voted my way and the President's way. I submit that none of them would carry a lie upon his lips or that he would go and denounce a thing as being, in his opinion, a subsidy when he did not think it was. A man may denounce a thing as a subsidy when it is not, but an honest man will not denounce a thing as a subsidy when he does not believe it is.

My sole desire is to see all Democrats, and especially all Mississippi Democrats, working in harmony with one another without words of bitterness of any description. I have been guilty of none; and I am glad to learn from his general denial that my colleague has been guilty of none.

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I will not detain the Senate very long.

I wish to say to the junior Senator from Georgia [Mr. WEST] that when I asked the question of him I did it understanding that he had made the statement that $100,000 had been used to influence legislation in the interest of the Shipping Trust in the way he now explains it. I thought his remark a reflection upon me, and in a spirit of resentment I asked him if anybody had approached him. Since he did not say that or intend to say it, as a matter of course I have no desire to let it go into the RECORD as a reflection upon the integrity of a Senator or a man. I would not offend the Senator or wound his feelings.

So far as what has been said by the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS], of course it is very well understood by the Senate, and the people of Mississippi particularly—and a great many of the people out of Mississippi—that it would be rather difficult for me to say or do anything that would meet his approval.

I want to say that I care absolutely nothing about his opinion of what I have said or may say, whether it pleases him or displeases him is a matter of supreme indifference to me. That is not what I am here for. My conduct is to be controlled by myself, without consultation with him and without any regard whatever of his opinion. I think I would prefer his disapproval. I should be more certain of the rectitude of my conduct.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I intended before I sat down to dwell for a moment upon the speech made by President Wilson, as quoted by a Senator. I want to read it with a view of bearing out just what the Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] said, that the President was talking mainly, if not altogether, about that phase of the canal which deals with the proposition which referred to the refusal to let the railroad-owned ships pass through the canal. Here is his language:

One of the great objects in cutting that great ditch across the Isthmus of Panama is to allow farmers who are near the Atlantic to ship to the Pacific by way of the Atlantic ports; to allow all the farmers on what I may, standing here, call this part of the continent, to find an outlet at ports of the Gulf or the ports of the Atlantic seaboard.

Now, mark it—and then have coastwise steamers carry their products down around through the canal and up the Pacific coast or down the coast or down the coast of South America.

Now, there are no ships to do that—

At present there are no ships to do that. The later context will show you why. Because the overwhelming majority of the ships are owned by the railroads.

Now, at present there are no ships to do that, and one of the bills pending—passed, I believe, yesterday by the Senate, as it had passed the House—provides for free tolls for American ships through that canal and prohibits any ship from passing through which is owned by any American railroad company.

He is not even referring to the platform; he is referring to the bill. Then he goes on:

You see the object of that, don't you? We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves—

You see the object of that, do you not?

We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent.

Mr. SMOOT. May I ask the Senator to read just after what he has quoted.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I am sorry to say that his speech upon that subject is not further quoted.

Mr. SMOOT. Will the Senator allow me to read what he said following the very line that was last read by the Senator?

Mr. WILLIAMS. Have you the next sentence?

Mr. SMOOT. I have.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Does that begin "Our platform is not molasses to catch flies"?

Mr. SMOOT. No; that is not the next sentence.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I have not that part of it.

Mr. SMOOT. I have it here.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; read it.

Mr. SMOOT. I will let the Senator read it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Very well; hand it to me.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN. I should like to know what page it is on.

Mr. WILLIAMS. The last is as follows:

You see the object of that, don't you? [Applause.] We don't want the railroads to compete with themselves, because we understand that kind of competition. We want water carriage to compete with land carriage, so as to be perfectly sure that you are going to get better rates around the canal than you would across the continent. Everything that is done in the interest of free transportation is done directly for the farmer as well as for other men. So that you ought not to grudge the millions poured out for the deepening and opening of old and new waterways.

Mr. SMOOT. That is it.

Mr. WILLIAMS. I did not have that before me, nor have I any other report of the speech, but the whole thing taken as a whole, even with that last language, shows that the chief thing that was dwelling in the President's mind and the chief thing he was trying to impress upon that audience was that he did not intend to have railroads competing with railroads by the pretext or under the guise of owning the coastwise ships. What he meant by free water transportation was "free to compete," "free from the monopolistic ownership of railroads," thus giving no "free" competition.

Mr. WEST. Mr. President, I shall detain the Senate but a few moments. I just want to explain to the Senate my intention in this matter. I intentionally reflect on no man. If I insult a man, I go to him with it; and when I declare here "Who knows but what there might have been a hundred thousand dollars spent in this matter in the cause of the shipping interests?" that did not charge any Senator with it. They might have spent it in correspondence, in telegrams, in a way. He had just as much right to suppose that $30,000 that was spent by the other side in sending out speeches was spent in influencing Senators on this floor or for the purpose of corrupting Senators. I did not say, either, that there was $100,000 spent. I said, "Who knows?" Now, nobody can say since I have been in this Chamber among these distinguished Members that I have offered the least insult to any Member, and I do not intend to.

Mr. PITTMAN. Mr. President, I do not intend to delay the Senate by any extended remarks upon the bill. This matter has not only been exhaustively discussed in a nonpartisan spirit, for it has not assumed a partisan complexion, but its importance has, I think, been greatly exaggerated. It certainly is now limited to a very small economic question by the amendment, which reserves every question of right under the treaty. I rise for the purpose of explaining my reason for not urging the adoption of an amendment which I have heretofore submitted which authorized the President of the United States to reduce tolls on coastwise vessels or to totally exempt such vessels from the payment of tolls, if such action, in his opinion, became necessary to prevent a discrimination against such coastwise trade.

Subsequent to the introduction of that amendment by me, the authors of the Simmons amendment accepted certain amendments to that amendment offered by other Senators and myself, which, in my opinion, excludes and reserves, in the passage of the bill, the question of the right of the United States to exempt the vessels of its citizens from the payment of tolls for the passage of its vessels through the Panama Canal.

I realize that the adoption of the amendment offered by me would be an assertion of the right of the United States to pass its coastwise vessels through the canal free of tolls; and, while I believe that such right exists, there are so many varying opinions with regard to the right of the United States under and by virtue of the treaty that it is apparent that the bill would not finally pass if encumbered with any such amendment.

There are those in this body, both of the Democratic and Republican Parties, who believe that we have the right to pass any of our vessels through the canal free of tolls; there are others who believe that we have the right to pass the vessels of our coastwise trade through the canal; there are others who believe that we have the right to pass the vessels of our citizens engaged in foreign commerce through the canal free of tolls; while there are others opposed to any exemption, on the ground that it is a subsidy.

The majority of the Senate, although they do not agree on any one of the propositions and could not pass any bill that bases the passage of the bill on any one of such grounds, can agree on the passage of the bill if they are not committed by their vote to any one of these particular reasons, but are permitted to vote for the bill on any ground that seems to them to justify its passage. For example, some of the Senators on both sides are in favor of the passage of the bill because they believe that the exemption is a violation of the treaty; others are in favor of the passage of the bill because they believe that the exemption is a subsidy and constitutes a special privilege for a special class; others are in favor of the passage of the bill because they are satisfied from the evidence given at the hearings that the railroads can not compete with the coastwise vessels passing through the canal, even with the payment of the full amount of the tolls, because the testimony of experts before the committee having in charge the bill was unanimous in the conclusion that the consumer would not get the benefit of any exemption and that it would simply constitute a donation to those engaged in the coastwise trade, which at the present time is controlled very largely by a monopoly. I am convinced from the testimony that these statements are correct. This testimony disclosed that at the present time freight can be shipped from the Pacific coast to the Isthmus of Panama and transported across by railroad to the Gulf of Mexico at a rate of $4 per ton for crossing the Isthmus, and can then be transported to Atlantic coast points for $3.50 per ton cheaper than it can be transported by rail from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast. The testimony further disclosed that the rate of tolls, measured by weight, would amount to only about 60 cents per ton. If the coaswise trade at the present time, by paying a transportation of $4 across the Isthmus, can transport freight from the Pacific to the Atlantic coast for $3.50 less per ton than the railroads can, then there can be no question that they can compete when they would only have to pay 60 cents a ton across the Isthmus instead of $4. I do not believe that the coastwise vessels require any such favoritism, and I do not believe that if they were granted such favor the people who are taxed for the upkeep of the canal would receive any benefit therefrom.

I want to take this occasion to state that to-day by mistake I voted for an amendment offered by the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. I was not in the Chamber when the amendment was offered and arrived just in time to vote. I did not know that his amendment was intended to strike out the Simmons amendment, but I believed that it was to be added as another section and in assistance to the amendment that I intended to offer. I did not discover the mistake until it was too late to change my vote. While there would have been no difference in the result and the matter is of no importance, I simply desire to correct the record.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment offered by the junior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. VARDAMAN].

Mr. VARDAMAN. Mr. President, I am not going to call for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa will be stated.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 2 by striking out from and including the word "when," in line 13, page 1, to and including the word "ton," in line 2, page 2, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Until the further action of Congress the basis for the ascertainment of the tolls charged to foreign ships of commerce shall be their proportion of the estimated cost of the maintenance and operation of the canal, together with interest at the rate of 2 per cent annually upon the investment in the construction of the canal, taking into account the entire tonnage of the canal, not exceeding, however, $1.25 per net registered ton or the equivalent thereof.

Until the further action of Congress the basis for the ascertainment of the tolls charged to domestic ships of commerce shall be their proportion of one-half the estimated cost of the maintenance and operation of the canal, together with interest at the rate of 2 per cent annually upon one-half of the investment in the construction of the canal, taking into account the entire tonnage of the canal, not exceeding, however, 60 cents per net registered ton or the equivalent thereof: Provided, That vessels of every description owned and operated by the United States shall pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. The fourth sentence in said section 5 is hereby repealed.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, my chief purpose is to present my views upon the amendment I have just offered. I intend to do so with as much brevity as is consistent with a clear statement of what I propose, and the reasons for the conclusion to which I have come. I do not intend to consider the general construction of the treaty. Not long ago I reviewed the argument I made upon the construction of the treaty two years ago. Reflection has simply strengthened the conclusions which I then announced. The views I then entertained I entertain still. There is, however, one phase of this subject to which I shall invite the attention of the Senate for a very few minutes.

I recognize, Mr. President, the unwillingness of the Senate to listen to an argument at this stage of the matter. I do not censure Senators for reluctance in that respect. I feel the same reluctance when anyone else is speaking, and I am very charitable, therefore, with the attitude of those who are compelled to remain through unusual hours for the purpose of securing final disposition of this bill; but I intend through the heat of the night, and with some deliberation, to declare what is in my mind with regard to this subject.

I am one of those who entertain no doubt whatsoever that the United States has the right under its treaty with Great Britain to pass the ships of its citizens through the canal without charge, and that without respect to the character of the trade in which those ships may be engaged. In saying that I do not assert that the question is without doubt. The fact that eminent men throughout the country differ with regard to the proposition which I have just suggested would make it absurd for me to say that there is no doubt; but I repeat that I entertain no doubt at all with regard to our right to do this thing. At the same time, I have not been convinced that it is wise or defensible as an economic and domestic policy to allow our ships to pass through the canal free. If I could separate those questions and vote upon them under such conditions and circumstances as to permit my vote to voice my real conviction, I would be very glad to embrace that opportunity, but I have no such chance, and no one is more conscious of it than am I.

I believe that the vote that is about to be cast in this Senate is a vote that will be accepted by the country and by the world as a declaration that the United States has no right to discriminate in favor of its own ships.

While I do not say that there may not come a time when the United States will retake that which belongs to her by every principle of our sovereignty, belongs to her by the highest title that a nation can enjoy or hold any right she may be called upon to exercise, yet when the bill has passed, it will have been decreed by the United States as it is now represented in Congress and in the Executive office, that we can not so deal with our own, but must accept the British view with regard to the obligations of the treaty. I therefore find it impossible to vote for this bill.

There is but one thing that could be attached to this bill that would induce me to vote for it, and that is the assertion of our right to deal with our coastwise shipping, and I may add our foreign shipping as well, according to our judgment of the welfare and the interest of our people. I do not intend to deceive myself with regard to the effect of a vote cast for this bill. I know, and you all know, that when this bill passes, when every claim, and more than every claim that Great Britain has made against the United States has been conceded to her, until the people speak again, there will be no assertion of our right to deal with our own according to our judgment of the interest of our own.

I am not moved very much by the appeal to that just principle that denounces special privilege and declares against subsidy. "Subsidy" is a word that has come to be connected in the public mind with something wrong, with some Government help extended to some unworthy object, with some Government help extended where it is not necessary that it shall be extended.

I should like to consider for a moment what the word "subsidy" means in its broad sense. In that sense practically everything that the Government does is a subsidy—not everything, but practically everything. "Subsidy" means assistance given by organized society to one or more of its members; and in that sense the favor that we have shown to the coastwise shipping in the act of 1912 is a subsidy. Just so is the aid given to the agricultural interests of the country when we appropriate money for the suppression of the hog cholera, for the eradication of the boll weevil, and for the extermination of all the enemies to crops in the United States. All these appropriations are subsidies. They are, however, worthy subsidies. Why? Because in their expenditure not only is the particular interest toward which they go benefited, but the advantages are diffused and enjoyed by all the people of the country; and whenever the results of Government assistance are thus enjoyed by the people, the subsidy is not only defensible, but it is highly creditable.

I should like to know from some of my friends here who have so fiercely denounced subsidy whether they are opposed to all subsidies. If they are, then they must practically arrest the operations of the Government. The river and harbor bill, which I fear will shortly be passed by the votes of nearly all the Members of the Senate, is a subsidy from beginning to end, and there is a great deal in it, as I think, as it is now before the Senate, which is utterly without defense; but it is a subsidy, whether it is good or whether it is bad, for every penny that we expend in order to allow steamers to sail more securely over our rivers or ships to sail more readily into our harbors is a subsidy for those interests. If the money be wisely expended, the results will flow out in advantage to all the people of the country, and it is right. If the advantages are not thus enjoyed by all the people, or substantially all the people, then the expenditure is wrong.

Why, my fellow Senators, we never turn around in a governmental way but that we extend subsidy to some one. The Postmaster General—not the present one, I believe; I have not heard his report on the subject—but the Postmaster General has reported over and over again that the newspapers and the periodicals of the United States cost for their distribution by the Government three times as much as they are required to pay for that distribution. I remember that a former Postmaster General declared that the Government of the United States paid out 6 or 7 cents a pound for every pound of newspapers, magazines, and periodicals more than was received by the Government for their transportation or their distribution. That is as clear a subsidy as is the proposed use of the Panama Canal. I am not criticizing it; I believe in it, if the periodicals and newspaper publications are confined to legitimate productions. I believe in it. Why? Because it is for the common good. It is one of the aids of education. It is one of the instrumentalities for the training of our citizens. It is one of the mediums for the enlightenment of their minds, so that they can see more clearly their duty to their fellow men and their duty to organized society. In that way the aid that we thus extend, although a subsidy in the same sense as the free use of the Panama Canal, becomes one of the allies of good government, one of the effective plans for carrying on the affairs of a great country like ours.

Mr. BRISTOW. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Kansas?

Mr. CUMMINS. I do.

Mr. BRISTOW. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the weekly newspapers are carried for nothing within the county where they are published.

Mr. CUMMINS. I recognize that. They are, and they are very properly carried for nothing. I can not conceive any expenditure which the Government can make that is more helpful to the great objects of civilization than the free distribution of newspapers within the communities in which they are published.

I am only suggesting these things in order to put the word "subsidy" in the category in which it belongs.

Why, Mr. President, every school in the United States that is supported by taxation receives a subsidy. Every dollar that we ourselves appropriate for the maintenance of our agricultural schools is a subsidy. Why? Because we are aiding the men and women who have boys and girls to train and educate. We are lifting some of the burdens which otherwise will rest upon them. It is, however, so wise and so worthy an object that the Government that refused to expend its money for the maintenance of schools would earn the contempt of all civilized mankind.

Every penny that we expend on roads is a subsidy to those who travel on the highways. We expend it because roads are necessary to the public welfare, and we know that the advantage of the aid we thus give, the contribution we thus make to the development of the community, will be felt by all the people of that community in substantially equal proportions.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Mr. President, will the Senator permit an interruption?

Mr. CUMMINS. Certainly.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. Let me say, just here, that when you stop to think of it, only an infinitesimal number of the people own horses and vehicles, and yet the whole public are benefited by good roads, notwithstanding the man who owns a horse and vehicle gets the benefit of the good-roads system. No one would think of rebelling on that proposition, although there are an infinitesimal number of such men in comparison with the thousands who own no horses or vehicles.

Mr. CUMMINS. The Senator from New Jersey has very well illustrated my view of the matter. We ought not, we must not, be driven away from a sensible course by the mere use of the word "subsidy"; for I repeat that practically every effort that organized society makes to help its members is a subsidy.

The question is with all these subsidies, not "Is a subsidy abhorrent?" not "Is Government assistance indefensible, and unjust, and wrong?" but the question always is, or always ought to be: "Is the expenditure that results in the immediate profit of a single class one that will also result in the general advantage of the whole?" If it will, then the Government is not only not censurable for giving it, but it would be censurable if it failed to give it.

That brings me to the consideration of the Panama Canal.

I am not sure that to allow the vessels of the United States to pass through the Panama Canal without charge will result to the general good of the whole country. I am not sure of that. It is, with me, a leap into the dark. I believe with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. REED] that we may be opening Pandora's box. I have always doubted whether the Panama Canal would confer upon the people of the United States the distinct commercial advantages which its proponents and its advocates have always proclaimed for it. The future alone can tell.

I am not convinced that we ought to allow these ships to pass through the Panama Canal free, although I am convinced that under the treaty we have as perfect a right to do it as we have to allow a steamer to sail upon the Mississippi River, or to allow a vessel to enter the harbor of New York. Therefore, I have not felt satisfied with the exemption from tolls in the act of 1912; but I would vastly rather allow these ships to pass through free than to put one little obstacle in the way of the United States asserting our complete and comprehensive sovereignty there. I would rather allow them to pass through free, even though it may be an economic mistake, than to say to the world that we have no right to allow them to pass through free; for the conditions at this time may in a year, may in a decade, may in a quarter of a century, so change that it will become not only right, but essential to the life of the American people that these ships shall pass through as directed by the Government controlling the canal.

There is one thing of which I am sure, however; and that is, that to charge our ships tolls as great as we impose upon the ships of foreign nations is a flagrant injustice; it is a hideous wrong; it is indefensible in the court of reason; and I will tell you why.

I think I have said that I agree in a general way with the argument of the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] that commerce ought to bear its own burdens. I think if it does bear its own just burdens, the wealth produced by the industry of our people will be more equitably distributed than though we were to attempt artificially to rearrange the channels of distribution. Therefore I not only agree but insist that commerce ought to bear its fair, just share of the burdens which are naturally involved in carrying it on.

Now, let us see. We built the Panama Canal for two reasons. I shall not attempt to rank these reasons. I assume there will be difference of opinion with regard to their rank; but no one will dispute that there were two great causes for the construction of the Panama Canal. One of these causes is in our national defense. The other of these causes will be found in our commercial life.

We constructed the canal because we believed that in so doing we would strengthen the national defense. I have much sympathy with the statement made this morning by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] that we may have made a mistake with regard to that. It may be that it will not strengthen our national defense. Whether it does or not, however, we have built the canal in order that the passage of our fleet from one coast to the other might be speedier and less expensive. We built it because we believed that by so doing we could reduce our armament; that we could make one ship as effective as two would be without the canal; and when the Oregon steamed down one side of South America and up the other side of South America in order to take her place in the battle line of the Spanish War, the canal had been decreed. We built this canal, we have expended this money, in order to make the people of the country stronger than they were.

Is there a man here who will say that all the people of this country ought not to bear the expense, not only of construction, but of maintenance and operation, that is justly attributable to the national defense? The man who would assert that the burden of the national defense should be placed upon the commerce that passes through the Panama Canal is as unjust and as unfair as the man who, believing that commerce should bear its fair burden, should insist that the ships of commerce should pass through free. The truth—and if we are sensible people we will recognize it—is that all the people of this country, through taxation, ought to bear the share of the cost of construction and maintenance and operation of this canal that in good sense and good faith can be fairly imputed to the national armament, and that commerce should bear only that proportion which is not assumed by the people generally for their own protection.

I should like to know how any man can defend himself before the people of this country when he declares here by his vote that he intends to put the same charge upon our coastwise ships that he puts upon the foreign ships engaged in foreign commerce. It is right that the other nations of the world should bear their proportion of the entire expense. It is not proposed that one penny that should be assumed by the United States or by its traffic shall be inflicted upon the commerce of other nations. It is right that they should bear, if commercially they can and do business through the canal, the interest upon our investment, their share of the maintenance, and their share of the operation, and the United States and its people should bear the remainder. But tell me how you will defend the proposition that when you come to distribute in the United States that share which we ought to bear you should impose upon the traffic from one port of this country to another a tax in order to maintain the national defense. If I am asked just how much of that construction, maintenance, and operation ought to be charged to national defense, my answer is, I do not know. There is no way in which to divide it with mathematical precision. The two great objects stand before you and they must be compared, but I ask you, whether you think it is unfair to say that one-half of the cost of the investment shall be borne by the people of this country as a part of the national strength. We expended it for that purpose. Why should not the people who decreed it, who believed it to be essential to our welfare, bear that expense precisely as they bear the expense of building and operating a battleship, or building a fort, or building any other fortification or armament intended to strengthen the American defense.

Yet, what are you about to put upon American shipping, you Senators who believe that we have a right to discriminate? I am not addressing anybody else. The others are wedded to their idols. The others insist upon giving to Great Britain vastly more than she claims. The others insist that we shall surrender our sovereignty and shall take the humiliating, shameful attitude before the world of having accomplished the mightiest achievement of the age and then insisting upon sharing its ownership, its control, its direction, its advantages with all the people of the world.

Those Senators who believe that the treaty imposes that humiliating obligation upon them will, of course, vote for that construction of the treaty. They could not in conscience do otherwise, and I am not appealing to them. I leave them to reckon not with their own consciences—they have already reconciled themselves, I assume, with their consciences—but I leave them to reckon with what I believe to be an outraged people.

I am speaking to the other class of Senators. I am speaking now to Senators who have expressed views like the senior Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I am speaking to Senators upon this side who have said that they believe we have entered into no obligation that forecloses us from the exercise of our sovereignty. I am speaking to Senators who believe that it is unwise from a domestic standpoint to allow our ships to pass through this canal free and are intending to vote for this bill solely because the act of 1912 expresses an unsound domestic policy.

I agree for the moment with you. I agree with you, in fact, that it would be better not to do it. But entirely apart from the consequences of your votes and the construction which will be put upon them by the whole world, tell me this: How will you defend yourselves for imposing upon commerce a burden that belongs to the whole country, that belongs to it because we have constructed this canal? We will maintain the canal, we will operate the canal, in part in order to make our national defense more secure. Every penny that you extort from commerce in order to pay for the national defense is a penny wrongfully exacted from traffic, a penny that will make it still more difficult for the water commerce to compete with the land commerce of the United States.

My amendment, Mr. President, proposes a readjustment of the act of 1912. It proposes to establish, like the famous article 3 of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty did, or as it was claimed it did, a general principle.

The general principle is that foreign nations shall pay on the basis of 2 per cent upon the cost of construction and upon the cost of maintenance and operation as their share, each ship its share, without discrimination, without partiality, without favor, but that as to our own country the people will assume to care for one-half of the investment, one-half the maintenance, one-half the operation, because they determined that the canal should be built in order to glorify the Nation's name, in order to make the Nation's integrity more secure, in order to strengthen the national defense.

If my amendment were adopted, it would introduce a just and equitable plan. It would not be subject to the criticism that it constituted a subsidy. It is not a subsidy to relieve our shipping from a portion of the expense of the maintenance and the operation of this canal. It is a contradiction in terms. It is a misconception of the whole subject to declare that an exemption of that kind constitutes a subsidy, for the Nation built the canal, it maintains the canal, operates the canal, or will do so, for the benefit of all the people, and they ought to bear that share of the expense, and they will bear it cheerfully, gladly, because they will know that they are bearing it in accordance with the laws of justice and of honor.

Moreover, the amendment which I have proposed will do one thing which I am very anxious to do, and that is to assert in the most emphatic way in which we can assert it that the United States has the right to make this discrimination, and if in years to come we find that we have not apportioned the expense accurately or fairly we will be in a position to rectify any mistake that we may make at the present time. When we are guided by the lamp of experience years hence, we will know then better than we know now how the expenditure ought to be apportioned.

But if we vote for this bill without some assertion of our right to do the thing which I believe a majority of the Senators in this Chamber are of the opinion we can justly do, I believe we have sealed our mouths practically for years and years to come. There will never be a suggestion of the assertion of this right until the people of this country, upon the issue being raised, command that we assert the right.

I approach the vote with more concern than I have ever felt in the passage of any measure before Congress. I have never before taken part in the passage of any bill that seemed to close the door of the future as this bill closes it. I have never participated in the consideration of any measure that seemed to shackle the hands of the men and the women of future generations as this bill shackles them. I shrink from the consequences of the thing we are about to do. As I pointed out the other day, what you are about to do is the equivalent of saying that the United States shall never pass a commercial ship through the canal. If when it is finished the United States desires to take the eight ships which now ply between New York and Colon and extend their journey to San Francisco or Portland, Oreg., you are about to give to Great Britain the weapon that can prevent that journey. You are about to say to Great Britain that never will the United States itself engage in commercial traffic through the Panama Canal.

Why? It is impossible for the ships of the United States, owned by the United States, operated by the United States, to pay anything for passing through the Panama Canal. It is unthinkable that the United States can pay itself. Whenever the United States attempts that venture—and I, for one, would like to see it attempted—if my influence could accomplish it, I would enact a statute that would require these ships, at least, the moment the canal is opened, to begin carrying the traffic of commerce of the people of the United States from our eastern coast to our western coast. I believe that that will be the sentiment of the people of this country ere long.

I have no doubt that the ownership and the operation of ocean-going steamers by the United States will be necessary to regulate properly the greed and the avarice of private ownership; yet the Senate dares to say that the United States shall never do that thing. Why, I repeat? Because the United States can not demand pay for its own ships. It can neither demand pay nor can the ships make the payment. The only result of the construction that we have no right to allow any ship to pass through this canal doing business between our two coasts without paying the same tolls paid by a foreign ship is that the United States must forego that further part of its sovereignty and forever retire from this efficient and helpful service to the people of the country.

In the face of this imminent necessity, and without being able to conceive what the future may hold for us, without being able to foretell just how and when the United States may require this right which is now to be denied, I marvel that you can do it. I would not marvel if you did it because you believe that these ships should pay a fair toll. But that is not what you are doing. You are not saying they shall pay a fair toll. You may say that with your lips, but that is not what your vote will mean.

There is a resolution for arbitration here suggested by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I have great regard for him; I know he is entirely sincere; but when he brings forward that resolution for arbitration it will be but a mockery and a farce. How are you going to pass a resolution for arbitration unless you are willing to assert that we have some claim that is denied by Great Britain? You can not pass that resolution without so asserting. You are just now declining to assert it. You are declining to assert it because the President of the United States has asked you to repeal the law, because he believes it to be in plain contravention of our treaty obligations. It may be that we will have force enough, virility enough, in the future to retake what we now surrender. We will take it again, as has been said more than once, but we will retake it with infinite difficulty; we will retake it under circumstances that might well frighten a peace-loving American citizen.

I know that we will retake it; but lift, if you will, for a moment the veil of the future and endeavor to conceive the circumstances that will confront its recapture. As it is now it is asserted by Great Britain as one of its rights. But Great Britain is not tenacious with respect to it. Great Britain is willing to submit it, so representatives of that great nation declare, to a board of arbitration. But when we take the step that we are about to take; when Great Britain holds this privilege not only by her own assertion but by our assent, by our declaration; when we come to take it again there is but one way that we can take it, and that is obvious to every Senator here. Great Britain would yield now. Especially would she yield to the conclusions of a board of arbitration. But when we vest her by the action of the American Congress and the declaration of the American President with the title to these privileges, then when we recapture them, when we restore to our own country these essential, vital rights, I fear that we will be compelled to take them at the point of the sword. It is that contingency that makes one shudder as he looks into the future.

But one word more. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], in his very eloquent speech, said that he had no doubt whatsoever that we were precluded from exempting either our coastwise ships or our ocean-going ships, and that he had no doubt, either—that was just as clear to him as the former proposition—that at the very moment the money was paid by these ships to an officer of the Government, so that the title of the money had vested in the Government, that moment it could be returned to the ship paying it, and the ship could go on its way neither worse off nor better off than when it entered the canal. I do not agree with that, of course. To me that reduced the whole controversy to a miserable farce. To assert that the way of dishonor lies in exemption and that the way of honor lies in refunding—I can not understand the nicety of that reasoning. But I call your attention to one thing: If that be so, if we have a right to refund these tolls to our own ships, we have a right to refund them to the ships of any foreign nation. Our right to do as we please with this money, as the Senator from New York declares, is absolute and complete. No foreigner can question our disposition of our money when once it comes into the hands of an officer of the Government.

I should like to ask the Senator from New York, if he were here, I should like to ask any other Senator who takes that view of the matter, whether he believes that we can collect tolls from the ships of France at Colon and pay the tolls back to those ships as they leave the harbor of Balboa? Is that the equality of treatment which we vaunt so much and which we must preserve or be dishonored in the eyes of the whole world? These disciples of the Carnegie Peace Foundation, these men whose horizon seems to lie short of the great American interest, insist that we can take the money, that we must take the money, but we can do with the money whatsoever we desire. I should like to ask any one of them if he will answer me whether he thinks, believing that theory, that we could discriminate in favor of France in that way or in favor of Germany in that way, and what is there in the doctrine that would prevent our refunding such tolls to the ships of a foreign nation that will not prevent our refunding them to the ships of our own Nation? I am speaking now, of course, with regard to the construction of the treaty.

Mr. President, I submit the amendment which I have proposed; I submit it, believing that it expresses the real justice of this perplexing situation; I submit it, however, without the least hope that it will find favor in the Senate. All these matters have been already decided, and decided somewhere else than upon the Senate floor. I submit it not with the view of preventing what I believe to be the fatal mistake we are about to make, but I submit it to the people of my country, I submit it to the people of my State, firmly convinced that we have the moral and the legal right to do what the amendment proposes, firmly believing that it will fulfill not only the most sensitive standard of honor, but the highest interests and welfare of all the people.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I raise the point of no quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] and also of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE].

The VICE PRESIDENT. Eighty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. A quorum is present. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Iowa [Mr. CUMMINS] to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I ask that the amendment to the amendment be stated.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment to the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to amend section 2 by striking out from and including the word "when," in line 3, page 2, to and including the word "ton," in line 5, page 2, and by inserting in lieu thereof the following:

Until the further action of Congress the basis for the ascertainment of the tolls charged to foreign ships of commerce shall be their proportion of the estimated cost of the maintenance and operation of the canal, together with interest at the rate of 2 per cent annually upon the investment in the construction of the canal, taking into account the entire tonnage of the canal, not exceeding, however, $1.25 per net registered to or the equivalent thereof.

Until the further action of Congress the basis for the ascertainment of the tolls charged to domestic ships of commerce shall be their proportion of one-half the estimated cost of the maintenance and operation of the canal, together with interest at the rate of 2 per cent annually upon one-half of the investment in the construction of the canal, taking into account the entire tonnage of the canal, not exceeding, however, 60 cents per net registered ton or the equivalent thereof: Provided, That vessels of every description owned and operated by the United States shall pass through the canal without the payment of tolls. The fourth sentence in said section 5 is hereby repealed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. CUMMINS. Mr. President, I do not intend to insist upon a roll call. I know what the outcome would be. It has been, I think, fairly shown what we believe about this matter, and I have no disposition to delay the final result by insisting upon a roll call, but I should like a vote upon it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment.

Mr. BORAH. Mr. President, I have an amendment pending to this measure, but it is not my purpose to urge it. I only want to say a word as to the reason why I do not do so. It is manifest by the votes which have been had that I could not hope to succeed in having it adopted. On the other hand, the nature of the amendment would not permit its being submitted to the Senate, it seems to me, without a presentation of the reasons for it, as the amendment is in the nature of a postponement of the time when we should have a final vote upon this measure. In view, Mr. President, of the undoubted outcome, because of the lateness of the hour, and as it is my desire not to submit it without accompanying it with an argument, I withdraw the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to further amendment. If there be no further amendment——

Mr. REED. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will state the amendment.

The SECRETARY. It is proposed to strike out all after the enacting clause and to insert:

That an act entitled "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation and government of the canal," approved August 24, 1912, and commonly known as "the Panama Canal act," be amended by striking out of section 5 the following words: "No tolls shall be levied upon vessels engaged in the coastwise trade of the United States," and by adding to said act a new section, to be known as section 15, in words and figures as follows:

"SEC. 15. Vessels other than vessels of the United States may enter the ports of the United States and engage in the coastwise trade of the United States to the same extent and under the restrictions imposed upon vessels of the United States. The President is hereby authorized to prescribe and from time to time to change the tolls that shall be charged by the Government of the United States for the use of the Panama Canal by vessels engaged in the coastwise trade. Such charges shall as nearly as possible equal the expense incurred by the Government in transporting said vessels through the canal without taking into account as a part of said charges the interest upon the investment of the United States in said canal."

SEC. 2. That section 4347 of the Revised Statutes of the United States and all other acts or parts of acts in so far as they are in conflict herewith are hereby repealed.

Mr. REED. Mr. President, if the Senate will indulge me I think I will conclude what I want to say in five minutes of time. I discussed this proposition at length two days ago, but some are present now who were then absent.

It has been charged on the floor by nearly every Senator who has spoken that the coastwise trade of the United States is in the control of a monopoly; that nearly all of the vessels capable of transporting goods through the canal are controlled by the railroads. If that is true, and in the main I believe it to be true, then the result of the hundred years of fostering care by our Government of the coastwise business has resulted in the creation of a monopoly that is largely controlled by the transcontinental railway lines. If we are to have cheap rates between the East and West, we must gain them through an actual, good-faith competition between boats, and an actual, good-faith competition between the boats and the transcontinental railroads.

I want to see railroad rates and boat rates reduced to the lowest possible point, by which, of course, I mean not below a living basis. If, after fostering the coastwise business for a hundred years, we are confronted by a monopoly, the way to destroy that monopoly most effectively is to put it into actual competition with the vessels of the world. I am not going to argue that. I state it as a proposition.

I state another proposition.

It has been well said here that if the Canadian coast towns and the Canadian railways reaching the coast have the benefit of the cheap rates which result from a world competition among the boats of the world, then those towns will have a tremendous advantage over the cities of the United States, because our cities will be compelled to transport their goods by the small number of American coastwise vessels, and those vessels, as is well known, charge rates greatly in excess of the rates charged where there is a world-wide competition. So, in order that we may place the cities of the eastern portion of this country and the western portion of this country, and also, in a less direct way, all of the vast interior of this country, upon an equal footing with the Canadian cities, if we are to place our farmers upon an equal footing with the Canadian farmers, I insist that we must open our ports to all vessels of all nations. That will destroy the shipping monopoly; that will give us lower rates; that will enable the farmers of the United States to ship to Europe as cheaply as the Canadian farmers; that will produce an actual competition with the railroads; and that will settle the question of any possible controversy between this and any other country over the terms of the canal treaty, because the vessels of all nations will then be treated alike.

Mr. President, in the march of events it has come to this, that the leading nations of the world are changing their policies with reference to coastwise business. England has opened her ports to the vessels of the world. Other nations, if they have not entirely opened their ports upon terms of equality, are giving more liberal terms than in the past. I should like to see this canal so used that the greatest possible benefit would result to our country. Hence, I would open our coastwise trade to the vessels of the world.

It is for these considerations that I have offered this amendment.

In view of the "line-up" on this bill and the rejection of all amendments except the one programmed to pass, and also in view of the statement of many Senators that they agree with the proposition in my amendment but do not want to vote for it at this particular time, I can hardly hope for its passage. Nevertheless, I offer it, and if it is defeated, shall press it in the future.

Let me say again that if the coastwise trade is controlled by a monopoly, then admission of the vessels of all nations to the coastwise trade will break that monopoly. A reduction of rates by water will result, and in turn a reduction in railroad rates will be forced.

If the coastwise trade is not in the control of a monopoly, as some assert, then a more active competition will result, and all parts of the United States will be benefited by a reduction of rates. So that in either case we will gain from free competition between carriers. The amendment I propose strikes at the ship monopoly, whether it be complete or partial. It strikes directly at railway-controlled boats. It breaks the hold of the transcontinental railways which they now have through boat-line ownership. At the same time, we escape from the enactment of this bill which I gravely fear will impair the rights of the United States to control the canal.

The question of tolls is one of minor importance. If that question were presented purely as an economic proposition, I should not be greatly concerned. But, as I stated in my remarks a few days since, I fear we can not pass this bill under the present circumstances without weakening our claim of the right to control the canal. It has been said that we should not permit the boats of a monopoly to use the canal free; that to do so is to feed the monopoly. The answer is that the canal bill specifically bars such vessels from the use of the canal. The result therefore must be the dissolution of the monopoly, because being refused the use of the canal the monopoly can not compete with the boats outside of the monopoly; especially will this be true if we open our coastwise trade to the boats of the world. Under such circumstances the monopoly could not exist for a day.

Men for whose opinions I entertain the greatest respect firmly believe that the Simmons amendment does preserve our rights unimpaired. Nevertheless I fear they are mistaken. I have therefore voted for amendments specifically asserting our complete sovereignty over the canal and our right to fix tolls on our own vessels as we may see fit. Had such an amendment been adopted I would have waived any other objections and voted for the bill. I hoped and, until the developments of to-day, believed that an amendment would be accepted embodying the principle I have just referred to. But the amendments have been defeated, and I am now forced, if the amendment I now offer is defeated, to choose between voting for the bill with the Simmons amendment or voting against it. Because I fear the Simmons amendment does not with the necessary certainty assert our rights I shall choose the latter course. I believe it to be the safer thing for the country. In this opinion I may be mistaken. I hope that time will prove that my fears are groundless.

I know that the President and the majority of my party associates who are supporting the bill believe that the Simmons amendment is ample. On the other hand, many able men in the party take a contrary view. I shall resolve the doubt in favor of what I regard as the safe side. I am sorry that all Democrats can not vote as a unit. But it must be remembered that the Democratic platform specifically declared for free tolls. Those who in this instance vote against this bill need no other justification than the plain words of the platform adopted by the Democratic Party at Baltimore.

Mr. LA FOLLETTE. Mr. President, I offer an amendment to the proposed amendment.

I move to add, after the words "United States," in line 3, page 2, after the period, the matter which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment to the amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 2 of the printed amendment of the Senator from Missouri, in line 3, after the words "United States," the Senator from Wisconsin proposes to insert:

Provided, That foreign vessels engaging in such coastwise trade shall be subject to all the laws, regulations, and rules of the United States Government pertaining to vessels of the United States, in every respect as though such foreign vessels were vessels of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Wisconsin to the amendment of the Senator from Missouri.

Mr. REED. I accept the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question, then, is on the amendmend as modified.

Mr. REED. I should like to have a record vote on that question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Missouri call for the yeas and nays?

Mr. REED. I do.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and the Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHAMBERLAIN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I do not know how he would vote on this particular bill, and I therefore withhold my vote. If I were permitted to vote, I should vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. GALLINGER's name was called). I desire to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate. If he were here, he would vote "nay."

I also desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], and to say that if he were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). On this question I am paired with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] and withhold my vote.

Mr. ROOT (when Mr. LODGE's name was called). I announce the necessary absence of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. He is paired with the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the Senator from Massachusetts were present he would vote "nay."

Mr. O'GORMAN (when his name was called). I have a general pair with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. In his absence I withhold my vote.

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Reannouncing the transfer of my pair with the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE] to the junior Senator from Arkansas [Mr. ROBINSON], as on the last vote, I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. CHILTON. I transfer my pair, as announced on the previous vote, to the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN] and vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 12, nays 67, as follows:

So Mr. REED's amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is still in Committee of the Whole and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment the bill will be reported to the Senate.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. O'GORMAN. In the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. SIMMONS] there are what I conceive to be two inaccurate references to the two treaties referred to with respect to the dates. The Hay-Pauncefote treaty is referred to as having been ratified on the 21st of February, 1902. I believe it was ratified on the 16th of December, 1901. The date of the ratification of the treaty with the Republic of Panama is given in the amendment February 26, 1904, when it should be February 23, 1904.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator is mistaken. I phoned to the State Department to ascertain the date the ratifications were exchanged of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, and they advised me that they were exchanged on the 21st day of February, 1902. I have before me the Diplomatic History of the Panama Canal, which gives the following:

Signed at Washington November 18, 1901.
Ratified by the Senate December 16, 1901.
Ratified by the President December 26, 1901.
Ratified by Great Britain February 20, 1902.
Ratifications exchanged at Washington 21st of February, 1902.

Mr. O'GORMAN. The word "ratified" may be applicable to any one of the three or four dates. If it is intended to refer to the ratification of the two treaties by the Senate of the United State the first date ought to be December 16, 1901. When we speak in our laws of the ratification of a treaty, we have reference to the ratification by this body.

Mr. ROOT rose.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am advised by the State Department that the dates given were the dates of the exchange of ratifications. The Senator from New York [Mr. ROOT], however, is authority upon that subject, and he may suggest a change.

Mr. ROOT. The ratification is always the date of the formal exchange of the instruments of ratification. The Senate does not ratify a treaty; the Senate advises and consents to the ratification of the treaty. That is the language of the Constitution, and it is the invariable form of our action. We advise and consent to the ratification of a treaty, but the treaty may never be ratified, or it may not be ratified for a long period. The date of ratification is the date when the formal instruments of ratification are exchanged between the two countries.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I was advised by the department, and I put those dates in.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, in the Committee of the Whole I offered an amendment by the way of a substitute for the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Carolina. That amendment on motion of the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] was laid on the table. I think I am entitled to have a vote, at least I should like to have a vote upon the amendment itself. For that reason I offer the amendment now as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina. I shall not take any time to discuss it. I do not think it is necessary to read it. It is the same amendment, and I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. O'GORMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Utah, if I may have the attention of the Senate for just a moment, we ought to have no uncertainty with respect to the description of these two treaties in the amendment or bill which is about being enacted. In the Senate document which has been distributed entitled "Canal Treaties," on page 55, we find that Lord Pauncefote telegraphed to the Marquis of Lansdowne, under date of December 16, 1901, stating that the canal treaty was ratified on that day. If, as my colleague suggests, it is appropriate to refer to the date of the exchange, and that is the equivalent of ratification, we would be employing more precise language if we referred to the dates the ratifications of these two treaties were exchanged rather than to the dates when ratified.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask: What is the parliamentary status of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole? Has the amendment offered by myself, which was adopted in Committee of the Whole, been concurred in?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Not yet. The amendment of the Senator from Utah is proposed as a substitute.

Mr. SUTHERLAND'S amendment was to insert in lieu of the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole the following proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein shall be considered as denying or abridging the right of the United States to discriminate in favor of the ships of commerce of its citizens in respect of the conditions or charges of traffic which may be imposed for the use of the Panama Canal, but, on the contrary, such right is hereby reasserted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). Making the same announcement as on the former vote, I vote "nay."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). Announcing the absence from the Senate of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I wish to state that he is paired upon this question with the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If the Senator from New Hampshire were here, he would vote "yea."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote "nay."

Mr. ROOT (when Mr. LODGE'S name was called). If the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a general pair on this amendment with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I transfer that pair to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEVENSON] and vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). Repeating the previous announcement of the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I vote "nay."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. HOLLIS. I transfer my pair previously announced to the junior Senator from New Jersey [Mr. HUGHES] and vote "nay."

The result was announced—yeas 33, nays 50, as follows:

YEAS—33.

Ashurst	Cummins	O'Gorman	Sutherland
Borah	Dillingham	Page	Townsend

So Mr. SUTHERLAND'S amendment was rejected.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendment was concurred in.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate and open to amendment. If there be no further amendment, the question is, Shall the amendment be engrossed and the bill be read a third time?

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Shall the bill pass?

Mr. BORAH, Mr. LA FOLLETTE, and Mr. O'GORMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. CHILTON (when his name was called). I announce my pair with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL], which I transfer to the senior Senator from South Carolina [Mr. TILLMAN], and vote. I vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. GALLINGER'S name was called). Again announcing the absence of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER], I desire to state that he has a pair with the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE]. If the Senator from New Hampshire were present, he would vote "nay."

Mr. HOLLIS (when his name was called). I again announce my pair with the Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. ROOT (when Mr. LODGE'S name was called). The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] is paired with the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. If the Senator from Massachusetts were present, he would vote "yea."

Mr. McCUMBER (when his name was called). I have a pair with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. Not being able to find a transfer of that pair, I withhold my vote. If I were at liberty to vote, I would vote "yea."

Mr. SMOOT (when Mr. PENROSE'S name was called). I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the senior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE]. If he were here he would vote "nay." He has a general pair with the senior Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS].

Mr. MYERS (when Mr. WALSH'S name was called). My colleague [Mr. WALSH] is necessarily absent. It is my understanding that if he were here he would vote "nay."

Mr. WILLIAMS (when his name was called). With the same explanation made upon the previous roll call and the transfer of my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. PENROSE], I vote "yea."

The roll call was concluded.

Mr. McCUMBER. I transfer my pair with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER] to the junior Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. STEPHENSON] and vote "yea."

The result was announced—yeas 50, nays 35, as follows:

So the bill was passed.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina and Mr. MARTIN of Virginia addressed the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I addressed the Chair before the Senator from South Carolina. I do not feel it is proper treatment that the rule should be ignored and another Senator recognized.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from South Carolina is recognized.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. In open defiance of the rule of the Senate?

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 6060) to regulate the immigration of aliens to and the residence of aliens in the United States.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I desire to submit a motion which takes precedence over the motion submitted by the Senator from South Carolina. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15279, the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is, Will the Senate proceed to the consideration of a bill, the title of which will be read.

The SECRETARY. A bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SMITH of South Carolina. On that motion I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

Mr. KERN. I ask the Senator from Virginia if he will consent to have the bill laid aside temporarily that I may make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I consent that the bill may be temporarily laid aside for the motion which the Senator from Indiana desires to make.

Mr. KERN. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and (at 10 o'clock and 18 minutes p. m., Thursday, June 11, 1914) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 12, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 11, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

Rev. Earle Wilfley, pastor of the Vermont Avenue Christian Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

O Lord, our Lord, how excellent is Thy name in all the earth!

Before the mountains were brought forth, or ever Thou hadst formed the earth and the world, even from everlasting to everlasting, Thou art God.

We beseech Thee, heavenly Father, to hear us this morning as we pray for a better and a higher appreciation of Thy goodness. For what Thou art we praise Thee, and for what Thou wouldst have us become we pray Thee.

Bless our Nation. Bless those in authority. Bless those who to-day in these Halls shall make our laws. Lord, bless the deliberations of this hour. Bless word and deed and thought and purpose. And in it all may our country's good be the great motive and Thy honor the great incentive. Hear us we beg to-day, for Thy name's sake. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

LEAVE TO EXTEND REMARKS.

Mr. WEAVER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. WEAVER] asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of rural credits. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

SPEAKER PRO TEMPORE FOR TO-MORROW.

The SPEAKER. The Chair designates the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DIXON] to preside to-morrow. I am going to make a commencement address at the college of which I was president when I was a boy. [Applause.]

THE CALIFORNIA SHRINERS AND THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. What about.

Mr. KETTNER. About a newspaper article published in regard to the visit of the California Shriners to the city of Washington, wherein Mr. Tumulty is accused of turning down the Shriners and the assertion is made that I had phoned to Mr. Tumulty and requested that the President see them.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from California [Mr. KETTNER] is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, I will ask the Clerk to read this article.

The Clerk read as follows:

[Dispatch to the Chronicle.]

PRESIDENT WILSON REFUSES TO MEET THE SHRINERS—VISITING CALIFORNIANS SNUBBED BY THE CHIEF EXECUTIVE AND HIS SECRETARY, TUMULTY.

WASHINGTON, May 10.

Despite the great reception they received here yesterday, the California Shriners did not leave Washington altogether pleased with their visit to the Capital.

The Shriners were much displeased because they were not received by President Wilson at the White House, which they expected. Though strenuous efforts were made by local Potentate Gibbs and the California Congressmen to arrange, through Secretary Tumulty, for the distinguished visitors to meet Wilson and see the famous White House, their efforts were "turned down" by Tumulty.

Representative KETTNER, when it was found that the President would not meet the Shriners, tried hard to get Tumulty to have Wilson at least come out on the White House portico and bow to the marching Shriners, but even this request was refused by Tumulty. The President preferred golf to meeting the Californians, and while the visitors were here Wilson was on the Chevy Chase links.

The refusal of Tumulty to have the Shriners received at the White House was learned to-day, and caused many biting comments among the visitors, practically none of whom had ever met the President, and all of whom had looked forward to at least shaking Wilson's hand.

These criticisms were not confined to the visitors, but are also voiced by many Members of Congress who are Shriners, and who entertained the visiting Temples. The Californians marched by the White House in their magnificent parade, but a look through the gates of the Mansion was as near as they got to the President.

Mr. KETTNER. Mr. Speaker, the only foundation for that article is a conversation I had the day before the Shriners were to appear here with my colleague from California [Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND]. I inquired of him whether any arrangement had been made for the Shriners to meet the President. He informed me that, so far as he knew, nothing had been done in this connection. I then told him I would take it upon myself to see if some arrangement could be made. That afternoon I telephoned to Mr. Brahany, and in the conversation he informed me that a great many such requests for interviews on Saturday had been turned down, and that there was another parade in the city that day, but that if I insisted upon it he would take it up with the President and see what could be done. I told him to call it off, understanding that Saturday was the only day that the President had for rest. I have made diligent inquiry, and, so far as I can find out, the California Shriners had not written to any Member from California stating that they wanted to meet the President.

I have been a member of the Masonic bodies in California for 20 years and an active worker. I belonged to Islam Temple in San Francisco for 14 years, and am now a member of Al

Bahr, of San Diego, being personally acquainted with the officers, and would be the first to resent any discourtesy to them. I am making this explanation because I am sure the California Shriners would not wish any injustice done to the President or to Mr. Tumulty, and I wish to state positively that I did not speak to Mr. Tumulty; that Mr. Brahany offered to make arrangements if I insisted upon it, and I told him under the circumstances I could not insist upon it.

LEAVE TO ADDRESS THE HOUSE.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to speak for three minutes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to speak for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. About what?

Mr. DONOVAN. For the welfare of the minority leader.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, well, I object. We have important business to transact to-day.

AGRICULTURAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. LEVER. Mr. Speaker, in looking over the Agricultural appropriation bill I notice that as it was passed by the Senate certain items in a paragraph were increased, but the totals in the bill were not increased correspondingly. I suppose the totals would not be in conference, and therefore I ask unanimous consent that the conferees of the House may be permitted to change the totals in accordance with the facts.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from South Carolina asks unanimous consent that the conferees on the Agricultural appropriation bill be authorized to correct the totals. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, is it not possible to have any of these bills properly considered and amended in the distinguished body at the other end of this building? Yesterday morning we had a request of this kind as to the naval appropriation bill. Now, we have it on the Agricultural bill. The Agricultural bill is in conference, I believe, although the Senate has not insisted on its amendments, and the House has not disagreed to the Senate amendments. It does seem as though at some time we ought to get somebody able to conduct business in the usual and orderly manner.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I yield.

Mr. FOSTER. From an editorial in the Washington Post this morning it would appear that this body does not give proper consideration, but has to depend upon the other body to give these and other bills due consideration and sufficient time for debate. In view of the gentleman's statement this morning. I judge that they did not give this matter proper attention.

Mr. MADDEN. Was the editorial in reply to Secretary Bryan's protest about unlimited debate in the Senate?

Mr. FOSTER. What?

Mr. MADDEN. The editorial.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes; it may have been.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Yes; it bore upon that matter.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman from Connecticut rise?

Mr. DONOVAN. I rise to call these gentlemen to order. They are parliamentary sharks, and they know they can not get the floor except by way of the Speaker's chair. They ought to observe the rules of the House.

The SPEAKER. If that is a parliamentary inquiry, the Chair will answer that the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] made a request for unanimous consent. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] was interrogating him under the guise of the right to object.

Mr. MANN. I have a good deal of sympathy for the difficulties that lie in the pathway of the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. LEVER] and do not desire to interpose any further objection. So I will not object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from South Carolina?

There was no objection.

TREATIES WITH THE INDIANS (H. DOC. NO. 1030).

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a letter from the Secretary of the Interior relating to the various treaties with the Indian tribes.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to have printed as a public document a letter from the Secretary of the Interior relating to treaties with the Indians. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, what is this letter?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It is only 23 pages in length. It is a letter giving a list of the existing treaties between the various Indian tribes and the United States. We need them in making up the estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I thought there were two compilations of these various treaties.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. This gives the date when the treaties were made and when they expired. There are several expired treaties that are now being legislated for that should not be carried as treaty items. It is for that purpose we have had an examination of the office made, and this document shows what treaties have expired.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Are there not now two large volumes comprising the treaties with the Indians?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Yes; but there is nothing to show what treaties have expired.

Mr. MADDEN. And this letter the gentleman speaks of does show that?

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. It does.

Mr. MADDEN. Then I think it ought to be printed.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Texas?

There was no objection.

THE SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is now in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the consideration of the bill which the Clerk will read by title.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

PUBLIC HEALTH SERVICE.

For pay, allowance, and commutation of quarters for commissioned medical officers and pharmacists, $629,858; at least six of the assistant surgeons provided for hereunder shall be required to have had a special training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect for duty in connection with the examination of arriving aliens with special reference to the detection of mental defection;

For pay of acting assistant surgeons (noncommissioned medical officers), $200,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on the paragraph. I would like to ask the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, if there is any necessity of continuing in this law a provision that "at least six of the assistant surgeons provided for hereunder shall be required to have had special training in the diagnosis of insanity and mental defect," and so forth? Why is not that a matter that can be properly regulated by the Public Health Service?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was put in the current law in order to insure the obtaining of men who were specially qualified to detect mental defectives and prevent them from getting into the country. It was inserted with the approval of the Public Health Service so that it would necessitate the selection of men who had the special training which is necessary to enable them to more quickly and accurately detect mental defectives.

Mr. MANN. They have the authority, and what is the object of cumbering up the bill with this sort of a provision?

Mr. FITZGERALD. These assistant surgeons were for a special purpose, and this was to make certain that they would obtain men of that character. They have a large number of surgeons and assistant surgeons, but the complaint was that they had no one who had the special training that is required to detect these mental defectives among the immigrants.

Mr. MANN. I suppose in the first place it was inserted to give them authority to get six assistant surgeons who were what I believe they call psychiatrists.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We want to keep six men in the service with these qualifications. I think it is highly important; the State of New York is spending many million dollars per annum in support of alien insane.

Mr. MANN. They have the authority now; you might as well insert a provision that they should have some one capable of determining a whole lot of other diseases.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They asked for these assistant surgeons in order to obtain men who have these special qualifications, and the provision was inserted to insure getting them.

Mr. MANN. They have the men now?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not sure of that. They say they do not stay long.

Mr. MADDEN. Does the gentleman mean to insinuate that the authority heretofore conferred has been exercised in a way contrary to the authority, and that they have employed men of another class when they were authorized to employ this class?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this was carried the first time in the current law. The statement was made that they wanted men who by special training could very readily detect persons who are mental defectives. It seems that such persons develop peculiar facial characteristics, and men who are specially trained can segregate them almost at a glance. This board of assistant surgeons was increased so as to provide additional men to do this work, and it was thought advisable to insure the selection of men with these qualifications to provide that the additional number should have these qualifications.

Mr. GARNER. Are the salaries of these officials fixed by statute?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Is there any variation in the salaries?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They increase with the length of service.

Mr. GARNER. Does the same rule apply to the noncommissioned surgeons, for which you carry $200,000 in this paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The compensation varies. I am not certain that that compensation is fixed by statute.

Mr. MANN. The compensation of officers is fixed by statute.

Mr. GARNER. Does that include the noncommissioned assistant surgeons?

Mr. MANN. They are all commissioned, are they not?

Mr. GARNER. In the next section, or in this paragraph, it says "for pay of acting assistant surgeons (noncommissioned medical officers), $200,000." Can the Secretary fix their compensation at whatever sum he may think proper?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The highest pay of assistant surgeon is $2,400. That is given to a man under very peculiar conditions. He is stationed in the Hawaiian Islands; he is a specialist in plague and cholera work; and he is also an architect engineer and a very valuable man. Then the compensation runs down to $1,000.

Mr. GARNER. The compensation for regular medical officers?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The commissioned officers' pay is fixed by statute.

Mr. GARNER. What is the usual compensation?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can give that information to the gentleman. Assistant surgeons general, of which there are 4, get $6,000 a year, 2 at $4,800, 1 surgeon at $5,400, 1 at $4,500, 23 at $4,000, and it runs down to $2,000. In 1913 there were 139 commissioned officers. In addition, there are 45 pharmacists, with a compensation averaging from $700 a year to $2,600.

Relative to the inquiry of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], it is desired that these surgeons who are detailed for the examination of immigrants should be men who have special training to recognize mental defectives, and I think it is quite important that that should be the case. There was some doubt expressed this year as to whether they should select men with this special training or should attempt to train them themselves. Upon other occasions evidence was presented to the committee to demonstrate that unless the men did have this special training they were not effective in the particular work desired.

Mr. MANN. That is the case with all surgeons in reference to anything. If they do not have special training, they are no good.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Public Health Service does not have any place in which to give them special training in these mental diseases.

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit, I beg to say to my colleague that I think this might insure that they should give these men special training for this work. I think this is a very important item.

Mr. MANN. I do not see how we are better able to judge of that than the Public Health Service.

Mr. FOSTER. We can not, if they will do it, but this makes it incumbent on the service to do that.

Mr. MANN. It is just as important to have somebody trained in reference to contagious diseases; yet that is not required.

Mr. FOSTER. There is not anything in it, except this calls special attention to it.

Mr. MANN. Oh, I suppose they wanted this inserted in the first place in order to give them authority to employ certain people that they have. They have the people anyway.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; they did not ask to have that put in. This is put in by the committee. They stated they wanted additional men for this particular work, and the inquiry developed the purpose of the work. The lunacy commission of the State of New York presented figures that were very alarming as to the number of mental defectives who were passed by the immigration officials and who are now being cared for at the expense of the State of New York. The State of New York is spending several million dollars a year taking care of alien insane, and since additional employees were desired to detect these mental defectives the committee provided that the men selected should have the peculiar training to enable them to do so.

Mr. MANN. How did the committee arrive at the exact number of six out of the number of public-health surgeons on duty at the station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They had requested six additional for that work, and they were given the six. The provision was made that six should have these qualifications, and as long as the number of surgeons was increased by six, the committee believed that at least six should have these peculiar qualifications. Otherwise they will be coming back requesting additional men, because none of the ones they have has the qualifications, and none of the surgeons they have in the service has the peculiar qualifications necessary to detect these mental defectives.

Mr. MURDOCK. These men are at Ellis Island?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were at Ellis Island. They want additional men for Boston, Philadelphia, and some other places.

Mr. MOORE. Is it proposed to have these six men all stationed at Ellis Island?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not that I recall. These men are already in the service.

Mr. MOORE. These are not new positions?

Mr. GARNER. No.

Mr. MOORE. Immigration is constantly increasing at the port of Philadelphia——

Mr. MANN. Where is Philadelphia? [Laughter.]

Mr. MOORE. Philadelphia is the first American city, on the greatest American river, in the Keystone State of the Union.

Mr. BUTLER. Who represents Philadelphia?

Mr. MOORE. It is represented by one of the best delegations that ever appeared in Congress. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. It has one of the greatest Representatives, at least.

Mr. MOORE. I want to know if these men are to be stationed at Ellis Island exclusively, or are they to be apportioned at the other stations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is a matter of administration. I can not say. They are to be assigned wherever the Surgeon General assigns them. There is no limitation on his authority in that respect.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. STEPHENS of Texas. I desire to ask the gentleman one question in regard to the language contained in lines 9 and 10, on page 41.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have not yet reached that provision.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order on all that part of the paragraph which follows the figures in line 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois makes the point of order. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. AUSTIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Will the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge give an explanation of why the estimate of the Treasury Department for an increase in the salaried force of the Supervising Architect's Office was reduced $100,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We gave every dollar that was asked for the Supervising Architect's Office.

Mr. AUSTIN. Is the chairman certain of that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Absolutely.

Mr. AUSTIN. How about the operating expenses covering public buildings?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The committee gave them $100,000 less than was requested.

Mr. AUSTIN. My understanding with Treasury Department officials——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I know that one of the assistant secretaries of the Treasury has been telling Members of Congress that this committee was curtailing the appropriations for operating expenses and that they would be compelled to curtail the force instead of extending it. But neither the head of the department nor the assistant in charge of that particular work appeared before the committee. The committee gave $25,000 more than was given in the present year. For 1912 they had an unexpended balance of $226,000, and in 1913 they had an unexpended balance of $93,000. Based upon the experience which the members of the committee have acquired in the preparation of these bills, they believed that the $2,600,000 for operating expenses of public buildings was ample despite the assertion of those in charge to the contrary.

Mr. AUSTIN. In the report, on page 2, under the head of public buildings, operating force, the appropriation for 1914 was $2,575,000——

Mr. FITZGERALD. And for 1915 $2,600,000; that is what I stated.

Mr. AUSTIN. And the estimates for 1915 were $2,700,000. That is $100,000 short of the estimates.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said it was $100,000 less than they requested, but in view of the fact that they had $226,000 unexpended in 1912 and $93,000 unexpended balance in 1913, based upon the experience and the knowledge acquired by the members of this committee in the preparation of this bill, it was believed that $2,600,000 would be ample for the proper conduct of the service.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman believe that this will enable the architect's office to turn out any more plans and specifications——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not for that purpose at all. This is for the men in charge of the buildings that are in commission, the operating force of the buildings, maintenance of the plant, and so forth.

Mr. AUSTIN. For the present buildings and the new buildings to be opened.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I understand that. We think we have given ample. We may not have been so lavish as those in charge of the service would desire, but we have recommended sufficient to keep the buildings in that proper and economical manner which is expected under a Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For freight, transportation, and traveling expenses, including the expenses, except membership fees, of officers when officially detailed to attend meetings of associations for the promotion of public health, $30,000.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of directing an inquiry to the chairman of the committee.

Mr. FITZGERALD. What line?

Mr. MURDOCK. Line 14. I want to ask the gentleman this question: What is the meaning of the words "except membership fees"? What is the necessity for that?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It prohibits the payment out of this appropriation of the membership fees of officers of the Public Health Service in various medical and other associations.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, that there are all over the country associations of doctors and——

Mr. FITZGERALD. A few years ago it was ascertained that there were all sorts of associations—auditors' associations, accountants' associations, medical associations, librarian associations—of which officials of the Government were members, and from various appropriations we were paying the traveling expenses of official delegates and their membership fees. For instance, we had a case where one official was a delegate to some convention and he was elected president of it. The annual dues were $10. He paid the annual dues and put in a voucher for his expenses, and the comptroller held that as he had been detailed to attend as a delegate by a superior officer, and as he could not act as delegate unless his membership fees were paid, that it was a proper charge.

Mr. MURDOCK. And this is to get around the ruling of the comptroller?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not exactly. Congress passed a provision prohibiting the payment either of the traveling expenses or the expenses of attendance or the membership fees of any Government official in any one of these associations. Now, then, the Public Health Service has a relationship to some of these associations that is different from that occupied by, for instance, an auditor or an accountant to various associations. Its officials attend the annual meeting of medical societies and impart very valuable information, so we permit the payment of traveling expenses of the officer sent for that purpose, but still prohibit the payment of his dues as a member of the association.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. In the language of this paragraph you have "and traveling expenses, including the expenses of officers when officially detailed." Is there any limit to the expenses which an officer may incur?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I think so.

Mr. GARNER. What is the limit?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We passed a law this session, which created a good deal of controversy, which limits the per diem expenses of any official traveling to $5 a day; they can not exceed $5 a day. Expenses mean not only traveling expenses but subsistence, but in regard to the Public Health Service we think the question is upon an entirely different footing. We have a number of men who are expert in a number of lines that the ordinary physician is not. It is a great benefit to have such experts attend these annual meetings and read their papers and discuss with the members of the associations important matters affecting the public health.

Mr. GARNER. And the question of detail is left to the particular chief of bureau.

Mr. FITZGERALD. In that particular bureau.

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MURDOCK. Do I understand the word "transportation" to mean by railroad—railroad fare of the individual?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; transportation relates to an entirely different thing. It is transportation other than the railroad fare of individuals—express charges, and so forth.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is, transportation of something other than freight, but traveling expenses relate to railroad fare, and those expenses would be subsistence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For maintenance of marine hospitals, including subsistence, and for all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads, $245,000: Provided, That there may be admitted into said hospitals for study persons with infectious or other diseases affecting the public health, and not to exceed 10 cases in any one hospital at one time.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word, in order to ask the chairman a question. What is embraced in this language in this paragraph:

And for all other necessary miscellaneous expenses which are not included under special heads.

Is not that a rather broad expression to use, giving authority in the expenditure of a lump-sum appropriation of $245,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is. It is for the maintenance of the marine hospitals, and it is very difficult to detail every specific expense attached to them. It takes care of laundry, telephones, repairs, rents, stationery, forage, toilet articles, and such items.

Mr. GARNER. This language here is broad enough to include almost any expenditure——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. If the chief of the department should O. K. them; and is it not the custom of the chief of the bureau to O. K. and approve most any bills that are sent to him from the various places?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I think not. The appropriations for these hospitals are cut very close, and they have to be quite guarded all the time, so as to keep within the amount appropriated in order to keep them going.

Mr. GARNER. But this seems to be an unusual authorization.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And they all must be passed by the auditor, and there are pretty well defined rules as to what can or can not be allowed.

Mr. GARNER. This is an unusually broad authorization. I do not know of another item carrying this identical language. Of course, as the gentleman says, this may be necessary, but it is a rather large sum to absolutely turn over without any qualification whatever, to be expended for any purpose the department might see proper.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, when it is taken into consideration, in the first place, that there were 473,000 rations issued last year, which are paid for out of this appropriation, and then there are 23 marine hospitals maintained out of it, it does not give them very much leeway. If we were to appropriate specifically to cover every little thing, it would be very difficult to do so without a good deal of trouble. The appropriation has never been such that they have been in a position to spend anything except what is absolutely essential.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Quarantine Service: For maintenance and ordinary expenses, exclusive of pay of officers and employees, of quarantine stations at Eastport and Portland, Me.; Providence, R. I.; Perth Amboy, N. J.; Delaware Breakwater; Reedy Island, and the Delaware Bay and River; Alexandria, Va.; Cape Charles and supplemental station thereto; Cape Fear, Newbern, and Washington, N. C.; Georgetown, Charleston, Beaufort, and Port Royal, S. C.; Savannah; South Atlantic; Brunswick; Cumberland Sound; St. Johns River; Biscayne Bay; Key West; Boca Grande; Tampa Bay; Port Inglis; Cedar Key; Puntarasa; St. Georges Sound (East and West Pass); St. Joseph; St. Andrews and Pensacola, Fla.; Mobile; New Orleans and supplemental stations thereto; Pascagoula; Gulf; Gulfport, Galveston, Laredo, Eagle Pass, and El Paso, Tex.; San Diego, San Pedro and adjoining ports, Santa Barbara, San Francisco, Monterey, and Port Harford, Cal.; Fort Bragg, Eureka, Columbia River, Florence, Newport, Coos Bay, and Gardner, Oreg.; Port Townsend and supplemental stations thereto; quarantine system of Alaska; quarantine system of the Hawaiian Islands, including the leprosy hospital; and the quarantine system of Porto Rico, and including not exceeding $500 for printing on account of the quarantine service at times when the exigencies of that service require immediate action, $155,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Can the gentleman from New York tell us what is the cost of maintenance of the leprosy hospital in the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Originally there was an appropriation of $50,000 a year to maintain it, but it never cost that much annually, and the item was merged with other items. I will try to ascertain exactly how much it costs.

Mr. MANN. This leprosy hospital is maintained in connection with the leper colony of the Hawaiian Islands?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. It is on the island of Molokai.

Mr. MANN. At whose expense is the colony maintained? The local government?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not certain. I am inclined to think the Territory of Hawaii maintains the colony and we maintain certain medical officers. Some of them are on duty at Honolulu and make the examinations of the lepers before they are committed to the institution. Others are stationed at the institution itself.

Mr. MANN. Has the gentleman made any inquiry as to whether the maintenance of this leprosy hospital has resulted in our acquiring any further information concerning the spread or cure of leprosy?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know whether it has or not. One man, I believe, has become very expert. Just how much practical information has been gained I am unable to say.

Mr. MANN. Well, the gentleman knows that a few years ago the Public Health Service desired to have set aside some place in the United States, which place was to be in Arizona or New Mexico, a tract of land 10 miles or more square, for the purpose of having a leprosarium, if that is the proper name for a leper colony, in the United States, to which lepers might be transported. That failed, although the bill was reported favorably to that effect, on a vote in the House, owing to the opposition of the local people. Then we established this leprosy hospital for the purpose of seeing if we could get information which would show how to cure leprosy or prevent its spread. I do not remember just how long that hospital has been maintained, but I think it would be interesting to know if they had acquired any valuable information. I do not mean to criticize if they have not, because that is something very difficult to learn about.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Three years ago the committee made some inquiry, I think in 1910. I have sent for the hearing. They went into the matter very fully. In 1911, for the fiscal year 1912, the estimate was $33,000 for maintenance of the hospital. In 1911 the appropriation was $45,000. In 1910 we reappropriated the unexpended balance of $20,000 appropriated in 1909, and in 1909 they expended out of the $20,000, $11,815. The leprosarium had not been in full operation. It only went into full operation on the 1st of July, 1910, if I recall correctly. They were making investigations then both at Honolulu and Molokai. I may be able to find the information, but I am not certain whether——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman's time be extended.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that the time of the gentleman from Illinois be extended for five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it was the 1st of July, 1909, when it was in full operation for the first time.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. If the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] will permit me, I desire to state that I happen to have in my hand now seven or eight pamphlets on the subject of leprosy, issued as the result of work carried on at the United States leprosy investigation station at Molokai, Hawaii. These bulletins have been issued under the direction of the director, Walter B. Brinkerhoff, M. D., and are most interesting.

Concerning the point which the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has interrogated the chairman of the Appropriations Committee, let me say that with the acquisition of Hawaii by the United States leprosy became more than ever a national problem. Representations were made to Congress urging the establishment of a leper investigation station on the island of Molokai, in order that advantage might be taken of the excellent opportunities afforded by the leper settlement for scientific study of the disease. As a result, Congress passed an act, which was approved March 3, 1905, providing for the investigation of leprosy in Hawaii. In accordance with the provisions of this act a suitable tract of land was ceded by the Territory of Hawaii to the United States, and steps were taken to establish thereon a hospital station and laboratory of the Public Health and Marine-Hospital Service.

That station has been cared for in each succeeding appropriation bill, and the information contained in these pamphlets—seven in number, issued from 1908 to 1913, including two in 1910—contain the latest and most reliable information concerning leprosy, which has caused terror for 3,000 years, but which now, happily, is being considered in a more rational manner than heretofore.

Mr. Chairman, in 1899 there were known to be 278 well-authenticated cases of leprosy in 21 separate States and Territories of the United States. In the first American census of Hawaii, in 1901, the fact was disclosed that of 37,635 native Hawaiians, 1 in 40, or 25 per 1,000, were known lepers, while among 116,366 foreign-born persons in Hawaii there were but 63 known lepers. Leprosy seems to have had its greatest spread in Hawaii in 1863, and the Molokai colony was established in 1866. In the 40 years from 1866 to 1905, a total of 5,853 cases were sent to Molokai. Now the disease is decreasing there.

One of these pamphlets contains the leper law of the Territory of Hawaii, approved in April, 1909, and appropriating $40,000 for a leper hospital on the island of Oahu. Thus it appears that Hawaii is doing its part in this great work.

One pamphlet, issued by this same bureau, deals with leprosy in the United States of America, showing 139 known cases reported through the health authorities—50 in Louisiana, 20 in Florida, 20 in California, 16 in Minnesota, 12 in Texas, 8 in Massachusetts, and so on.

I notice the State of Washington is credited with one case at that date.

Mr. Chairman, the disease has increased in the United States since then, as the reports of the Surgeon General show.

On this subject I think it may be of interest to the House to know that the great danger and fear of leprosy, the reason why there has been such a determination on the part of various localities not to permit a leprosarium to be established, is on account of the slowness with which this disease seems to take hold.

Leprosy takes a long time to develop, and there are cases on record where 40 years have elapsed before the disease manifested itself, and instances of where from 15 to 18 years have passed by before the disease betrayed itself are frequently met with. As it is a bacillar disease, it may be communicated by physical contact. This renders it extremely dangerous to a community for a leper to be at large, while its insidious character and the length of time it takes to develop makes it exceedingly difficult of discovery until it reaches an advanced stage.

These reports tell of the case of a man named Keanu, a condemned murderer, who was given his life on condition that he be inoculated with the bacilli of leprosy. Dr. Edward Arming performed the inoculation September 30, 1884, and 14 months afterwards the bacilli were still in the wound without any symptoms of the disease developing, and 3 years elapsed before the leprosy showed itself.

One bulletin, No. 39 of the Public Health Bulletins, discusses flies and mosquitoes with relation to leprosy, and the author comes to the following conclusions:

Certain data, taken together with the well-known habits of certain of these flies, establish the truth of the following statements:

First. That given a bacilli-discharging leprous ulcer (and practically all leprous ulcers due to the breaking down of a leprous nodule do discharge bacilli), unprotected from the attacks of flies, these insects will convey the bacillus of leprosy to the skin of near-by healthy persons.

Second. That such insects will contaminate the foodstuffs of such persons with these organisms.

Third. That these insects deposit their feces on every conceivable surface, and such feces, becoming dry and pulverized, will in the form of "dust" convey the bacilli to the nasal mucosa of near-by persons.

That given such an unprotected ulcer, and the usual number of flies, this contamination of the skin and mucosa of near-by healthy persons will not be an unusual event, but will occur again and again, through an indefinite length of time, and the number of bacilli thus conveyed to healthy persons will be enormous.

This much the experiments show; but the below-mentioned points at once present themselves, and can not in our present state of knowledge be answered by laboratory data:

First. Is the skin (or abrasion of it), the mucosa of the digestive tract, or the nasal mucosa capable of being infected with leprosy?

Second. Are the bacilli that have been discharged from an ulcer and afterwards passed through a fly's digestive tract alive and capable of infecting man?

Third. Do epidemiological and clinical observations bear out the supposition that flies help to spread leprosy?

As to the first of these, we know that by some means lepra bacilli do gain entrance to the tissues of man. It is difficult to conceive how this is brought about, except that the bacilli penetrate one or more of the surfaces mentioned as being frequently contaminated, directly or indirectly, by the fecal contents of flies.

Mr. Chairman, in some other pamphlets I have read of an Irishman who, after 22 years' service in the Indian Army, returned home a fully developed leper, dying of the disease a year and a half later. During this time his brother slept in the same room with him, sharing his bed and wearing his clothes. This intimate intercourse was the most dangerous possible. Three years after the ex-soldier's death the brother, who had never been outside Ireland, developed leprosy. In that case it is possible the disease did not manifest itself for four and a half years after it was contracted.

You can gather from these examples how insidious and dangerous this disease is, while its being incurable and horrible in action renders it imperative that no effort should be spared or opportunity neglected not only to hold it in check but to stamp it out.

Mr. MANN. Did not the gentleman introduce a bill recently for the purpose of having a leper colony established?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes; I did. I introduced two bills, one for a leprosarium to be built by the United States on some island, and the other one authorizing the Surgeon General to negotiate with the officials of Hawaii for the care of our lepers on one of the islands or at the colony there.

I have had talks with Surg. Gen. Blue, and he feels sure that wherever the United States undertakes to go and put such a sanitarium there will be objection. He hopes now it can be placed in the center of one of the largest forest reserves in some of the Western States.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman think that the people of his State would be willing to have such a colony located in Washington, where, I take it, it is almost impossible in that climate to transmit leprosy from one person to another?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I feel very sure that they would not. The first report of a leper in the State of Washington is that of what appears to be a rather celebrated case, that of John R. Early, who was given money here in the District of Columbia and went to New York, and then bobbed up later in western Washington. That was some four years ago. Now, then, one year ago, in the center of the district that I have the honor to represent, a farmer developed leprosy, and, as I understand it, he had not been off his farm for several years.

It is that sort of development of the disease that has alarmed our people. In another locality in my district the case of a Japanese leper has turned up in the past two weeks, and there is a great hue and cry between the State quarantine and the Federal quarantine as to the question of jurisdiction. I hope that Congress will look into this leprosy problem. I hope that, in connection with the sad case that now exists on the outskirts of this city, it will do something. I hope Congress will provide for the care of those people.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Washington yield to the gentleman from Colorado?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Do the agents of the Public Health Service have the right to exercise police power in the matter of keeping lepers in custody?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I understand they have.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I do not understand that they have such power.

Mr. FOSTER. In traveling from one State to another the States have no control, but as to people living within the States the State boards of health have the power to take them in custody.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I understand that the United States had no power to prevent the escape of this man Early—from Fishermans Island, I think it was.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Fishermans Island is in Chesapeake Bay, I understand.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I mean that island in the State of Washington. What is the name?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Diamond Head Station, which is not an island. The quarantine regulations provide that a leper can not be moved into the States without the permission of the States themselves; and, so far as I know, the only State that has ever protested against the transmission or the transportation of a leper is the State of Colorado.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. It would make no difference, then, if the board of health had the power to keep those lepers in the place where they desired. As I understand, the Public Health Service has recognized the fact that they are without the police power to detain and prevent the escape of lepers when they are once placed in any sanitarium or location.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I have some conclusions reached by Surg. Gen. Blue, and I ask permission to place a small portion of that in the RECORD later, together with some comment and additional statements.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD in the manner indicated. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. It is a paper read before the American Medical Association in Minneapolis last June.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does the gentleman know that out in the Hawaiian Islands they object to lepers from other sections of the country being sent to their leper's settlement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I saw a notice to that effect in the papers only last night, and I understand that Dr. J. S. B. Platt, president of the Territorial board of health, will be here in a few days to register his protest and to attend a conference on the subject of leprosy.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, they do object to it, and yet the Public Health Service is doing a remarkable work in the leprosy colony in Hawaii. They have succeeded in discovering the germ of leprosy, and they are experimenting at the present time with a view to finding some remedy, some drug, that will destroy the germ. They are making wonderful progress, and it is within the range of possibility that Dr. Blue contributed his article to this medical journal to show just exactly what work they have done in order that the medical profession might learn the splendid results that are being attained by that service.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment will be considered withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prevention of epidemics: To enable the President, in case only of threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague or black death or trachoma, to aid State and local boards, or otherwise, in his discretion, in preventing and suppressing the spread of the same, and in such emergency in the execution of any quarantine laws which may be then in force, $200,000: Provided, That a detailed report of the expenditures hereunder shall annually hereafter be submitted to Congress.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARNER. I would like to ask the chairman if a detailed statement has been made of the expenditures under this appropriation in the last fiscal year; and if so, what are the leading items of expenditures in this fund?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The epidemic fund?

Mr. GARNER. Yes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, this fund is being used largely to prevent the introduction and spread of the bubonic plague. They are spending this money largely on the Pacific coast in trying to kill the flea that infest the rat, as a result of which the bubonic plague is spread. It is estimated that it will cost $10,000 each year to maintain the plague laboratory at San Francisco. Then we have men who instruct the people of San Francisco, Tacoma, and Seattle how to fix their houses to keep out rats, and by keeping out the rats keep out the flea, and by keeping out the flea keep out the bubonic plague.

Mr. GARNER. Of course, that is rather an indefinite statement as to the details for which this money has been expended. If I understand the gentleman from New York, however, the principal part of this money appropriated a year ago for this fiscal year was spent in catching fleas that infest rats in California. I should like to know, if the gentleman has the information, just how many fleas have been caught with this $200,000?

Mr. FITZGERALD. We figured that out one time. We figured out how much it cost for each flea, and how much it cost for each rat.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman a detailed statement, such as is required in this paragraph?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it cost $10,000 a rat, and it would depend on how many fleas there were to a rat as to how much it would cost per flea.

Mr. GARNER. But evidently the gentleman's committee contemplates that Congress shall receive a detailed statement, and I take it that that would mean an itemized statement of that expenditure, giving the leading items for which the expenditure has been made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can furnish that to the gentleman.

Mr. WATKINS. The wicked flea, when no man pursueth——

[Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. If it costs $10,000 for each rat, is there any estimate of the number of rats out there which are infested?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; and when it looked as if all the rats were likely to be exterminated, somebody discovered that these villainous fleas would go to the ground squirrels, and hence they are exterminating the ground squirrels. Where the fleas will go after the ground squirrels are exterminated I do not know.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman think their limitations are only circumscribed by the generosity of the Committee on Appropriations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; this is a very serious matter. This committee has been endeavoring to compel the State of California to do this work. This epidemic fund was a lump appropriation made some years ago at the disposal of the President in case of threatened epidemic in this country. It was ascertained by Congress a few years ago that in the Public Health Service they had built up a permanent organization under this appropriation. It could hardly be said to be peculiarly identified with the work of preventing or eradicating epidemics, and so the Committee on Appropriations took the force necessary to do the permanent work of the Public Health Service and provided for it in the proper place, and then attempted to control this appropriation. In 1910 the sum of $750,000 was appropriated for this fund. Then there was no further appropriation made until 1913, when $200,000 was appropriated. The estimate for that year was $500,000. For 1914, $200,000 was appropriated, when the estimate was $499,800. It was necessary to provide an additional $100,000 for the current year, because on bringing the people from Mexico it was ascertained that in some of the districts surrounding Tampico and Vera Cruz there were evidences of yellow fever. In addition, there were 12 cases of bubonic plague discovered in Habana, and it was necessary to provide additional precautions against the introduction of the plague by way of the Gulf and Atlantic coasts.

There has been a controversy between this committee and the service as to just how much the Federal Government should do of the work of eradicating the squirrels and rats in certain counties of California. The result of our efforts has been to compel the State of California to engage in this work more actively, and to bear some portion of the expense that it was refusing to bear at all. I remember that about two or three years ago the governor of the State of California vetoed a bill appropriating money provided at the request of the State medical officers to cooperate in this work. It is now expected that we will spend about $20,000 in this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent that the time be extended for five minutes. I want the opportunity to use a little of that time. I asked the gentleman a question, and he consumed the larger part of the five minutes in answering it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] asks unanimous consent that the time be extended five minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield now for a moment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. What I am complaining about is the misleading of the Congress and the public, I think, in making this appropriation. It is made largely for the purpose of assisting the State of California in eradicating some rats and squirrels that are infected with a flea that is calculated to spread bubonic plague or other contagious diseases. Now, this Congress has been in session nearly continuously for the last five years, or at least the larger portion of the time, and at any time that the gentleman from New York will come into the House and ask an urgent appropriation for any such purpose as this Congress will always appropriate the money, as it did recently, when it appropriated $100,000 for emergencies at Galveston. But to continue to carry in the sundry civil appropriation bill an item which purports to authorize the President to fight a threatened or actual epidemic of cholera, typhus fever, yellow fever, smallpox, bubonic plague, Chinese plague or black death, or trachoma is misleading, when there is no threatened plague, and there is no actual plague, and you are simply assisting the State of California in its work. I do not object to assisting the State of California in eradicating these creatures which are supposed to spread disease, but I do think the appropriation ought to be carried for that specific purpose, and the State of California ought to contribute an equal amount to this fund. As far as this record shows, the State of California has not contributed a cent. I do think that it ought to pay its proportional part for eradicating these pests.

Mr. MANN. How about Galveston, Tex.? We just appropriated $100,000 to prevent the plague from coming in through Galveston.

Mr. FITZGERALD. This appropriation is not being carried under any misapprehension. It specifically provides that to enable the President in case only of threatened or actual epidemic of different diseases, including bubonic plague, the appropriation is available. The Public Health Service states that we are threatened with an epidemic of bubonic plague. It is a technical matter and I am not sufficiently informed to enable me to know whether we are or not. We are spending about $11,000 a month doing the work said to be necessary. We would be spending a great deal more than that if it had not been for the action of the Committee on Appropriations in taking the matter up so vigorously and having some things done that awakened the States on the Pacific coast to do their part of the work. We have cut down as much as possible the work that is being done by the Federal Government. Some things, in my opinion, do not belong within the proper functions of the Federal Government. The Public Health officials state that unless these things are done there is very grave danger of the introduction of a widespread epidemic of bubonic plague. I think there has as yet no remedy been found for it; persons infected with it die. We could not refuse to give the means required to do this work. We are doing everything we can to make California spend as much as we can. If other statements threatening to cut down the appropriation are made by others in addition to the gentleman from Texas, it will awaken the State of California to the fact that if they do not do their part Congress will do nothing. We are spending about $137,000 a year on bubonic plague.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, the counties of California in which the affected rodents are found are all contributing for a portion of the work that is being done for the eradication of the squirrels and rats which carry the fleas that carry the infection known as bubonic plague.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. GARNER. Have you got any bubonic plague in the State of California?

Mr. KAHN. No.

Mr. GARNER. This provision is for actual bubonic plague—plague that actually exists—or the prospect of it.

Mr. KAHN. There is always a prospect of it on the Pacific coast.

Mr. GARNER. And there always will be as long as you have the squirrel and the rat in California.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is mistaken and his statement is unfair. As far as the State of California is concerned, she does as much as Texas does in appropriating for the eradication of the cattle tick and for the eradication of the boll weevil. Texas does not give a dollar, but the United States is called upon to do it all. Now, the counties of California certainly do contribute a great deal in cooperation with the Federal Government for the eradication of these squirrels and rats.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I can not just now. As a matter of fact, the plague-infected squirrels are found occasionally; plague-infected rats are occasionally found. Ordinarily there would be no danger from that source; but in these days, with our railroad systems reaching all over the country, there is always danger that an infected rat will get into a freight car. That infected rat may be carried to some place 500 or 600 miles distant from the station at which the rat got in the car. The fleas which carry the plague might bite some individual, who would become afflicted with the bubonic plague. For that reason the Federal Government ought to make a liberal allowance to eradicate these vermin, because it is not alone the good health of the people of California or the Western States that we are looking out for, but the good health of the people of the entire country.

Mr. GARNER. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. I will.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from California had been in the Chamber when I made my statement, and the inquiry of the gentleman from New York——

Mr. KAHN. I was in the Chamber.

Mr. GARNER (continuing). He would not have criticized me as he has for criticizing the appropriation. I have not criticized the appropriation.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman criticized the State of California.

Mr. GARNER. No; I have not criticized the State of California. I said that this appropriation ought to be carried in the name of the eradication of rats and squirrels in California, just as the appropriation is carried for the eradication of the boll weevil and the cattle tick in Texas. Instead of that, this appropriation is carried under a disguise that you are keeping out some bubonic plague that is likely to come in all over the United States, when it is well known that it is an appropriation to kill the rats and squirrels in California.

Mr. MANN. Did not we make an appropriation in the deficiency bill, in the very language of this bill, for the benefit of Texas, of $100,000?

Mr. GARNER. Yes; going to Galveston for that purpose; but I am speaking about this appropriation which is made every year under a disguise.

Mr. KAHN. I do not think it is under any disguise at all. As a matter of fact, the States on the Pacific coast are more liable to receive an infection of this kind than other sections of the Union. As I said, the rats carry it. Vessels come from the Orient, where this disease is ever present. These rats carry the infection. They are carried from Japan and China, and even from the Philippines, to the State of Oregon or the State of Washington, as well as the State of California. You can not keep the rats, when they are in the ships, from getting ashore.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. How long will it be after the Panama Canal is completed before the city of New York will be exposed to the same danger as now exists in the State of California?

Mr. KAHN. They will be exposed and they are exposed at the present time. It so happened that in California some six or seven years ago there was a very large number of vermin, of infected vermin, and there were a few cases of bubonic plague. That is what we were told by the doctors of the Public Health Service. The Government promptly undertook to suppress the plague, and started in on a crusade to kill off the rats and the squirrels. I venture the assertion that San Francisco to-day has fewer rats than any other city in the entire United States.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. Is it not a fact that they are breeding cats out there for the purpose of eradicating the rats?

Mr. KAHN. Oh, no.

Mr. GARNER. The hearings do show that they are doing that very thing in Japan, and that the cat is immune from this flea, and it seems to me it is the best way to eradicate the rat.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman spoke about the cost of this proposition to the people of California. When this propaganda was started every building in San Francisco was made rat proof. The house owners all were called upon to put in cement cellars and cement foundations, so as to keep the rats out of the buildings. More than a million dollars were expended for that purpose alone by the property holders of San Francisco.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman owned a house in San Francisco, he would spend as much as he had to keep those flea-infected rats out of the house. That is not any credit; it is a matter of self-protection.

Mr. KAHN. I was simply saying that the people of San Francisco have done their share. I recall they subscribed liberally to a public fund that was raised to enable our local health board to cooperate with the Public Health Service. But, in addition to that, the county of San Francisco appropriated thousands of dollars for cooperation with the Federal Government in the extermination of these rats.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The State of California has nothing to boast about.

Mr. KAHN. I am not talking about the State of California, but I am talking about the counties of California. They certainly have done their share. They have done infinitely more than the people of Texas have done for the eradication and extermination of the plagues they have down there.

Mr. FITZGERALD. But the gentleman would not expect the people of Texas to do that.

Mr. MANN. Was there not an appropriation made last year or the year before by the State of California, which the governor of California vetoed, which was to carry on this desirable work?

Mr. KAHN. That is my recollection; but the governor vetoed it on the ground that the counties were making the necessary appropriations.

Mr. MANN. The State would not do it, in any event?

Mr. KAHN. The legislature tried to do it.

Mr. MANN. I know. Everyone was in favor of it except the Progressive governor.

Mr. KAHN. I want to say that an epidemic of this kind is just as apt to break out in the State of Texas as on the Pacific coast. And we on the Pacific coast who know the danger that lurks in these vermin will be anxious to help the gentleman from Texas if such a thing should happen. We will never criticize him for trying to get appropriations for trying to protect not only the people of his own State, but by protecting the people in his own State protect the people throughout the United States.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. I am most heartily in favor of any appropriation that goes in the direction of eradicating these rats and squirrels that are calculated to convey the bubonic plague; but I think the appropriation ought to be carried for the appropriation for which it is to be used and not under a misleading heading that you are likely to have bubonic plague brought into this country, and that it is only to be used in emergency, while this is an appropriation constantly being used for the eradication of rats, squirrels, and so on, and it ought to be carried under that head.

Mr. KAHN. It is being used for the prevention of epidemics, and you are preventing epidemics when you are destroying the source of the epidemics.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has again expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is an item that is used for the prevention of epidemics, with a view of preventing the recurrence of epidemics of various sorts and kinds. A comparatively small amount of it is used for the prevention of the bubonic plague. A part of it, but not all of it, used for that purpose is used in the State of California. This is not altogether a California matter. Dr. Rucker, who appeared before the committee, told us of some good work they were doing in Seattle. I asked him if he had ever heard of any cases of bubonic plague in Seattle, and he replied that they had had cases of plague rats there for some time. I again asked him if there had been any plague among human beings, and he replied not in recent years—not that he knew of. He was then asked how he discovered there were any plague rats, and he said there had been a case of bubonic plague there years ago, and they made investigations, and they did find some rats which they claimed were infected with bubonic plague.

If it is a fact that there are rats and squirrels adjacent to these great Pacific coast cities that are infected with bubonic plague, they ought to be killed and disposed of as far as possible. The trouble is that it is impossible to exterminate the rats. Dr. Rucker assured us of that fact. The best they can hope to do or that anyone can hope to do is to reduce their number and keep them down. A part of this money is expended for the purpose of encouraging the people of Seattle to build rat-proof structures and thus reduce the number of rats, or aid in the extermination of the rats by reducing the area of their hiding places.

Coming back to the California situation, we began by exterminating rats in and around San Francisco. We extended that to the extermination of squirrels. It was then discovered that after exterminating the squirrels in the vicinity of San Francisco the mountain squirrel wandered down and took the place of the squirrel that had been killed in the vicinity of San Francisco, and as the Public Health Service could not wander through the forest reserves killing squirrels, we transferred the appropriation to the Agricultural appropriation bill, where it has since been carried. This prevention work is very valuable.

It is very important—it is even more important to prevent these dreadful plagues and maladies than to attempt to check them once they have started and are spreading, but work of that sort should be kept within bounds. There is always a danger that overenthusiastic public servants—and the best public servants are the most enthusiastic and sometimes the most overenthusiastic—there is always a danger that they will imagine that their particular work is the most important under the Government and that they will keep constantly extending it, and extending it to a point which is not justified or justifiable. I am rather inclined to think that out on the Pacific coast this work has been extended quite as far as it can be justified. I will not say that we have done anything more up to this time than we should have done.

The work of the Public Health Service in the matter of prevention should be largely the work of pointing out to the local people the ways and means of preventing rather than the taking up of the work of the actual extermination of these creatures. It is not an altogether dignified position for our Uncle Samuel to take to go around the country as a permanent professional rat catcher. It is the duty of the Federal Government to prevent the importation to our ports of these diseases. It is the duty of the localities, in the main, to take up and carry on the work necessary to prevent the spread of contagion.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. I ask that I may have one minute more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for one minute. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not criticize the appropriations; I do not criticize the work that has been done under them, but I think it has the resulting danger of improperly extending Federal activities, extending them into a domain in which the localities themselves should accept the responsibility and defray the expense.

Mr. KAHN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Yes.

Mr. KAHN. Does not the gentleman think that the Federal Government ought to do its share of the work of preventing the spread of disease?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, that depends upon what the gentleman refers to when he says the spread of disease. I doubt if it is the province of the Federal Government to go abroad over the land and hunt up all of the rodents that may be affected with some disease that may be transmitted. In the main, that is the work of the local authorities.

Mr. KAHN. As a matter of fact, when this work first started there was very little known in the United States about the bubonic plague. The officials of the Public Health Service and the doctors of that service seem to know more about it than the physicians throughout the country, and they found that through their correspondents in the Orient the flea was carrying the infection.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has again expired.

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Chairman, I ask that I may proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent that he may proceed for two minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. KAHN. The moment the Federal authorities began to point out to the local health authorities in California how the work of the extermination of the rodents should be carried on they were immediately given every assistance on the part of the local health authorities. The counties of California, as I said, did a great deal of work in the effort of exterminating it. But I think my friend from Wyoming rather narrows the scope of the work when he says that it should all be done, after it has been pointed out by the Public Health Service, by the local authorities. As I said——

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. KAHN. In a moment. As I said, it is a very easy thing nowadays to carry an infection like bubonic plague by reason of the great number of railroad trains that go everywhere, and the Federal Government has its responsibility in that regard. The local authorities ought not to be held to a strict accountability against the possible spread of an epidemic. They ought to have the assistance as well as the support of the Federal Government, so that the people in the other sections of the country can be protected. The Federal Government ought to do its share of the work in that regard.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman does not think that the Federal Government ought to take up the work of attempting to exterminate all the wharf rats at all the ports in the United States, does he?

Mr. KAHN. The Federal Government is not attempting to do it, because there has been no bubonic plague reported in other ports. At the same time the Federal Government alone did not do it on the Pacific coast. They had the assistance and support of the local health authorities.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. KAHN. Certainly.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. At Seattle for years the city authorities have carried on this work against the rat, by making regular appropriations and had regular men for that purpose, and they did that for several years——

Mr. KAHN. And the people of San Francisco do that to-day.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. And spent thousands of dollars in that way.

Mr. KAHN. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. Does not this, as a matter of fact, come strictly under the police powers of the several States? And I will ask the gentleman whether the Federal appropriation ought not to be in the nature of an exception to the rule applicable to large seaports where there may be a spread of a dangerous disease?

Mr. KAHN. If I remember correctly, up to a few years ago the matter of preventing epidemics of disease was left largely in the hands of the local authorities of the various States; but, as I now recall, a few years ago, when there was an outbreak of yellow fever in the Southern States, application was made to Congress that we appropriate the necessary sums of money to enable the Public Health Service of the Federal Government to take hold of that work. If you will recall, men were patrolling the banks of the Mississippi with shotguns, to prevent people from crossing from one State into another. An appeal was made to the Federal Government at that time to take over the quarantine work, so the Federal Government, by the action of Congress, became committed to that kind of work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I think there has been entirely too much attention paid to the Pacific coast on this proposition, and I want to impress that thought on the committee. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] has evidently the subject of rats on his mind. Now, this is not altogether a matter of rats. It is no more undignified for Uncle Sam to attempt to kill rats than it is for him to attempt to kill ticks or to attempt to kill mosquitoes or to attempt to kill the leprosy germ or anything that threatens the country at large with a disease or with infection.

I had in mind this yellow-fever proposition. It seems the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], or any gentleman from Texas, ought to be the very last to raise any such question as this here on this floor. I remember, not many years ago, when I lived in Louisiana, when I would wait for the Galveston News or the Houston Post on the morning train on the Southern Pacific, in order to see how many new cases of yellow fever were at Galveston. And I tell you the trouble on the Pacific coast with the bubonic plague compares with the trouble the country has had with yellow fever as a picayune compares to a hundred-dollar bill. The country has paid more money to eliminate mosquitoes in Cuba and Panama, in Mexico, and elsewhere on the border than has ever been dreamed of for the prevention of bubonic plague on the Pacific coast. According to the last reports, the city of Seattle, referred to by the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] a moment ago, so that it brings it into this issue, is the healthiest city or has less deaths per thousand per year than any city in the United States, and that condition is brought about because we look after things out there involving health and sanitation and because of natural advantages.

Mr. MANN. You look out for appropriations.

Mr. GARNER. There has not been any yellow fever in Galveston since 1867. So the gentleman must have been reading of it before that date.

Mr. BRYAN. If the gentleman says there has been no yellow fever in Texas——

Mr. GARNER. I said in Galveston.

Mr. BRYAN. I did not. I said I was waiting for the Galveston paper in order to see how many new cases there were. And the gentleman's suggestion that there has been no yellow fever in Galveston since 1867 is a nightmare of his.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman say that he knows there have been cases of yellow fever in Galveston since that date?

Mr. BRYAN. I can not give the data and the date, but I know it just as I know the gentleman is a Member of Congress.

Mr. GARNER. Now, the gentleman says it was a nightmare of mine, and the gentleman says that he knows it the same as he knows I am a Member of Congress.

Mr. MANN. Which does the gentleman think is the greatest scourge? [Laughter.]

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman seen anyone that had yellow fever in the city of Galveston since that date?

Mr. BRYAN. I admit I can not give the data, but there has been yellow fever in Galveston.

Mr. GARNER. I would like the gentleman to insert that in the RECORD. He will have plenty of time to get that data and the date.

Mr. BRYAN. I will do it. I will get the records from the library, and if I can not bring reports of yellow fever in Galveston since 1867, then I will have to admit I am greatly in error.

This not only affects bubonic plague but typhus fever, and that is not a matter local to the Pacific coast. We do not have typhoid there to amount to anything; certainly not as much as there is in New York and Texas. And if this appropriation is made it will be well spent. The bubonic plague, which comes across the ocean in a cargo of freight, is not a local charge and ought not to be a local charge, although our ports have borne the weight and burden of it to a great extent and have spent more money than the Federal Government to stop it at the ports and to save the people of the interior from the direful effects of that disease.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on the pending paragraph and amendments thereto close in 10 minutes.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, just a moment. I would like five minutes.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will make it 15 minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] moves that all debate on the pending paragraph and all amendments thereto close in 15 minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming is recognized for five minutes.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I think it rather unfortunate that this discussion should have developed into a comparison as to the prevalency of disease and the ability to secure appropriations as between Texas and the Pacific coast. We gentlemen who do not live in either part of the country take it for granted that both districts are generally healthy, and we know that both districts get all the appropriations they can. I do not criticize what has been done in the main on the Pacific coast, as I would not criticize what has been done elsewhere under this item. But I think it is one of the items, and that the work under it is of a character that it illustrates, without regard to where the money is used, certain tendencies which we all recognize in the Government service.

The men who have been engaged in this work on the Pacific coast have all of them been high class, enthusiastic gentlemen. They have done a great work, no doubt. I do not say that they have carried the work further than they should, either in California or in Seattle, but in both places they have, at least pretty nearly, reached the limit of proper Federal expenditures in the matter of prevention. We should keep the work up within due bounds, within the speed limit. The localities interested and affected should not be allowed to understand or get the idea that the Federal Government will relieve them from all responsibility.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. I happened to be out home some years ago when it was thought we were threatened with the bubonic plague, and so, personally, I am somewhat familiar with the conditions. As soon as that was known the health officer representing the Government immediately took charge of the work. He had had some experience. He was Dr. Bourne, as I recall, who had been in the Orient, and he took charge of the work there, and the local authorities furnished most of the money. And they have been doing that ever since. And they are working together. We have done everything we could to look after ourselves, and we appreciate what assistance we get from the Government, and we think it perfectly proper that the Government should have supervision of this work.

Mr. MONDELL. I think the gentleman is entirely right in his statement. The Government should have some supervision of all this work, but I question whether the Government should continue indefinitely in the business of exterminating these creatures and insects. The gentleman from Washington says it is just as proper and dignified for the Government to kill rats as it is to kill ticks. So it is; but the Government should not be permanently a professional rat killer or tick killer, either, except on its own property.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman understands that in the Pacific Coast States there are large areas in the forest reserves. They are not a part of the land——

Mr. MONDELL. The gentlemen have taken care of that in the Agricultural appropriation bill, and for a number of years past they have been receiving $15,000 for the extermination of squirrels.

Mr. KAHN. That is true.

Mr. MONDELL. And the curious thing about that squirrel-extermination business is that until we secured an increase in the appropriation this year we never got a "look in," to use the language of the street, on that appropriation for the extermination of the rodents that were troubling us and destroying our crops, if they were not spreading disease.

I think it is entirely proper to extend that work and kill the squirrels, but that certainly was not a work for the extermination of disease. It was a work of extermination of squirrels in order to prevent them from destroying crops, perhaps also the big trees out there, I suppose.

Mr. KAHN. The gentleman is entirely mistaken. The squirrels were found to be infected with the bubonic plague.

Mr. MONDELL. The rats on the coast infected the squirrels and the squirrels infected the fleas and the fleas infected the people, and so it went on ad infinitum.

Mr. KAHN. Like the chain of events narrated in the "House that Jack built." [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. Unless you put a limitation upon these activities there is no end to them. Let us act in a reasonable way. After the discussion that has been had in committee and elsewhere, I think the work will be carried on in a reasonable way. Officials should be reminded that, with all their enthusiasm for their branch of the public service—which is a good thing, of course—they must keep their work within reasonable bounds.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Wyoming has expired.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, this item in regard to the prevention of epidemics and the appropriation of funds for the extermination of the bubonic plague has been a matter of much concern to the West and to the United States generally, and has been presented fully to the various committees of this House and of Congress heretofore; and, to my mind, there is no more important matter that the Government is dealing in, when it deals with the health of its citizens, than this matter of the extermination of the bubonic plague.

Now, my friend apparently does not understand bubonic plague. Apparently he does not understand how it is propagated and how it gets from one place to another.

Mr. MONDELL. I do not live in a country where we have any.

Mr. RAKER. That disease was brought from the Orient. We have tried to keep it out, but it is here. The people of the West have done much to exterminate it. Those rats went on the public domain, went on the forest reserves, and there was no money by which those having charge of those reserves could exterminate them. Mr. Rat bites a squirrel, and Mr. Squirrel goes into a hole, and a little boy puts his hand in to get the squirrel and gets the bubonic plague. [Laughter.]

The squirrel on the private land gets the bubonic plague from the squirrel on the Government land. That fact is shown by the report of the Department of Public Health, which is now a matter of record—a report made last year or two years ago—and hence the appropriation of $15,000 to exterminate the squirrels, the rats, and all rodents. The people of California and the people of the West may have their homes sold if they do not exterminate these rats and squirrels, but on the forest reserves and on Government land no one has the right to go and do this work except the Government officials; and when this rat or squirrel goes from place to place, spreading this death-dealing disease among the people of this country, can there be any more important task than for the Government to protect its citizens, irrespective of whether they are on the Pacific coast or in the East or in the South or in the North?

You appropriate money for the purpose of exterminating the ticks on cattle, but when the cattle get ticks they are not carried to human beings, and those ticks do not cause human beings to die. But when the bubonic plague comes in and affects the rat and the rat affects the squirrel and the boy gets it from the squirrel, the boy is killed. When the boll weevil enters the cotton it destroys it, but it does not destroy humanity. It does not destroy people. There is no more important matter pending before this House that ought to be given consideration, not only on the part of the Forest Service and on the part of those in charge of public lands and on the part of private individuals who hold private lands, than this matter of the extermination of this rodent that has been carrying the bubonic plague, upon which the people have expended so much money and from which so many lives have been lost.

I am astonished that the gentleman would hesitate one minute, knowing the extended and vast territory of the Government domain upon which we can not enter and control and upon which these rodents have been discovered for two years; I am surprised that he should for one instant say that the Government should not appropriate $200,000. It ought to be $400,000, so that there would be a sufficient number of people who are familiar and fully equipped with all the scientific knowledge they have for the purpose of destroying and eliminating this disease.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. RAKER. I yield to the gentleman.

Mr. GARNER. My only objection is that it is not stated specifically what it is to be used for. I am perfectly willing to destroy the rats and squirrels which are the indirect means of destroying human life in California and those adjoining States, but I should object to covering up the purpose for which the appropriation is made.

Mr. RAKER. It says in unmistakable language "bubonic plague." If the bubonic plague affects 1 rat, it may affect 10,000, and if it takes the entire $200,000 appropriation to catch that 1 rat and exterminate the bubonic plague in any part of this country, you ought to exterminate it and not permit that situation to extend under circumstances and in any place.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from California has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, one would be surprised, if he did not know my friend from California [Mr. RAKER], in hearing him make such a powerful speech in favor of attacking a disease which he called a "death-destroying disease." [Laughter.] I should have supposed that if we could find some disease which would destroy death——

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield right there?

Mr. MANN. We would be rather in favor of extending the disease instead of attacking it.

Mr. RAKER. I said death-dealing disease.

Mr. MANN. I can not yield. I did not interrupt the gentleman, and I have only five minutes.

The gentleman from California, having attacked a "death-destroying disease," then proceeded to attack one of the few strong friends which this item has in the House. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] had taken the floor twice in this debate for the purpose of defending the item in the bill for $200,000, and his reward for that was an attack upon him personally, made by the gentleman from California.

The truth is, Mr. Chairman, since we are asked to have the General Government go into a combat with fleas on the Pacific coast, with body lice at Galveston, and bed bugs at Vera Cruz, and now dogfish in the Atlantic Ocean, we have entered upon quite a wide scope of work. [Laughter.]

Mr. HAWLEY. We will have to do a lot of scratching. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I do not know whether there is any connection between the catching of rats in San Francisco and the catching of dogfish in the Atlantic Ocean, but I suppose that we might in some way make them work in harmony, so as to escape a part of the expense.

But here is an appropriation carried annually to enable the President, in case only of threatened or actual epidemic, to do certain work with that money; not confided to the head of the Public Health Service, but to enable the President, in case of threatened or actual epidemic, to spend this money. Now, the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER], with rare descriptive powers, told us how the boy tried to catch a rat, put his hand down in a hole, got fleas off the rat, and then the boy died. I would ask the gentleman from California [Mr. RAKER] whether he has ever known a boy in California to die from bubonic plague?

Mr. RAKER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. I will yield for an answer yes or no. I have not time for anything else. The gentleman either knows it or he does not.

Mr. RAKER. I got my information in a report from the——

Mr. MANN. The gentleman will not answer. I have not time to yield for a speech.

Mr. RAKER. Yes; and I would like to state the reason.

Mr. MANN. No; I do not want——

Mr. RAKER. I have a letter from the department, showing that two years ago——

Mr. MANN. I do not yield for a speech. If the gentleman says he has known of one boy on our Pacific coast dying from bubonic plague, I would like to ask if he has known of two?

Mr. RAKER. If the gentleman will permit——

Mr. MANN. I will permit an answer to the question.

Mr. RAKER. Oh, well——

Mr. MANN. But not a speech. Evidently the gentleman does not understand the English language.

Mr. RAKER. I understand some of it.

Mr. MANN. Then I will make use of it. I do not yield my time to the gentleman. What is it now? Is there an actual epidemic of bubonic plague on the Pacific coast? Will anyone here claim there is an actual epidemic out there? Will anyone claim there is an epidemic threatened next year, when the exposition is to be held? I should like to hear some distinguished gentleman from the Pacific coast assert that we are threatened with an epidemic plague on the Pacific coast now or next year.

And yet, notwithstanding the form of this item, which was so worded that there might be an emergency fund in the possession of the President when Congress was not in session, to combat these diseases if they came upon our shores, the Bureau of Public Health over here goes ahead and spends the money without any actual or threatened epidemic—spends it as a regular thing—until this year, when there was some danger coming from the body lice and bed bugs at Galveston, imported from Mexico, we had to make a special appropriation of $100,000 to furnish money to combat a threatened epidemic there, although we had an appropriation of $200,000, made last year for the purpose of having that fund in hand. The Public Health Service, which I usually defend, for which I have very high regard, absolutely pays no attention to the meaning of this paragraph in the appropriation bill. Of course, the auditor or comptroller can not determine whether an epidemic is threatened or not. That must be left to the head of the service, who certifies that there is, although it is not true, and there is not. We ought to have an emergency fund.

As far as I am concerned, I am perfectly willing to make an appropriation to kill off the rats on the Pacific coast and elsewhere, and to make an appropriation to kill off the bed bugs and the body lice down there where they may bring epidemic into the country. I have not fully determined in my own mind yet whether I am willing to start on a search of the whole Atlantic Ocean for the purpose of catching and tagging and killing the dog fish.

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. That has not extended to the Pacific coast.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, may I have permission to extend my remarks, to the end that I may answer a few of the questions submitted by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] which I could not answer by reason of his objections?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from California asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is going to answer my remarks, I want him to answer them here.

Mr. RAKER. You would not give me time.

Mr. MANN. I do not propose to make comments in the running debate and then have the gentleman go and think it out, figure it all over, and then try to put something smart in the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois object?

Mr. MANN. I will not object, as long as I have got these remarks into the RECORD.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Chairman, after the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois I do not desire to insert my remarks in the RECORD without making them in the House in the presence of all the Members. I never have done what the gentleman says, and I never will. I tried to answer the gentleman, and to answer him just as the facts are now within my knowledge, from the telegrams and letters and reports that were sent from many places in California two years ago.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this item is exhausted.

Mr. RAKER. I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman can get an opportunity on the next paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I suggest to the gentleman that there is another paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is closed.

Mr. RAKER. Very well.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Field investigations of public health matters: For investigations of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation and sewage, and the pollution of navigable streams and lakes of the United States, including personal service, $200,000.

Mr. BAKER. I move to strike out the last word. In answer to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] upon the bubonic-plague proposition, I wish to say that I always try to reply as courteously and in as few words as I can, and I would have done so if I had inserted a statement in the RECORD. I assure the gentleman from Illinois and the House that there would have been no improper language or anything smart from me.

Mr. MANN. I will admit that last statement.

Mr. RAKER. Well, that has two applications. Coming from the gentleman, it undoubtedly would be in both ways.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. RAKER. It is well to be pleasant as we go along and try to deal with matters as they come up.

Two years ago, when the appropriation was placed in a bill for the extermination of rats and other rodents in California, it was then a serious question, covering some 8 or 10 counties. Considerable correspondence was had between the various supervisors of these counties and the health officials and the official in charge of the Government station there, as well as with the department here.

I had the pleasure of calling on the past director and also on his successor. There were several specific cases, one particularly named and all the details given. And others had it and were cured. Now, the reason we say so little about the number and the reason we are disinclined to discuss the matter is that people do not like to send over the country the fact that there may be bubonic plague here and there. But on investigation by the best authorities of the land it did exist, and the question was how to exterminate it. If I knew now, unless it became absolutely necessary, that bubonic plague existed, I would not be willing to advertise the fact all over the country. The money that was appropriated two years ago, from my observation and inquiry since, has been well expended and good results have been attained by the department of health. They have gone out and wherever they have found any possible chance that the disease might exist they have put the best men in the field and have obtained results. But, as stated by the gentleman from Illinois, this appropriation is to be used only when there may be evidence of any dangerous contagious disease, and then the President and the department can use it for that purpose and not wait until some of our citizens have become infected with it and possibly have died. I trust this explanation, which would have been the same if I had extended my remarks in the RECORD, will be satisfactory, and that it answers the gentleman's question. I thank the House for this opportunity to make this statement. [Applause.]

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 3, after the word "including," insert the words "the investigation and eradication of the disease-carrying mosquito."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I reserve a point of order on that.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I question whether this is subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then let us have it disposed of.

Mr. MOORE. Did the gentleman reserve it or make it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve it for five minutes.

Mr. MOORE. I thank the gentleman for having reserved it. Five minutes will be enough in which to state the situation. I do not know why the gentleman wants to raise a point of order against this amendment. It does not provide for any change in the appropriation. If adopted, it would simply be a direction to the Health Bureau to make an investigation of the disease-carrying mosquito. It seems to me there is no longer an excuse for the great Health Bureau of this Government to avoid making a study of this very annoying and serious pest.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Did I understand the gentleman to say that the provision of the bill is not broad enough to include an investigation of the disease-carrying mosquito?

Mr. MOORE. I think it would be broad enough, but there is no evidence that the bureau makes any investigation of this kind.

Mr. GARNER. Is not that within the discretion of the bureau as to how they can best use the money appropriated by Congress for the benefit of humanity?

Mr. MOORE. I think that is true; but the bureau has not thus far exercised any discretion in the matter of the mosquito, and the adoption of this amendment would be a specific direction that at least would suggest to the bureau the propriety of instituting an investigation and study of the subject.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Without intending to discuss the question which the gentleman from Pennsylvania has raised, let me call his attention to the fact that this is an item which went into the bill last year for the first time. It is under the act which we passed a year or a year and a half ago, in the last Congress, extending the scope of the work of the Public Health Service, so that they probably have not had time, if they had the inclination, to go to any extent into the subject of infected mosquitoes that carry disease.

Mr. MOORE. That may be, and probably is, the fact. There are two places in the bill where this matter might be considered—in the present paragraph without making any change in the appropriation, and in the next paragraph providing for cooperation with the State and municipal health authorities in the prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases in interstate traffic. But that provision only carries $15,000, and it is very improbable that they would be able to do anything with the mosquito question under that appropriation.

Now, if the gentleman from New York will bear with me a minute, I would like to call his attention to the chronic agitation of this question. During the discussion of recent Agricultural appropriation bills I raised it, and while the present Agricultural bill was in the House—the one that is now in conference—the chairman of the committee gave notice that he did not expect hereafter to ask for any appropriation covering the investigation of the mosquito, and would undertake to see that no appropriation hereafter was made in the Agricultural bill for that purpose. That means that the desultory investigations that were made by the Department of Agriculture in certain counties in South Carolina and Louisiana will be dispensed with, and that there will be no chance for anybody to inquire into the possibility of exterminating disease-carrying mosquitoes. We discuss all sorts of questions affecting nuisances as they relate to agriculture, and as they relate to live stock; but here, unconquered, is the greatest of all human pests, the mosquito. It does not belong to any one locality or any one section of the country more than another. I have felt as large and vicious mosquitoes on the Great Lakes as I have on the New Jersey coast. They certainly are not in the Southern States alone, and they certainly are not confined to any one State. It is said by some of the Panama officials, notably Col. Gorgas, that the mosquito does not carry very far, that is to say, it is not a migratory bird, that it exists in localites; but it is omnipresent, it is everywhere. Every man and woman has at times felt it, and everyone under his or her breath damns it for the nuisance that it is.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that he be permitted to proceed for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. Why we should not say to the Health Bureau that, amongst its other investigations, it should take up that of inquiring into the propagation as well as the extermination of the mosquito I do not understand. It is not an unreasonable thing, because every Member surely and every man in the country is familiar with the annoyance that this pest brings to everyone. It is a disease-carrying insect. I have here among the papers of the Health Bureau a statement in Bulletin No. 39 with respect to mosquitoes in relation to the transmission of leprosy, and it is fairly well shown that a mosquito, sucking the blood of a leper and then lighting upon some other person who has no leprosy, may inoculate that person. I think it is very clearly and well demonstrated in our own common knowledge, to say nothing of the scientific or medical expert knowledge, that in certain cases a mosquito that bites a person suffering from a fever, lighting upon a person who has no fever, will transmit that fever. Surely that has been the situation in Panama. It was the condition that prevailed in Texas. It has aided in the carrying of yellow fever, and while we are comparatively free from those diseases now, there is no reason why our Government, and particularly this important bureau of it, should not be on guard against the possibility of this insect further carrying disease.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. MONDELL. Just what class of investigation would the gentleman have carried on?

Mr. MOORE. Whereas the State of New Jersey makes annual appropriations for the purpose of investigating and eradicating the mosquito, whereas in Pennsylvania appropriations are made, certainly in the city of Philadelphia, for the eradication of the mosquito, and whereas the mosquito will easily get over the borders of either of those States into Delaware or Maryland or New York, it would seem to me that it would be proper for the health officials of the United States to cooperate with those local authorities in the States making the appropriation for the purpose of investigating and eradicating the mosquito, with a view of giving it some national influence. A great deal of good could be done in the matter of drainage, a systematic method of draining swamps, and a systematic method of getting rid of the rain-spout nuisance, tin cans, and that sort of thing. Of course, that is local; but only since Panama and the wonderful results that have resulted from Col. Gorgas's work there have we really known how to deal with the mosquito.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. CAMPBELL. Why not make the necessary appropriation to get rid of the mosquito? Everyone knows just how that is done and how it can be done, and everyone knows that the mosquito is a dangerous pest. Why this Government should waste its time and money in further investigating the subject is a matter that I can not understand.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, answering the gentleman from Kansas, I question whether the Health Bureau of the United States has made thorough investigations of the mosquito and its effect on human life. Here is a treatise on the mosquito as it may carry leper bacilli.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania has again expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this language is wholly unnecessary. Investigations have been conducted by several branches of the Government relative to diseases of man, which have involved considerable investigation of the habits and evil propensities of mosquitoes. I do not just recall the number of various kinds of mosquitoes, but there are a great many thousand. The Public Health Service at present is making investigations and studies regarding malaria, and in that connection they make certain investigations and studies regarding mosquitoes. If I understand correctly, the purpose of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] is to have the Federal Government eventually cooperate with States in the extermination of mosquitoes. I do not believe that is a function of the Federal Government. Certain scientific investigations are properly within the Federal function, but after the Federal Government furnishes the information on which action can be taken it is the duty of the States to take action to protect their citizens.

This appropriation in the bill is in the language of the organic act, or of an act extending the authority of the Public Health Service. The act of August 14, 1912, provides—and if the Chair will follow the item in the appropriation bill he will see that the appropriation is in practically the identical language—> that the Public Health Service may study and investigate the diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including the sanitation, sewage, and pollution, directly or indirectly, of the navigable streams and lakes of the United States, and it may from time to time issue information in the way of publications for the use of the public.

That gives the Public Health Service all of the authority necessary to conduct the investigation of diseases of man and the conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof.

In the work that is being done now, and in the outline of the work for the next year, it has been pointed out by Dr. Kerr that the investigation and study of malaria has been going on since February, 1912, and by means of post cards and the sending out of little boxes with mycroscopic slides, and a little container for the mosquitoes and their larvæ, a great number of physicians in six or seven of the Southern States have been circularized, and the amount of information obtained and the amount of information furnished has been very considerable in the work of eliminating the particular types of mosquitoes that are responsible for certain diseases. The work of making that investigation is actually being conducted, so far as is desirable and necessary.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, the language used in this appropriation is broad enough to authorize the chief of the bureau to conduct any kind of an investigation that he may see proper touching diseases of man.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Diseases of man and the conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof.

Mr. GARNER. Can the gentleman from New York think of anything in the nature of a disease of man that it would not have authority under this appropriation to investigate?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not without very great effort, and I do not wish to subject myself to great effort unnecessarily.

Mr. GARNER. Well, this item was put into this bill originally, in the very language of the bill creating it, in order to give the bureau a certain amount of money to use at its own discretion.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it was not.

Mr. GARNER. Well, it has that discretion anyway, whatever the object may have been.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may have that discretion, but it was not put in there to enable it to use this money at its own discretion.

Mr. GARNER. How is the gentleman from New York going to control the manner in which it is to be used if there is authorization given them to use it within their discretion?

Mr. FITZGERALD. When the request was made for the $200,000 the Public Health Service outlined the specific work that they desired to undertake with that money. When the representatives of the Public Health Service came before the committee this year they were checked up and they were made to review the work that they had done up to that time with the appropriation that had been given to them, and it was found that they had worked along the lines that they had stated they would if the money were given. Then they were compelled to state the purposes for which they desired the money which was to be given them for the next fiscal year. The experience of the committee has been that when they make their plans and perfect their organization and are given the money to conduct a particular line of work for which they ask the money, that in good faith they so conduct it. Of course, they could under the authority engage in a different line of investigation, but they have not done so.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Under the tutelage of the gentleman from New York I have learned some very valuable lessons here with reference to confining appropriations to the purposes for which they were to be used, and that is that it is bad public policy to appropriate a lump sum when you can segregate it and designate it for the purpose for which it is to be used. Now, the gentleman from New York has said that they had a certain purpose for which this money was to be used the last fiscal year and this year and that they have checked up its use and find the money was used for the purpose for which it was intended. Now, I want to ask the gentleman this question: Why is it not good policy for the gentleman's committee to make these appropriations specific so that the Congress and the country may know the exact purposes for which it is to be used, and is not that in the interest of economy and good legislation rather than to make lump-sum appropriations and leave it entirely to the heads of the departments with unlimited power to use the money for whatever purpose they may see proper?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, sometimes it is and sometimes it is not.

Mr. GARNER. Is it merely because——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Let me finish. This is to conduct certain field investigations. It is not the same as if we had a permanent statutory force to do specific work, certain work with a certain expenditure more or less fixed. These field investigations are such that I have never been able to find out just how the money could be segregated. It may be possible, and I should welcome any assistance that could be given in that direction——

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In a moment. But I never have been able to do that, and the committee has done the next best thing. Under that authority given by law they made the request for the money. The committee made the officials of the Public Health Service outline in great detail the manner in which the work was to be done and the particular character of the work to be done. They were unable, because they had never done that kind of work, to say how much would be expended for each particular item, but as nearly as they could they estimated the sum that it would take to conduct certain investigations, and then when they came back the committee made them state what they had used and checked it up, and that is as near as we could get it.

Mr. GARNER. Now, if this appropriation is to continue in this bill, if this item is to be carried from year to year and is to become a permanent part of the sundry civil appropriation bill, let me ask the gentleman if it would not be advisable for the gentleman's committee in making up the bill next year to get the items for which it is to be used and then inform the Congress for what purpose this $200,000 is being used. I can see no reason—of course, if it is temporary, merely to go on for a year or two in order to ascertain certain information for the benefit of the State medical association or the medical people of the various States. I can realize why you should carry it in a lump-sum appropriation, but if it is to be a permanent matter, it ought to be itemized and the particular items put in for which we are appropriating.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There are some limitations upon what can be done in that respect. Here is one volume of the testimony taken on this bill. Here is another volume. Here is still another, more than 2,500 printed pages. It is utterly impossible to include the specific information in the details of the appropriation. The bill now consists of 183 pages of printed matter of an ordinary bill. The committee endeavors to obtain as complete information about all of these items as possibly can be obtained by the exercise of the utmost ingenuity, energy, and industry. All information is available to gentlemen who desire it and who will undertake to collect it from the hearings. I am expected at times to carry all this information in my head in such orderly and systematic manner that I can recite it offhand without any investigation whatever. I know how easy it is to propound questions either to those in charge of a particular service or those in charge of these bills as to the wisdom of doing something different from what is done. All I can say is that we do the best we can, and we welcome the assistance of any gentleman who will frame a paragraph to carry these appropriations in a manner that will make more effective the work of the Congress and make it more illuminative. Indeed, Mr. Chairman, if there is any possible way to so segregate these items that every Member of the House can see at a glance just what is proposed to be done with every dollar by looking at the appropriation itself, it would save those in charge of the bill interminable trouble and labor in making explanations when the bills are before the House.

We have adopted the plan that seems to be best under all the circumstances for this particular work. We find out what the money is required for. If we believe that the money is desired for work that is important and essential for the Federal Government to perform, we recommend the appropriation. When an extra request for appropriation is made we compel those in charge of the service to state what has been done with the money appropriated, checking up with their statements as to what use they put the money that was given, and then compel them to state the purposes to which they will put the additional money if it be given. The auditors and other accounting officials of the Government do their part in preventing the money being improperly expended. And that is about as near as we can come to safeguarding the expenditures of public moneys.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York make the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. MOORE. What is the point of order, if the gentleman pleases?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] what the point of order is?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman proposes to limit the authority of the department by this language, appropriating in language conferring authority upon the department, and any attempt to limit the discretion of the department in such a way is subject to a point of order. Then, the language of the gentleman's amendment is to confer a power not given now, and it is legislation.

Mr. MOORE. I understood the gentleman to make the point of order originally that the language of the amendment was not necessary. I think that is the way he stated it. I question whether that would be subject to a point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It was not necessary for certain purposes, and it was not desired to accomplish the prime object of the gentleman's amendment, which is to have the cooperation of the Federal Government with the States in the eradication of mosquitoes.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think if the Chair will examine the amendment he will find it is not only germane to the paragraph, but it does not in any way affect the question of appropriation. It does not, I think, limit the power of the bureau. It rather directs the bureau in a manner which I think Congress has authority to do.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment says "for the investigation and eradication of the disease-carrying mosquito." The paragraph to which it is offered seems to be an investigation paragraph, namely, "Field investigations of public health matters: For the investigation of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof."

Now, it would read, if the amendment of the gentleman be adopted, in addition, "Investigation and eradication of the mosquito." Does not that broaden very much the act, and in view of that, does it not go out on the point of germaneness?

Mr. MOORE. It may do it. In view of the statement of the Chair, I would ask unanimous consent to withdraw the words "and eradication."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to withdraw the words "and eradication," as proposed in his amendment. Is there objection?

Mr. FITZGERALD. What does the gentleman ask?

Mr. MOORE. I ask to modify the amendment by striking out the words "and eradication," merely specifying "and investigation."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, let it be reported.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment by striking out the words "and eradication" so that it will read "the investigation of the disease-carrying mosquito."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order against the amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. What is the point of order of the gentleman from New York on that? The Chair has indicated that he thought it was subject to a point of order so long as the words "and eradication" were included, because that was much broader than the question of investigation. But the gentleman has withdrawn that, there being no objection. The Chair is inclined to think it is not subject to a point of order now, but will hear the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD].

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there may be disease-carrying mosquitoes which carry diseases that affect not only human beings but all kinds of animals. Of course, there is no authority for such an investigation. It broadens immensely the power of the Public Health Service.

Mr. MOORE. The question is whether that is not begging the question, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The paragraph will read, if amended by the amendment as modified:

> For investigation of diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including the investigation of the disease-carrying mosquito——

Mr. FOSTER. Mr. Chairman, that broadens the scope.

The CHAIRMAN. In what respect?

Mr. FOSTER. Because we may have disease-bearing mosquitoes that are not confined to human beings, and then this investigation of diseases and influencing propagation——

Mr. FITZGERALD. It may not be "influencing the propagation and spread thereof." Of course, if it does not broaden in any way the authority of the Public Health Service, it is in order. But I am not sufficiently learned in the scientific side of this matter to be able so to state. This appropriation is in the language of the law conferring authority upon the Public Health Service. If it does not broaden the authority, the gentleman would not desire it. If he wishes to give them an authority they do not now possess, then I can understand his anxiety to have the amendment adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Then it is the opinion of the gentleman from New York that it would be a change of existing law? Does the Chair so understand the gentleman?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will state frankly I am not sufficiently acquainted with the scientific aspects of the matter to know. But if it broadens the authority, it is a change of law; if it does not, there is no necessity for it.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from New York permit the Chair to ask if he understands correctly if the language in this bill is the language of the act conferring the power?

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, there is in the original law, as read by the gentleman from Illinois, the words "directly or indirectly" after the word "pollution."

Mr. FITZGERALD. The law is:

> The Public Health Service may study or investigate the diseases of man and conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, including sanitation and sewage, and pollution, either directly or indirectly, of navigable streams and lakes of the United States.

Directly or indirectly, it refers to the pollution of navigable streams and lakes. The phrase "directly or indirectly" refers to the pollution of navigable streams and lakes.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman contend that the bureau could not under this paragraph make an investigation as to the effect of the rat bite, for instance?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The what?

Mr. MOORE. The rat bite. I know the gentleman is not familiar with it, coming from his section of the country. But does he mean to say that the bureau would have the power to investigate the propagation and effect of any nuisance that related to the diseases of man?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That refers to the investigation of conditions influencing the propagation and spread of the diseases of man. They have that authority.

Mr. MOORE. Then the bureau would have power to investigate as to the effect of a bed bug?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. I make no admission now as to that.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman was claiming for the paragraph and for the existing law that the bureau already had all necessary authority, and I asked the gentleman whether in any particular——

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is the language that confers the authority. If they have the authority to do what the gentleman desires, of course there is no reason why he should be particularly anxious to have his amendment adopted. But if he is trying to give them some authority they have not at present, then I can understand the gentleman's anxiety to have his amendment adopted. But we could not change the organic act by the insertion of certain language that was not included in it.

Mr. MOORE. This is the place to do it, I submit to the gentleman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; it is not. There is no authority to confer any additional power upon anyone in this appropriation bill. We are merely appropriating to carry out the service that is already authorized.

Mr. MOORE. May I ask the gentleman this—I tried to ask him twice while he had the time—whether the bureau has availed itself of the opportunity or the power that the gentleman contends it already has under this paragraph, to investigate the diseases of man and the conditions influencing the propagation and spread thereof, as that propagation and spread thereof may arise from the bite of a mosquito?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They have made some investigation of malaria.

Mr. MOORE. Apparently the bureau has not availed itself of the opportunity that the gentleman refers to.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It has. The gentleman will see to what extent if he will read the statement in the hearings.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I hope the Chair will pardon me for making a statement in regard to this matter, but as I am the author of the law, I think I am justified in expressing an opinion in regard to it—not that I think that opinion is binding.

We have had long and continued hearings before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in reference to the extension of the service now called the "Public Health Service." In the Sixty-first Congress I drew the language which is in the law, and which is practically repeated in this bill, and I had the support of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], who followed me as chairman of that committee, and introduced the same bill and secured its passage in the last Congress.

The intention was—and I think it is shown, or I would not say that was the intention—in general language to confer upon the Public Health Service the broadest power that the General Government has or could exercise in reference to diseases of man and the spread and propagation thereof, and also in reference to the pollution of water supply and the handling of sewage.

Now, I take it that it would be perfectly proper to appropriate for one of these items and not for all of them. It would be in order to make an appropriation for an investigation of the diseases of man, and stop there. It would be in order to make an investigation of the conditions influencing the propagation of the diseases of man, and stop there. It would be in order to make an investigation of sanitation or of sewage or of the pollution of navigable streams or of the pollution of lakes. It would be in order to make an investigation of a particular disease, I think, by a specific appropriation, and it is not unlikely that in the end, with more information, Congress may determine to differentiate the appropriations and make them for particular things, as suggested by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], rather than in the form of a general appropriation.

If the Chairman will pardon me, I am interested in the investigation of the pollution of lake waters, and I recently introduced a bill, prepared by the Public Health Service, to forbid the dumping of sewage in the lakes anywhere until it had been in some way purified, and to require on board vessels the use of water which was sterilized in some way. Now, I think it would be quite within the power of the House to order an investigation of those particular matters if it wished to. It might order an investigation and make a specific appropriation for an investigation or the study of the effect of dumping sewage from vessels in lake transportation.

I myself think, therefore, while not remembering the exact form of the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE], that his amendment would be in order, although I think it is wholly unnecessary, and I shall not vote for it if it is submitted to the House, because up to date I do not think we can afford to divide up the appropriation. The Public Health Service has the power now, without the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. They can use the appropriation for that purpose, and, so far, I think it has been the design of Congress to permit them to exercise, at least in the first instance and for the present, their judgment as to how the money should be expended for these different items for which we might appropriate and which they might expend.

The CHAIRMAN. After hearing the statement of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], the Chair has this tentative view of the matter: The question of whether or not the object specified is necessary has nothing to do with the question whether or not it is in order. But it does seem to the Chair that, considering what we have in the statute, if the amendment does not broaden the statute, it is not necessary, and if it does broaden it, it is legislation on an appropriation bill, which is forbidden under the rule, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK and Mr. MOORE rose.

Mr. MOORE. I move, Mr. Chairman, to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Kansas rise?

Mr. MURDOCK. I intended to do the same thing.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to pursue this matter much further this afternoon, although, inasmuch as we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars, possibly millions, for the investigation and eradication of animal diseases, I believe it is important that we should spend a little public money for cooperation with the States that are undertaking to inquire into and suppress the diseases that affect the life and health of man. We are prodigal in our generosity in taking care of the hogs and the cattle and the horses, all of which may be very good, and most of which I approve; but it does seem anomalous that when a specific direction is proposed in Congress instructing one of the Government's bureaus to inquire into and, if possible, to eradicate, or at least recommend means for the eradication of one of the greatest of all pests to human comfort and human life, we can not manage to make that direction or to make a specific appropriation for that purpose. Now, why should we not tell the Bureau of Health that, in view of the fact that they have $200,000 to spend for inquiries into certain diseases affecting the health and the life of man that a part of it shall be applied to an inquiry concerning one of the greatest of all the pests from which mankind and womankind suffer? That the Bureau of Health is not giving this matter specific attention is amply demonstrated. We have volumes of reports relating to inquiries into other matters. We have numerous brochures pertaining to the investigation of leprosy and to the investigation of trachoma and of fevers of one kind or another, but we can not get the bureau, under any direction of Congress, to make a specific inquiry into the matter of the mosquito, which perhaps carries as much disease as any other insect known. Why, around these very quarantine stations for which we are making appropriations in this bill, most of which are on waterways and along coast lines, they have these pests in their worst form. I know of several of them along the Atlantic seaboard where it is almost impossible for the physicians themselves to live in comfort, and yet we can not direct them to make an inquiry as to the suppression of this pest.

No one State can control this situation. New Jersey has been liberal in its appropriations to drain swamps and to clear up streams and to make the water flow and to make it sweet in order that the mosquito larvæ will not thrive. Pennsylvania makes similar appropriations; Delaware to a certain extent, I understand, does it. Maryland and all these States along the southern coast line are affected. They have them down along the coast of the Carolinas. In the Canadian wilds men are driven out of camps because of the mosquitoes. It is patent that a mosquito will carry disease from a diseased person to a well person. I happen to have before me one report, the only one I can now lay hands on, from the Bureau of Health itself, handed to me by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON], in which reference is made to the leprosy-carrying qualities of the mosquito. This pertains only to the carrying of the leprosy bacilli. Not having time to go any further into this I will close by one quotation from this official report of the Government:

In the mosquito—

It says—

we have an insect that has a wide range of distribution and is often abundant. This insect feeds by puncturing the skin whenever uncovered, but more often on the face, and fills itself with blood. It later bites another person, who often mashes the blood-filled insect and thus smears the blood contained in the insect upon his own skin. This act is followed by rubbing and scratching such puncture.

That pertains to the carrying of leprosy bacilli. Now, how does it affect you or any one of your family who, having been bitten by a disease-carrying mosquito, which has bitten some infected person, rubs a stocking or some other garment into the bitten spot? There is a chance for blood poisoning, if nothing else. I have known of cases where scratching an infected or dirty garment into a skin punctured by a mosquito has resulted in blood poisoning and death. None of us escapes the irritation of the mosquito bite, it endangers the life of the individual because it tends to drive the disease germs into the system. Blood poisoning, yellow fever, malaria, or other diseases may result. I will not say bubonic plague, because it seems that that comes from the rat and the flea, but the mosquito carries its menace just as freely, and with a greater field to work in perhaps than any other one of the pests for the suppression of which we are making constant and large appropriations.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman's remarks are a very emphatic argument in favor of the motto, "Don't scratch." [Laughter.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. There is a very wide scope of activity under this paragraph, as I find from the hearings. They have investigated the matter of the effect of the mercury light upon the health of men and stock. I also notice in the hearings the statement that an investigation was made of polluted water. At some particular point in the South, but I do not remember at this time where, it was found that near a particularly thriving oyster bed there was a sewer. The local authorities knew that the oysters were infected with typhoid, and they prohibited the local sale of the oysters. An investigation was made by the Federal Public Health Bureau, colon bacilli were found, and it was found that these oysters were shipped from the place where their sale was prohibited to other places in other States for sale. Here is an appropriation of $200,000, and as a result of the expenditure of it a known evil is found. Now, what remedy follows the discovery of the condition which I have stated?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the publication of the information about the infection of these oysters on the Gulf has been pretty widely disseminated.

Mr. MURDOCK. Can the gentleman give me the practical application of that process? When these infected oyster beds were found, were bulletins issued and was the information given to the oyster trade?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know.

Mr. MURDOCK. Ought not that to have been done by the Public Health Bureau?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can not tell the gentleman just what they did about it. I had this experience a few years ago: There is a gentleman in New York who is one of the most successful hotel men over there, noted for the very high character of the table at the houses conducted by him. He stated that at one time there was some complaint about the flavor of the Lynn Haven oyster which he was serving in his hotel. He wrote to the Department of Agriculture, calling attention to the fact, and asked if they could give him any information. The Department of Agriculture sent a man who made an inspection.

Mr. MURDOCK. Under the pure-food law?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think so. They found that the demand for Lynn Haven oysters was so great that the supply was inadequate, so that oystermen in that locality were bringing oysters from other places and planting them for a brief period, a week or two, and shipping them out as Lynn Haven oysters. That information was furnished to him, and very quickly spread among men who were interested in the purchasing of high-grade oysters, and I think it had the effect of stopping that practice.

An investigation of this kind is usually made the subject of a special report which is sent out. The public health authorities are keeping pretty close track of such matters.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman agrees that it ought to have been done in that case?

Mr. FITZGERALD. The local authorities prohibited the sale of those oysters in the town, and as they could not sell them in the town they shipped them off to some other locality where apparently they had no knowledge of this condition.

Mr. MURDOCK. If that practice was continued and the sewage was not cleaned up——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think under the pure-food law they would have ample authority to stop the shipment of any such infected oysters.

Mr. MURDOCK. Would there be cooperation between the Health Department and the Department of Agriculture in an instance of that kind?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think there is cooperation.

Mr. LEVER. I think there is, without doubt.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have no doubt that they cooperate and furnish whatever information they have freely.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman knows that the Agricultural Department has prosecuted a number of cases for shipping bad oysters?

Mr. MURDOCK. I knew of that, but I did not know whether the prosecutions arose out of investigations under this paragraph. I did not know whether the discovery was made by the Public Health Bureau under the provisions contained in this paragraph.

Mr. MANN. All they would have to do would be to communicate with the Department of Agriculture.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interstate quarantine service: For cooperation with State and municipal health authorities in the prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases in interstate traffic, $15,000.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 44, line 9, after the word "traffic," insert "and the spread of the mosquito nuisance."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make a point of order against the amendment. This appropriation is contained in the language of section 3 of the act of February 15, 1893:

That the Surgeon General of the Marine Hospital Service shall * * * in the execution and enforcement of the rules and regulations made by the Secretary of the Treasury to prevent the introduction of contagious and infectious disease over the United States from foreign countries, and into one State or Territory or the District of Columbia from another State or Territory or the District of Columbia.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, is that existing law, or is the gentleman reading from a report of the Treasury Department?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a provision of the law which is contained in the hearings taken by the committee last year. It is section 3 of the act of February 15, 1893, and is law.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I think the amendment is germane to the paragraph. I understood that the gentleman was reading from a ruling by the Secretary of the Treasury, but he states that he was reading from the law. There is nothing objectionable to the law in my amendment. The Chair ruled against my other amendment a moment ago, and it may be consistent to hold to that ruling, but it seems to me that it is germane and does not affect the existing law, so as to be subject to the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair may have been in error in ruling on the amendment a few moments ago, but it occurred to the Chair that it was a dangerous precedent to begin to let into the organic law specific things. Next year there would be another, and next year another, and it seemed to the Chair as there was some doubt it ought to be resolved in favor of the maintenance of the organic act without additions. But, whether right or wrong, the Chair thinks this is clearly out of order because the paragraph refers to diseases in the quarantine service. The paragraph reads:

Interstate quarantine service: For cooperation with State and municipal health authorities in the prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases in interstate traffic, $15,000—and if the gentleman's amendment were adopted "and the spread of the mosquito nuisance." That would be without any reference as to whether it was a disease-carrying mosquito or simply a mosquito that is a common nuisance. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the figures "15,000," in line 9, page 44, and insert the figures "100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 44, line 9, by striking out "15,000" and inserting "100,000."

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, the paragraph reads:

For cooperation with State and municipal health authorities in the prevention of the spread of contagious and infectious diseases in interstate traffic.

Now, it is possible that under this paragraph the bureau would have the same power which the gentleman from New York indicated it would have in the preceding paragraph, without specific direction as to any particular insect-breeding disease. If that is so, $15,000 would be a ridiculous amount with which to have the Government cooperate in the various States in the prevention of the spread of infectious diseases in interstate traffic, and so forth.

It might require some little stretch of the imagination, but I think it would not be necessary to do that to show that the mosquito, so far as carrying disease is concerned, is an interstate pest; that is to say, it could easily fly across the river or creek forming the boundary line of a State, and it could carry disease from one State to another and thus become interstate. In view of the fact that $15,000 would not be sufficient for the Bureau of Health to enter upon any inquiry of this kind, it seems to me that if the bureau exercised the authority which the gentleman from New York says they would have power to exercise under the preceding paragraph, they ought to have a little more money, and that is the purpose of my amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I hope the amendment will not prevail. The appropriation recommended in the item is the amount requested by the Public Health Service. The money is used for a purpose entirely foreign to the object in the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania. This money is used for the purpose of securing proper and suitable drinking water and ice upon railroad trains and boats engaged in interstate traffic, and is being used also for the purpose of endeavoring to perfect some device by which facilities on railroad trains will be installed so as to prevent the scattering of fecal discharges and human waste over the tracks, but retain and remove it in a proper manner. This is what the Public Health Service desires, and this is all the money it could use. It could not use it for the purpose desired by the gentleman if the amount named in the gentleman's amendment should be agreed to. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. GILLETT. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. From the time of Plutarch, and I presume earlier, down to the present time, one of the most interesting things to the student has been to compare historical characters and facts and to note how history repeats itself. Members of this House are at least students of political history, and in an humble way we are makers of political history, and so it seems to me it might be interesting in just a word to point out a precedent which was brought to my mind by the proceedings upon this bill a day or two ago. It brought back a speech which I read years ago and which, I thought, was in Benton's Thirty Years' View. Yesterday I used my leisure in looking all through that work, but could not find that speech. My recollection is that it was by John Randolph, about a century ago, and that what he said was much as follows: "Certain ingenious mechanics in Europe have been enabled to construct out of wood a little machine or toy which utters at intervals with excellent imitation of human speech the word 'cuckoo.' A gentleman of this House has imitated that wooden machine, and with the exercise of just about the same amount of intelligence has at intervals interrupted and delayed the business of this House by reiterating the parrotlike words, 'The previous question, Mr. Speaker.'"

I do not mean that this language of Mr. Randolph was at all an accurate analogy of what has happened here, but it struck me it was near enough to be interesting historically, as well as intrinsically amusing, and so I thought I would take a moment of the time of the House to recall it, with also the hope that some Member might authenticate my recollection and refer me to the exact quotation.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For equipping the tower telescope of the Astrophysical Observatory on Mount Wilson, Cal., including the necessary incidental expenses, to be immediately available, $2,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I see this item is for the purpose of equipping the tower telescope of the Astrophysical Observatory on Mount Wilson, Cal. I had supposed that that was probably in connection with examinations of the sun and the sun spots, but this morning I was told that up to last night the registration in California by parties showed a Republican registration of something over 165,000 higher than the Democratic registration, which greatly exceeded, also, the Progressive registration, and I was not sure but that this telescope was for the purpose of seeing if one could discover by the aid of a powerful telescope any prospect for either the Democrats or the Progressives in California.

Mr. GARNER. Does not the gentleman know that they do not always vote the way they register?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was under the impression that perhaps the telescope was used to ascertain whether by any possibility any of the occurrences depicted by the official "S. O. S.'s" of the Republican and Progressive Parties actually occurred, but the largest telescopes in existence in this country have disclosed no unusual or unseemly conditions.

Mr. MANN. But this telescope that is applied to this purpose will discover to an expectant Democratic country that the registration in California now shows that there are 165,000 more Republicans registered than there are Democrats, and really, you know, that is going some.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, let me suggest to the gentleman that he should not flatter himself too highly upon that. My personal experience in politics has demonstrated that the relation between the enrolled party vote and the vote for the party ticket is sometimes very painfully disappointing.

Mr. MANN. That is very often the case, especially when the registration has been a good while ahead; but this registration is down to date, and it is now going on. It is for the purpose of permitting the people who are registered to vote this fall, and while I can understand how some Democrats may prefer to register as Republicans, and how some Progressives may prefer to register as Republicans, so that they will not meet the contumely of being called Democrats or Progressives, still I imagine that the number of such would not be so very great in California.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My experience has been that it is always more profitable to discuss elections after the ballots are cast than before. Judging from the experience of the Republican Party in 1912, I should imagine that the gentleman from Illinois had reached the same conclusion.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman may have found it more profitable to discuss elections after the election rather than before; but I have heard him discuss the elections before on more numerous occasions than I have after, and I expect to continue to enjoy the benefit of that in the future.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My practice has been to state the fundamental and inalienable truths upon which the Democratic Party invites the support and cooperation of the patriotic people of the country——

Mr. MANN. It will take a telescope to find them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And then to accept with complete contentment and satisfaction the result, knowing that truth will prevail, virtue will triumph, and the Democratic Party be successful.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, while it is quite natural that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], in view of the condition of the registration in California, should conclude that this equipment for the observatory at Mount Wilson was for the purpose of discovering the minute remainder of the Democratic and Progressive Parties, the fact is that the gentleman is mistaken. Mount Wilson is a dry climate, well above the clouds, and is equipped with a very high-powered telescope. It is hoped that with the equipment provided for in this paragraph, that telescope may be made powerful enough to discover a little of the increased prosperity which we have been promised under this Democratic administration. It is not visible to the naked eye from any point within the territory of the United States, and it is but natural that we should endeavor to equip the most powerful telescope in the world, most advantageously located to see a long distance and discover small objects, for the purpose of finding, if possible, some evidence, some small fragment, of this increase of prosperity which we were promised. It has been hoped also that we might catch a view, if only in a nebulous form, of some evidences of the new freedom other than psychological evidences of it. Of course almost all of us agree that it will probably be utterly impossible even with the aid of this powerful telescope, fully equipped and put in most perfect condition, to discover any particle of Democratic prosperity or of increased prosperity under this Democratic administration. Indeed we know it will reveal great voids and breaks in the prosperity which existed when our Democratic friends took charge of the ship of state, but still it is our duty to try and do so, and therefore the minority join with the majority in this appropriation.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman think $2,000 for this telescope will be sufficient to reveal all the gentleman has in mind and also find the reduced cost of living that was promised the people by the Democratic administration?

Mr. MONDELL. Well, if that matter was discussed in the committee, I am sure there was not a member of the committee who had the slightest idea we could raise this item high enough or equip this telescope so powerfully as to be able to discover the reduced cost of living. I think about everyone has concluded that it is nonexistent, and while this telescope will search out the most attenuated and nebulous thing in the world, and, therefore, it was hoped we would catch a glimpse of the beneficial effect of the new freedom or increased prosperity, no one, not even the optimistic Democratic chairman of the committee, believes we could hope to catch any sight or glimmer of the reduced cost of living.

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have been very much astonished at the distinguished gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] and other gentlemen on that side of the House who seek to find comfort out of hard-luck stories. Is it possible that they would like to go into partnership with famine? Is it possible that news of misfortune is a comfort to them? Do ill winds blow good to gentlemen on the other side? I am astonished, as I said, especially when the gentlemen are speaking of long-distance views. In the Middle West, and especially in the great State of Kansas, the greatest prosperity that was ever known in the history of the whole region is at hand.

Mr. GARNER. Actually exists.

Mr. TAGGART. The harvest is ripening in Kansas, and 175,000,000 bushels of wheat is about to be gathered in.

Mr. MONDELL. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. TAGGART. I will.

Mr. MONDELL. Does the gentleman take credit for his party for the splendid crop in Kansas?

Mr. TAGGART. No; I do not take any personal credit for it. I just was getting ready to rebuke the gentleman for claiming to be a part of Nature & Co. for 40 years. If you are telling the truth about that combination, I wish to advise you that the firm has been reorganized in Kansas and the Republican Party is not now a part of it. [Applause on the Democratic side.] The Midas touch of the harvest sun is turning its fields to gold, and the price is just as good as it was a year and two years ago, and the price is better than the average price has been for the past 10 years. If the whole United States Army were disbanded to-morrow in the wheat fields of Kansas, they would not supply the demand for labor. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Speaking of telescopes, the celebrated President Percival Lowell, of Harvard, who was the Mars professor at that great university, for a number of years studying the planet Mars, incidentally remarked in one of his magazine articles that if they had a telescope on Mars of the same power as the one at Flagstaff, Ariz., they could see the color come and go on the wheat fields of Kansas. [Applause on the Democratic side.] Talk about advertisements and prosperity and telescopes! I want to say Kansas has indeed reached the stars, if a telescope is there; but I am astonished that gentlemen would hear of bad luck and be glad of it; hear of misfortune and announce it as a prophecy of their success. Why, I should think the gentleman from Wyoming would be comforted. Wool has gone up. [Laughter.] The gentleman mourned a year ago as though he never would be comforted; but let him be of good cheer. I believe the shepherd on the plains of Wyoming has learned something, and it is this: Three or four years ago wool was worth 11 cents a pound and it had exactly 11 cents a pound tariff on it. He has learned the tariff was worth to him precisely the difference between 11 cents and 11 cents. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The brilliant gentleman [Mr. MONDELL] will not tell us there is anything the matter with Wyoming. There is a city in Wyoming that has gone forward in the last two years, for the size of it, faster than any other city in the United States, and that is no place else but Casper, right in the heart of the gentleman's own State.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, the Democratic Party and its policies have not had anything to do with it.

Mr. TAGGART. Does the gentleman wish to vouch for how much the Republican Party has had to do with it? The gentleman's party certainly has not been performing miracles in the last 14 months, has it? [Applause on the Democratic side.] I thought you ceased to perform on or about the 5th day of March a year ago. Certainly you have not done anything for Casper lately in the Republican Party. I do not know we have done anything for that town in the Democratic Party, and I do want to say to you that nothing is the matter with Wyoming, and I am sorry to see the gentleman talk as if there were. There is nothing the matter with Kansas; it is all right; and whenever you see 3,000 or 4,000 men standing upon Pennsylvania Avenue in the city of Washington, watching the bulletins or something of that kind, either Johnson, of Kansas, is pitching, or Funston, of Kansas, is fighting. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Or TAGGART, of Kansas, is talking.

Mr. TAGGART. And MANN, of Illinois, is troubled. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MANN. Well, that is an unkind fling.

Mr. TAGGART. No; there is no hard-luck story from the Middle West. It has prospered as it never did before. If the wheat of Kansas was ground into flour, it would make 75 pounds of flour for every man, woman, and child in the United States and would keep all the people of the United States alive for 12 months if nothing else grew. Talk about prosperity—turn your telescope our way. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

For continuing the preservation, exhibition, and increase of collections from the surveying and exploring expeditions of the Government, and from other sources, including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees, and all other necessary expenses, $300,000, of which sum $5,500 may be used for necessary drawings and illustrations for publications.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, this is an item providing for survey and exploring expeditions. It reminds me that the gentleman from Kansas has just been exploring all over the earth and as far as the planet Mars. The curious thing about the gentlemen on the other side is that whenever you refer to the effects of the present condition of the country they say we "are howling calamity."

It is unfortunate for us all that whenever one mentions conditions under Democratic administrations he mentions conditions so far as those conditions are affected by the policy of the party that are unfortunate, and to that extent it is calamity. That is not our fault. That is the fault of the party whose policies bring calamity, and they can not blame us if we call attention to the conditions which they have produced.

Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. TAGGART] evidently did not listen to what I said, for he suggested that I was talking calamity, and he would give the House to understand that I talked about hard times in my own State. I have not discussed conditions in Wyoming at all, although it is an unfortunate fact that we have seen no new prosperity under this Democratic administration; we have lost some of the prosperity we had. There is not an industry in that State that is prosperous, except in the Casper district, to which the gentleman refers, where the Almighty has given us a great oil field.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. And even the Democratic Party can not prevent these great wells of oil in the vicinity of Casper from bringing prosperity to us.

Mr. GARNER. Does the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. Our flockmasters last year took a loss of about 6 cents a pound on all their wool by reason of the threat of Democratic tariff legislation. There has been a slight increase over the extreme low price of last year, and that seems to be the only glimmer of light on the Democratic horizon, that the cost of living in the matter of wool has increased. Although they promised us a lower cost of living, they now make a virtue of the fact that the cost of living has increased.

Mr. GARNER. Now will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will.

Mr. GARNER. I have always understood that the greatest industry in the gentleman's State is the stock industry?

Mr. MONDELL. It is.

Mr. GARNER. Including cattle, horses, and sheep. Now, if that information is correct, I can not understand how it is that the gentleman's State is not as prosperous, if not more so, now in that industry than at any time in the history of the State, because it is certainly so in Texas, where that industry predominates. We have the highest prices that we have had in the history of the country, the highest price for wool in 10 years, and the highest prices for horses and mules.

Mr. MANN. Angora sheep wool, you mean?

Mr. GARNER. No, sir. How it is that in the great State of Wyoming the industries of cattle and sheep raising can be depressed I can not understand.

Mr. MONDELL. It is true that the Democratic prophecy of a lower cost of living has not——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that I may have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. The Democratic prophecy of a lower cost of living has not been fulfilled. And all the gentlemen from the mid-West now are making a virtue of the fact that the prophecy has not been fulfilled. They promised the consumers of the country lower prices and cheaper living. They say that condition has not arrived as yet; that, as a matter of fact, the cost of living has not gone down; and that is supposed to be an excellent argument in the agricultural districts of the West. The fact is, referring again to wool, the wool producer of the country, whatever price he may be receiving, is receiving less by 5 or 6 cents a pound than he would receive if we had the duty that we had under the Payne bill. And that is evidenced by the fact that for a series of years under the Payne bill the price of wool in the country was from 5½ to 7½ cents a pound above the price of a like foreign product. In other words, the tariff on the fine wools gave us an increased price of from 5 to 6 cents. While it is true that foreign wools have increased in value, that our wool clip has decreased in quantity, and that those two things have increased the price above the very low price of last year, the fact still remains that wool is lower than it was on the average under Republican protection and very much lower than it would be to-day if it were protected.

But I did not originally rise to talk about hard conditions. I arose to call attention to the fact that we are so anxious to view the prosperous conditions which we have been promised and which the gentleman insists exist in Kansas that we are willing to still further improve the best telescope in the country for the purpose of getting a glimpse of it. Kansas wheat fields are yellow, ripening for the harvest. Even the Democratic administration, even Democratic policy, can not prevent the falling of the "former and the latter rain," and can not take from the fertility of the Kansas soil, thank God. Even Democratic policies can not wholly discourage the hardy flockmaster and herdsman of the mountain West, and so we are not spending our time bewailing the situation. I have not even referred to it so far as it affects my people locally, but we know what it is, and in November the people will record their judgment in that matter. [Applause on the Republican side.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

National Zoological Park: For continuing the construction of roads, walks, bridges, water supply, sewerage, and drainage; and for grading, planting, and otherwise improving the grounds; erecting and repairing buildings and inclosures; care, subsistence, purchase, and transportation of animals; including salaries or compensation of all necessary employees; and general incidental expenses not otherwise provided for, including purchase, maintenance, and driving of horses and vehicles required for official purposes, not exceeding $100 for the purchase of necessary books and periodicals, payment in advance for subscriptions, and exclusive of architect's fees or compensation, $100,000; one half of which sum shall be paid from the revenues of the District of Columbia and the other half from the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There is an incident that I do not think should be passed without some reference to it in the House. I remember some years ago a gentleman on the floor of this House denounced in unmeasured language Dr. Langley, then the Secretary of the Smithsonian Institution, for the improper and gross extravagance of expenditure of money in the effort to find a flying machine. It is said, though I do not vouch for the statement, that that speech really broke Dr. Langley's heart.

Mr. FITZGERALD. And he also sought to discredit the Committee on Appropriations for supporting Dr. Langley.

Mr. MANN. My recollection is that that committee was the Committee on Military Affairs, and that Dr. Langley had gotten his money from the Army.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That money was provided out of the appropriation for the Board of Ordnance experimental funds, carried in the fortifications bill.

Mr. MANN. Well, I am very glad to be corrected in that regard, because I had carried the impression that, it being a military appropriation, it came from the Committee on Military Affairs. To have done the work that Dr. Langley was doing, a rather tender and sensitive soul that he was, and then to be charged on the floor of the House of Representatives with this reprehensible use of the money was really too much for him, and it undoubtedly hastened his death. Some people outside of the House very often take too seriously statements of that kind which were made in the House.

However, I rose just now to call the attention of the House to the fact that the original flying machine constructed by Dr. Langley which when it made the effort to fly, through some mistake or accident in sending it off, fell into the river, was taken out and placed in the Smithsonian Institution or in the National Museum and under their control, and recently was turned over for experimental purposes, I believe, to Mr. Glenn H. Curtis, and he flew it. He flew with the original Langley machine. And in view of the fact that this expenditure of money was so bitterly denounced only a few years ago, after this flying machine at that time had not flown, it seemed to me proper to print in the RECORD also, for any curious and enterprising minds hereafter, the statement that it was said on the floor of the House in the course of time that the original machine of Dr. Langley had proved its efficiency by actually flying in the air.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is it not to the credit of Congress that Congress did appropriate the money, despite the protests, just as previously Congress had appropriated money to try out the electric telegraph?

Mr. MANN. I think really that Congress ought often to get credit where it gets denunciation, because we do constantly appropriate money for experimental and scientific purposes the results of which are of great benefit to the world. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I wish to emphasize what the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] has just said in regard to the Langley flying machine by calling attention to the fact that not only did that machine, in exactly the form in which Prof. Langley attempt a flight, fly successfully, but that it carried, in addition to the pilot, a weight of something like 300 pounds, I think it was, in the way of pontoons, it having been launched from the waters at Hammondsport, N. Y.; so that it was a much better machine than Prof. Langley ever hoped or believed it to be.

Mr. Chairman, I want in this connection to call attention to the fact that there was an estimate made for an appropriation of $50,000 to continue investigations along the line of aeronautics under the Smithsonian Institution. The committee did not see fit to grant that item. I shall not offer an amendment to insert it, but I think it would have been well if the committee had seen fit to insert language in the bill desired by the secretary of the Smithsonian Institution under which the President would have been authorized to direct the cooperation of the Departments of War, Navy, Agriculture, and Commerce in experimental work. The Director of the Smithsonian Institution was of the opinion that with authority given for that kind of cooperation some valuable results could be obtained. The committee did not see fit to insert either the appropriation or the language. I think it would have been well to have done so. I believe it is highly important that we should, in the near future, provide under some scientific bureau of the Government some means for further experiments and investigations with regard to heavier-than-air machines.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. COOPER] moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. COOPER. Mr. Chairman, I want to say one word on this subject of the Langley flying machine. Of course, I do not wish to dispute—because I have not the facts at first knowledge to dispute—the claims now being put forth in the papers so frequently and with much earnestness that Prof. Langley invented a machine that would fly. Nevertheless it did not fly in his lifetime. We know that, and we also know that the man who is alleged recently to have made it fly was the enemy, at least in litigation, of the Wright brothers, who the world has always heretofore said were the inventors of the first successful flying machine.

I myself would have felt much more certain that a machine which would fly had been invented before the Wright brothers made their successful flight, if the model had not been given to Mr. Glenn Curtis, who had a bitterly contested lawsuit with the Wrights as to the invention of the flying machine. I would not detract from any honors due Prof. Langley, but I think that the living, the Wrights, who for 12 years labored, despite criticism and ridicule—some of it very bitter—of their efforts, should have the credit that is due them, rather than to have it now said that Mr. Glenn H. Curtis, who denied that the Wrights invented a machine, has flown a machine that failed during the lifetime of the man who made it.

I read recently in a newspaper that this Langley model had some few things done to it before it was flown by Mr. Curtis, but that these were not important. I do not know what they were. However, with no desire, as I have said, to detract at all from the honors justly due to any other persons, I do think that the Wright brothers ought to be protected in the claims which they have established in the courts as the inventors of the first successful flying machine.

The CHAIRMAN. The pro forma amendment is withdrawn. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all other authorized expenditures necessary in the execution of laws to regulate commerce, $910,000, of which sum there may be expended not exceeding $50,000 in the employment of counsel, not exceeding $3,000 for the purchase of necessary books, reports, and periodicals, not exceeding $1,500 for printing other than that done at the Government Printing Office, not exceeding $100 in the open market for the purchase of office furniture similar in class or kind to that listed in the general supply schedule, and not exceeding $65,000 may be expended for rent of buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of asking the chairman of the committee a question, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Chairman, this is the only department of the Government of such proportions where the salaries of the officials and employees are not carried in the legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill. I wanted to ask the chairman of the committee if the committee had ever considered the question of carrying these salaries of clerks and other employees in this department, and the commissioners themselves, in the legislative appropriation bill, in the manner in which other departments of the Government are provided for?

Mr. FITZGERALD. To my knowledge it never has. It is not a Government department. When it was created it was at first carried in this bill, and it was thought desirable to keep the statutory salaries with the other expenditures in the same bill, so as to have them all under observation.

Mr. GARNER. I notice in this item, now, for instance, there is $910,000 carried. That is an unusually large sum to turn over to any department of the Government to be expended for employees. Now, it is a usual thing—and I call the gentleman's attention to the fact—that his committee reports each year appropriations for the various departments of the Government, itemizing the clerks in various classes and the heads of the various bureaus in the departments, and undertakes to advise Congress just exactly as to the number and character of the employees provided for.

Mr. FITZGERALD. All that information is contained in the Book of Estimates.

Mr. GARNER. That could be carried in the Book of Estimates for all the departments just as easily and the same answer could be made. I believe the gentleman will not deny the contention that it is better, wherever it can be done, for the Congress itself to make the direct appropriations for the places in the various departments.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my opinion. A good many disagree with me, however.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman ever undertaken, or does the gentleman have any idea of carrying out what he believes to be the best policy of the Government with reference to the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I always carry out my ideas whenever I am permitted, but I am not the absolute Pooh-Bah that a great many people seem to imagine; so I do not always succeed.

Mr. GARNER. Has the gentleman undertaken to carry out his ideas in reference to this particular body—the Interstate Commerce Commission?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am only one of 21 members of the committee. My power is very much exaggerated. I do not get a chance to vote unless there is a tie; so I really do not have as much power as an ordinary member of the committee; that is, under ordinary circumstances.

Mr. GARNER. I am very much surprised at the gentleman not having any more influence on the committee than he now would lead us to believe, because I have been——

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not say "influence." I said "power."

Mr. GARNER. If a man has sufficient influence, he certainly has some power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Sometimes when I think my influence is greatest I am most disappointed.

Mr. GARNER. That may apply with the heads of departments, but not so much with the Committee of the Whole House or the House of Representatives.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will say to the gentleman that I suppose the making of this appropriation in this way, as a lump sum, is due somewhat to the peculiar character of the work of the Interstate Commerce Commission. Duties are added from time to time. The work is partly judicial and partly administrative, and probably the reason why no attempt has been made to segregate and specify more particularly the appropriations of the Interstate Commerce Commission is because of the fact, I think, that, unlike most of the departments of the Government, that commission has shown not only a disposition but an actual accomplishment in effecting economies in the conduct of their work. In this bill this item is $910,000. In 1912 and 1913 it was $1,000,000, and the reduction was made at the suggestion of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman will yield, I did not mean to criticize the Interstate Commerce Commission in any way. I am simply drawing the attention of the committee to a kind of legislation that is growing up in this House——

Mr. FITZGERALD. This is not growing up. This has been going on since I have been in Congress, for 15 years.

Mr. GARNER. I understand that this particular thing is not growing up, but we have just passed by a part of the bill where some lump-sum appropriations are carried.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GARNER. I ask unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. GARNER. While I had the honor to serve as a member of the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and assisted in making up the diplomatic and consular appropriation bill, my attention was directed to the fact that different lump-sum appropriations were made. Abuses had grown up under them, and I think wherever it is possible for committees framing appropriation bills to designate the specific purpose for which an appropriation may be used it is advisable, in the interest of economy and good government, to do it; and I take advantage of this instance here to call attention to the fact of the immense lump-sum appropriation carried here, without designating particularly the purpose for which it is to be used.

I want to say in this connection, if the gentleman will permit me, that I believe if all the departments of the Government were run as efficiently and economically as the Interstate Commerce Commission we would have a little better service than we are getting.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. And for less money.

Mr. GARNER. And for less money.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think the view which has been expressed by the gentleman from Texas is generally held by Members of Congress. Two or three years ago in an effort to find some means of keeping a proper check, without unduly cumbering the statutes, a provision was inserted in the sundry civil bill requiring detailed statements to be furnished with the estimates each year showing the employment and the rate of compensation for the fiscal year last ended and the proposed employment for the fiscal year for which the appropriation was to be made in all instances where the lump-sum appropriation was in excess of $250,000. That has worked out so satisfactorily that we have a provision in this bill that applies it to all lump-sum appropriations. The effect is that we have in the Book of Estimates these statements furnished in parallel columns, and by simply glancing at them it is possible to see the proposed changes. Now, it may be that it will be very desirable some time to include another provision prohibiting employments at any other compensation than those set forth in the notes and prohibiting increases of the number of employees beyond those stated in the notes.

Mr. GARNER. I was going to call the attention of the gentleman to that fact.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are doing these things gradually, and if that can be brought about we will have a very salutary check. It would eliminate a great deal of detail from the annual appropriation bills and would at the same time furnish complete and accurate information and an absolute check upon the expenditures.

Mr. GARNER. I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

For all other authorized expenditures necessary in the execution of laws to regulate commerce, $910,000, of which sum there may be expended not exceeding $50,000 in the employment of counsel, not exceeding $3,000 for the purchase of necessary books, reports, and periodicals, not exceeding $1,500 for printing other than that done at the Government Printing Office, not exceeding $100 in the open market for the purchase of office furniture similar in class or kind to that listed in the general supply schedule, and not exceeding $65,000 may be expended for rent of buildings in the District of Columbia.

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last word. I notice that the appropriation for the employment of counsel by the Interstate Commerce Commission is not increased in this bill over what it is in the existing law. I do not remember whether the existing law provides for a larger amount than has been paid currently heretofore. I was under the impression that the commission were using practically all of the $50,000 which was permitted for counsel, and I wondered whether the increase in the salary of one of the counsel from $5,000 to $10,000 was at the expense of the number of counsel who were employed, or whether they made that up in some other way. Perhaps the gentleman can give the information.

Mr. FITZGERALD. There was no request to increase the amount to be expended for counsel. My information is that the counsel paid out of the $50,000 are not the ordinary counsel who are employed by the year. This is to permit the employment of counsel in special cases, and I do not think it has been availed of very often.

Mr. MANN. I think the gentleman is mistaken about that.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think not.

Mr. MANN. Where is there any other appropriation for counsel except this item of $910,000? They have a long list of persons in their annual report who are listed as counsel. Possibly they have changed the title of some from counsel to examiner, or from counsel to clerk, in order to pay Mr. Folk $5,000 extra.

Mr. FOSTER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER. I will read from the hearings, where the chairman asked this question:

Is this $50,000 construed to apply to the employment merely of counsel in special cases or to your entire legal force?

And Mr. Clark replied:

Only to counsel in special cases.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Clark is mistaken; there is no other appropriation from which they could be paid.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am correct, and this limitation of $50,000 is a limit upon the amount that can be used for the employment of special counsel in special cases, and it does not affect the amount that is utilized for legal assistance by the commission upon the annual roll.

Mr. MANN. Out of what fund is that paid?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Out of the $910,000.

Mr. MANN. Well, if that is what the Interstate Commerce Commission is doing, they ought to be impeached and prosecuted. Here is what it says:

Nine hundred and ten thousand dollars, of which sum there may be expended not exceeding $50,000 in the employment of counsel.

It does not say "special counsel in special cases"; it says "employment of counsel." That is plain enough language for anybody to understand.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is how it has been construed and expended.

Mr. MANN. I do not think so.

Mr. GARNER. If the gentleman from Illinois will permit me, I think the gentleman from Illinois is absolutely correct in the construction of the language, but the chairman of the commission, Mr. Clark, in answering the question, said that this appropriation of $50,000 was to pay special counsel in special cases.

Mr. MANN. I do not question that Mr. Clark so stated, but I do question whether he had an understanding of what the fact is. I have read the annual reports of the commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I asked Mr. Clark this question:

The CHAIRMAN. Is that $50,000 construed to apply to employment merely of counsel in special cases or to your entire legal force?
Mr. CLARK. Only to counsel in special cases.
The CHAIRMAN. Then in addition to whoever you may employ in that way you have also a legal staff in the commission?
Mr. CLARK. Yes.

Then I asked him how much it cost, and he did not state, but I can tell the gentleman some of the people they have. They had a solicitor for the fiscal year 1913, at $5,000; a solicitor for six months, at $2,250; a chief attorney, at $3,900; an assistant for six months, at $1,950; and an attorney for two months for $650, and an attorney for the year, at $3,600, and about 18 or 20 additional attorneys. They have a regularly organized legal force. In addition they act upon the theory, and it is evidently approved by the auditor and controller, that they can employ special counsel in special cases to an extent not exceeding $50,000. I think the organic act creating the Interstate Commerce Commission authorized them to employ attorneys, examiners, etc.

Mr. GARNER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. GARNER. Would it not be well to include this language in line 11, after the word "of," the word "special," so that it would read "special counsel"?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not think it is necessary.

Mr. GARNER. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois that where the committee puts a limitation on the amount of money they could spend for counsel it ought to include the legal counsel that they have. That looks like the real intention of Congress, or else they would have said "special counsel."

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not know. All the time I have served on the Committee on Appropriations I have understood the $50,000 limitation to mean just what I have pointed out—that it was for the employment in special cases, and outside of that, as a part of the regular force, the Interstate Commerce Commission had a regularly organized law department.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman from New York must have had some doubt about it, because, as the hearings show, he asked the chairman whether that included all the counsel or whether it meant special counsel. If the gentleman knew about it why did he ask the question over and over?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I can explain that. I had a gentleman before me during the session of Congress who has appeared before the committee for five or six years during which I have been a member of the subcommittee. I asked him a question about some item in the bill, and he looked at me and smiled and said, "You know all about this matter." I said to him that he seemed to forget that the purpose of the hearings was twofold, one to furnish information to the committee and the other to create a record to which other Members could be referred for information who did not have such information. Simply because I ask questions and get answers to them as they appear in the record does not always mean that I was seeking information for myself. Very frequently the questions are asked to get a record to which I can refer gentlemen who would not be satisfied, perhaps, with a statement made by myself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The chairman of the Appropriation Committee having informed the House that this language, "not exceeding $50,000 in the employment of counsel," means special counsel in special cases, I am led to suspect that the following language, "not exceeding $3,000 for the purchase of necessary books, reports, and periodicals," means for the purchase of special necessary books and periodicals in special cases, and does not apply to the ordinary books and reports and periodicals. And, further, that this language—not exceeding $1,500 for printing, other than that done at the Government Printing Office—

Does not apply to ordinary printing, but applies only to special printing in special cases. And, furthermore, that this language—not exceeding $100 in the open market for the purchase of office furniture similar in class or kind to that listed in the general supply schedule—

Does not refer and is not a limitation upon the purchase of furniture generally, but is only a limitation upon the purchase of special furniture in special cases; and that this language—and not exceeding $65,000 may be expended for rent of building in the District of Columbia—

Does not refer to the rent of buildings which the commission occupies, but refers only to special rents of special buildings in special cases. In other words, none of the language means what it says. If that be the case, which I do not admit. I would suggest that our distinguished Committee on Appropriations undertake a slight reform, either in the English language or in the use of it in the bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this language has been carried for a great many years. It originated when the party of which the gentleman is a distinguished member was in control of the House.

Mr. MANN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MANN. What earthly good is there in turning the Republicans out and putting the Democrats in if they only follow the bad precedents of the Republicans?

Mr. FOSTER. Oh, they get better men.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They do not follow the bad precedents. We have been reforming many evils in the public service since we came into power, but there are still more.

In the acts conferring certain powers on the Interstate Commerce Commission, largely reported by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] when chairman of that committee or one of the active members upon it, certain powers were given to that commission and certain duties were imposed upon it. That commission was empowered to employ attorneys and agents and everything else, and the Interstate Commerce Commission has been for years employing attorneys and agents, and, when required, special counsel. There was never any criticism from the gentleman from Illinois. He has always been alert to defend and protect the Interstate Commerce Commission until it transpires that recently, in the exercise of their judgment, desiring to unearth some of the great frauds that had been committed and acquiesced in under Republican administrations in the conduct of the great trunk lines of the country, they employed a man who had acquired distinction and fame as a prosecuting attorney and placed him at the head of their local staff and put him to work unearthing iniquities in connection with railroads that had been conducted by men not only members and supporters of the Republican Party, but universally believed and known to have had a first and unpayable mortgage upon it.

Now that these men are being exposed, and these iniquities are coming to light, I do not think it is just the right thing for the gentleman from Illinois to attempt to lead the House to believe there has been some dereliction on the part of this committee, because we have not hog tied the Interstate Commerce Commission, so that it would have been impossible to secure the service of this distinguished gentleman who has unearthed these Republican iniquities. Certainly the Republicans had ample time and power and funds, everything but ample desire, to make the disclosures during the 16 years they were in complete and undisputed control of the Government. It was during those 16 years that all of the evil practices that have so plagued the country grew and flourished. The Democratic Party is now carrying out its promises to the people, and is bringing the light of publicity to bear on those iniquities, showing up the corrupt allegiance between big business and high finance and the Republican Party and those members of the Progressive Party who first attained distinction by service under the piratical flag of the Republican Party, and it hardly seems fair for the gentleman from Illinois to try and cover the whole thing by claiming that this committee is derelict, because it has not so hampered the Interstate Commerce Commission that it would have been impossible to do what it has recently done.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the paragraph. The Interstate Commerce Commission occupies a very peculiar situation in the government of the country. It is one of those independent bodies that acts for itself. It has no strings upon it to be pulled from its duties either one way or the other. It is a blessing to every man, woman, and child in America. Everybody ought to be in favor of it except the guilty, and everybody ought to be standing for it who are in favor of investigating wrongs and bringing to light evil practices.

My colleague from Illinois [Mr. MANN] undoubtedly has no criticism to offer concerning the appropriations to carry on the great work of this wonderful body. Certainly he ought not to have any grievance against high salaries. He has been one of the strongest advocates of big salaries for big men during my short stay in this House, and on every occasion when I interposed a point of order against an unlawful increase of a salary, he or some of his allies have been among the first and most persistent in defending big salaries. I wondered, while the gentleman from Illinois was speaking, what could be his grievance in this case, and I could think of nothing that might answer my inquiry until I reasoned with myself and realized that in the gentleman's district is located some of the greatest corporations of the country, among which are the Pullman Co., the Illinois Steel Co., the shipbuilding company, the asphalt company. All, as I understand, are tripping merrily to the tune of trust tango. The selection by the administration of a man with a record of ability, a man of superb courage, who never has been known to shirk his duty, is to be commended, because the Interstate Commerce Commission will deal with questions where the metal of men will be tried.

I believe that if there is a man in America who has shown himself to be a prosecutor in the true sense of the word, the gentleman who has been selected by this administration, Gov. Joseph W. Folk, is that man. That to which my colleague from Illinois objects certainly can not be on account of Mr. Folk's ability to prosecute, or on account of his politics, but it must be because of his determination to go after the corporations violating the laws of the land, by whom my colleague from Illinois has steadfastly stood.

Now, it may be a grievance that this administration has selected a man who will, regardless of all other considerations, discharge his whole duty. He is already engaged in that business, and the thoroughness with which he is unearthing crime and shady conduct is amazing to the people and more amazing to the trusts, and it must be that my colleague from Illinois is chagrined not at the increase of his salary, but because of his ability and determination to expose the unlawful methods of high financing in big business, such as was recently revealed by his masterful probe into the management of the New Haven railroad. My colleague has many corporations in his district, whose interests he seeks to protect, regardless of their conduct. Oh, I know we should stand by the people of our own districts. I know we ought to be true to our constituency; but patriotism, loyalty, and love for one's country demands that the little coterie of interests in one's own district should be subordinate to the will and good of the masses, and I trust my colleague from Illinois will adapt himself to this broad and liberal rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry that my colleague refers to me as "his friend from Illinois." If the truth were as big as the Capitol Building and stood right in front of my colleague, in reference to matters of this sort he would be utterly unable to see it. That is sufficient reply to the various statements which the gentleman has just made.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I am glad the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] has returned. We have missed him in connection with some——

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I will be glad to do so.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not want to let go unchallenged the statement that my presence has not always been in Congress since I became a Member.

Mr. MONDELL. Well, we have not had the pleasure of hearing from the gentleman for some days, and, unfortunately, I thought I had not the pleasure of seeing him; but he is here to-day undoubtedly, and, strangely enough, he is here in defense of an increase of salary. I have found it a little bit difficult to understand how the gentleman from Illinois differentiates between various increases. In connection with the other bills that have been discussed in days past he has interposed points of order against increases of $100, $200, $300, $400, and $500. I have not heard his voice raised in protest against the increase of $5,000 in the salary of an official. In the case of the other salaries in question they were in the main civil-service employees, and therefore they might be either Republicans or Democrats. Furthermore, those increases were made by a congressional committee after careful consideration. This increase was made by an independent governmental service out of a lump-sum appropriation and never referred to Congress, and it is not a civil-service appointment, but an appointment to which was called a very distinguished and very prominent Democrat, at one time governor of my native State of Missouri. No doubt this gentleman is competent, probably worth $10,000 a year, but it is extraordinary that the importance of that office should have so increased in so brief a period. I am delighted to have heard our friend from Illinois say that there was at least one man in the Democratic Party, and this is the man, who could be depended upon to do his duty for $10,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. In just a moment. If I have read the newspapers aright, the most important work, or at least the work that has attracted the most attention since the gentleman took this $10,000 job, is that of giving an immunity bath to the president of a great railway system, and whether that immunity bath has been extended to all the directors, I do not know, and I do not pretend to say that it is true, but I know that the newspapers have stated that there was very considerable friction between this $10,000 employee of the Interstate Commerce Commission and the Attorney General of the United States over the character of the immunity bath which was given to the ex-president of the New Haven Railroad.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. I do.

Mr. FOWLER. I desire to ask the gentleman if he does not believe—I was about to use a strong term, but I will use a milder one—if he does not believe that the gentlemanly conduct in handling the New Haven which has been revealed by this able prosecutor is not an index as to what has been going on for the last 16 or 18 years and which might have been shown up by his party while it was in power so long?

Mr. MONDELL. Oh, I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that there was anything specially new brought out in regard to the New Haven. We had a rehash of what those who were familiar with the situation knew in regard to the New Haven. We knew about the issues, we knew about the values, or at least the general understanding in regard to the issues and values, and about all that this distinguished gentleman has done——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Wyoming asks unanimous consent to proceed for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MONDELL. About all the gentleman has done, so far as I have been able to grasp what has been done, is to give a distinguished gentleman an opportunity to lay the blame on a man who is dead and gone, and to give him an immunity bath which protects him from all future prosecutions.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MONDELL. Now, if that is advantageous and helpful and useful, well and good; but I understand that the Attorney General of the United States has not been so minded. I understand that he had really intended a prosecution of the chiefs of the New Haven Railroad. Whereas what the distinguished attorney of the Interstate Commerce Commission has done is to give them an opportunity to make a statement in confession and avoidance and secure immunity for what they may have done.

Mr. FOWLER. Will the gentleman yield, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. MONDELL. That may have added somewhat to the sum of human knowledge, but I doubt it; but so far as punishing anyone for what they may have done, it not only has not accomplished that, but it has probably prevented these gentlemen from being punished for their misdeeds if they have been guilty of misdeeds.

Mr. FOWLER. The gentleman says that what has been unearthed in the New Haven recently by the able prosecutor is not new. Then he further says that what he has done is equivalent to an immunity bath. I desire to ask him if there has been guilt covering a period of 10 to 20 years why his party did not prosecute the guilty people before there was an opportunity to give an immunity bath?

Mr. MONDELL. We have been prosecuting offenders right along, but I suppose as long as the world stands there will be people charged with crime.

Mr. FOWLER. But that has been covering a period of 10 to 20 years.

Mr. MONDELL. If the gentleman will allow me to say a word or two in my own time, I will state that if the distinguished $10.000 employee of the Interstate Commerce Commission saw fit to give an immunity bath to a man who was under indictment by a Republican administration, it was not our fault. The gentleman should not charge us with it. The man had been indicted under a Republican administration. In due course of time he would have been tried. My understanding is that your Attorney General was proposing to try him. This gentleman, given this high-priced employment, proceeds to quiz him, with the result, as I understand, he is now entirely immune, and he has been given the opportunity to cast discredit upon a man some time since called to his reward. Why, it was even stated in the papers that this controversy between ex-Gov. Folk and the Attorney General was taken to the President. What position the President took in regard to it I do not know. But the fact remains no one ever suggested that the Interstate Commerce Commission was not well represented when its chief counsel received $5,000.

Mr. FOWLER. Do you object to the increase of the salary?

Mr. MONDELL. The only important work that has been done by this new employee at $10.000 is to give an immunity bath to a gentleman who by his own confession was guilty of acts that would have probably led to his conviction.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry. Is there an amendment pending offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] that we strike this paragraph out?

Mr. FOWLER. I ask unanimous consent that it be withdrawn.

Mr. BUTLER. I object to its being withdrawn. We have talked for 15 minutes on it, and I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment to strike out the paragraph.

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Hereafter the Interstate Commerce Commission may exchange typewriters, adding machines, and other labor-saving devices in part payment for like articles.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. Awhile ago in debate here and in colloquy with the gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER], when some of the gentlemen were criticizing the Pacific coast on the bubonic plague score, I stated that I remembered a few years ago when I would wait for the Galveston News or the Houston Post on the morning train on the Southern Pacific, down at Lake Charles, La., to learn how many new cases of yellow fever there were at Galveston, Tex. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. GARNER] answered that—

There has not been any yellow fever in Galveston since 1867. So the gentleman must have been reading of it before that date.

I answered:

The gentleman's suggestion that there has been no yellow fever in Galveston since 1867 is a nightmare of his.

And the gentleman asked me, then, if I could find any such case to put it in the RECORD, and challenged me to do so.

Now, I want to say I am not making any attack on Texas or the gentleman at all, because I went to school in Texas for three years and have an A. B. degree from Baylor University at Waco, which I prize very highly, and I love Texas very much, and I have great admiration for the gentleman. But I accepted his challenge when he made it, and now I hold in my hand a book entitled "History of Yellow Fever," by George Augustin. This author gives the yellow fever record in Galveston and in many other places. As to Galveston, the record shows:

1867. Population, 22,000. First case, June 26; last case, November. No record of cases; deaths, 1,150.
1870. Several cases were reported, but exact statistics are lacking.

That is 1870. That, of course, would put the position of the gentleman out of commission. But let me finish:

1873. Population, 25,000. No record of cases; deaths, 7.
1882. No statistics.
1894. No records. * * *
1895. No records. * * *
1897. Cases, 12; deaths, 0. * * *
1905. One case on vessel in harbor.

The Medical Record of New York, January 12, 1907, contains an article, entitled "Study of a case of yellow fever," by A. E. Shayer, M. D., Galveston, Tex., professor of pathology, University of Texas, medical department, from which I read:

On December 26, 1905, a patient was admitted into the John Sealy Hospital at Galveston with the following history:
"P. F. Irish, 30 years old, single, worker in silver."

It tells where he lived and gives his record for two months previous, and the doctor diagnoses his case as yellow fever and reports sick stomach, black vomit, and then death.

Then there was yellow fever in other places in Texas. I hold in my hand a bulletin of the University of Texas, No. 64, medical series No. 3, under date of June 15, 1905, and the title is, "The 1903 epidemic of yellow fever in Texas, and the lesson to be learned from it." It is a lecture delivered before the medical department of the University of Texas at Galveston on January 6, 1905, by Dr. George R. Tabor, State health officer.

Mr. GARNER. That bulletin does not give any cases in Galveston, Tex.

Mr. BRYAN. It refers to cases in different sections and records some trouble with the disease out in Laredo, which, I understand, is in the gentleman's territory.

Mr. GARNER. Yes; that is my territory, and also Galveston. Let me say to the gentleman that my information was—I am not prepared to dispute the facts that the gentleman undertakes to convey with reference to the particular case at Galveston, but I know from what I have been able to extract from the newspapers and from what I know about Texas that Galveston has been clearer of yellow fever than any other port that I know of.

Mr. BRYAN. Yes; Galveston is a healthy city and has wonderful people and is ably represented here on this floor. [Applause.] There is no more danger of yellow fever there now than there is in the city of Washington.

Mr. GARNER. The gentleman says he went to school in Texas; and, if so, he ought to have absorbed some good things, and I am inclined to think he did, because he has a good disposition, and I am inclined to think that he got that down there in Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. BRYAN. The question arose whether the Galveston News contained such reports or not, and I said that I had read such reports in the Galveston News, and the gentleman said there had been no yellow fever there since 1867, and he challenged me to get the facts and put them in the RECORD. Here is part of an article on "Yellow fever in Galveston," by H. A. West, M. D., of Galveston, Tex., from which I quote:

The startling announcement of the existence of yellow fever in Galveston, made on October 9, 1897, caused consternation and dismay in the city, closed the gates of commerce, and barred the doors of every house in almost every town and hamlet against all goods and persons from Galveston.

Now, does the gentleman think the Galveston News would have failed to record an item of news of that importance?

Mr. BUTLER. What has that to do with the item in the bill?

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Washington is not confining himself to the amendment before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] makes the point of order that the gentleman from Washington [Mr. BRYAN] is not confining himself to the amendment pending before the House.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, my amendment was to strike out the last word, which is the word "articles." It is a pretty broad question. [Laughter.] But I simply want to say that I have complied with the gentleman's challenge and put the data referred to in the RECORD. I repeat what I said in my former remarks, that the expense of the Government on account of bubonic plague on the Pacific coast compares with the expense of the Government on account of yellow fever on the Gulf like a picayune compares with a hundred-dollar bill.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to say that I shall request for the rest of the day that the members of the committee confine themselves to the items under consideration. I think we have been fairly liberal to-day in the granting of time. Now let us try to make some progress on the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. DONOVAN. Yesterday afternoon, about 5 o'clock, or two minutes before 5, I made this statement—appealing to the chairman of the committee having the bill in charge—that owing to the absence of all the Republicans but one, he ought to ask the committee to rise. The one Republican that was present rose from his seat, out of order, without addressing the Chair, and stated, according to this book, the RECORD, that the statement was not true and that the gentleman "knew it was not true." The statement was true when made, that not a Republican was in this Chamber but one.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order.

Mr. BUTLER. He is talking on the subject of "like articles." [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. The statement was true, and I can prove it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] demands the regular order. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] will proceed in order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Then, Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is not in order.

Mr. GARNER. You can not do that in committee.

Mr. DONOVAN. Let me proceed, Mr. Chairman, and take the ruling, whatever it may be. We have listened this day——

Mr. MANN. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may proceed for three minutes.

Mr. DONOVAN. I refuse to accept that.

Mr. MANN. I do not wonder after the statement which the gentleman has made.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] merely demanded the regular order. He did not make the point of order that the gentleman from Connecticut was not proceeding in order.

Mr. MADDEN. I make that point of order now, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order. The gentleman will address himself to the amendment.

Mr. DONOVAN. I withdraw the pro forma amendment, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. [After counting.] Sixty-eight Members are present—not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk proceeded to call the roll, when the following Members failed to answer to their names:

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BARTLETT. By what authority does the Chair order a second roll call in Committee of the Whole for the purpose of ascertaining the presence of a quorum? I do not care to make the point now, Mr. Chairman, but it is a matter worthy of consideration. If the second roll call in Committee of the Whole could be dispensed with or not be permitted, or if it is not required by the rule, it would save about half the time consumed in calling the roll when the point of no quorum is made. According to my recollection—and I think I can sustain it by at least one precedent—there is a ruling by a former Speaker that the rule does not require the calling of the roll a second time in Committee of the Whole. However, I will not press the point for the present.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I believe the Chair will recall, and I think the gentleman from Georgia will also, that it is only within a few years that the roll has been called in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BARTLETT. Called twice.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Called at all. We did not have such a thing when we first came here. In the last few years we have had these roll calls when the point of no quorum was made in Committee of the Whole, and for a time the roll was called only once; but so many Members came down in front of the desk and asked to have their names recorded after the one roll call was completed that on a certain occasion the Chair stated that it would be easier to call the roll a second time, and since then the roll has been called twice, simply by consent. It has come to be understood that the roll will be called twice, and that has become the custom; and if we do not have a second roll call now there will be a great many Members in front of the desk clamoring to have their names recorded as being present, and they will have to be called out of alphabetical order, thereby causing more confusion and more delay than is required in calling the roll a second time.

Mr. BARTLETT. But, Mr. Chairman, if the first roll call discloses the fact that there is a quorum of the committee present, there is no necessity for calling the roll a second time, or for taking cognizance of the presence of anybody else.

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. But, Mr. Chairman, I think a Member has the right to have his name recorded, so that his name will not appear in the list of absentees, so long as he is present before the committee rises, if he demands it.

Mr. BARTLETT. He has that right on a call of the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has raised a novel question and the Chair appeals to Members to be in order.

Mr. BARTLETT. Now, Mr. Chairman, the object of calling the roll in Committee of the Whole is to ascertain whether there are 100 Members present. I suggest that if the first roll call develops that there are 100 men present, and therefore a quorum, that the time of the House ought not to be wasted in calling the roll a second time, and that Members who are here should be noted as present. Therefore, I inquire whether if the first roll call develops the presence of 100 Members it is necessary to call the roll a second time?

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I again submit that if a Member is present before the roll call is concluded, you can not preclude him from having his name recorded as being present; and if you do not call the roll a second time, then the Members will come to the Speaker's desk and demand that they have their names recorded as present. There can be no doubt about it, in my opinion. To hold otherwise would result in the Chairman of the committee making a report to the House when the committee rose that would be untrue.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. I make the point of order that you can not interrupt a roll call with a parliamentary inquiry. Now, if we have not finished the roll call, the gentleman from Georgia can not interrupt it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Georgia has raised a novel and unique question. The first roll call has been completed. If the gentleman from Georgia is right in his contention that the roll call is not interrupted, the Chair thinks the gentleman from Georgia is in order in making the parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. BRYAN. But both gentlemen admit that those who have come in have the right to be entered as present, and if they have, the roll call is not finished.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Washington that the Chair does not understand that the gentleman from Georgia admitted that Members had a right to have their names recorded except in the House.

Mr. SAUNDERS. Mr. Chairman, why does not the general rule relating to a roll call control the situation in the committee as well as in the House? The provision for a roll call in Committee of the Whole on a point of no quorum is provided by a rule of the House. This roll call is not distinguished from any other roll call. Section 748 specifically provides that on every roll call the names of the Members shall be called alphabetically, and that after the roll has been once called, the names of those not voting shall be called again in alphabetical order.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman read the language?

Mr. SAUNDERS. Section 748—

Upon every roll call the names of the Members shall be called alphabetically by surname, except when two or more have the same surname, in which case the name of the State shall be added; and if there be two such Members from the same State, the whole name shall be called; and after the roll has been once called, the Clerk shall call, in their alphabetical order, the names of those not voting; and thereafter the Speaker shall not entertain a request to record a vote or announce a pair unless the Member's name has been noted under clause 3 of this rule.

This is the general provision relating to a roll call. Rule 841 provides that when the Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum the Chairman shall cause the roll to be called. If a question is raised as to what is meant by calling the roll, we turn for the answer to section 748, which declares what shall be done on every roll call. Why should not this roll call in Committee of the Whole be controlled by the general provisions of section 748? It has been the uniform practice for years past to have the Clerk call the names of those not answering on the first call, as well in the Committee of the Whole as in the House. The practice is a good one and is supported by sufficient authority.

I will also state in this connection that rule 855 expressly provides that the rules of proceeding in the House shall be observed in Committee of the Whole, so far as they may be applicable. This being so, there is no reason why rule 748 should not determine what shall be done upon a roll call in the Committee of the Whole as well as in the House. This rule can not be said to be inapplicable to a roll call in Committee of the Whole. Rule 841 merely provides that the roll shall be called in the Committee of the Whole when it finds itself without a quorum. It does not determine what shall be done by the Clerk when a roll is called. That procedure is fixed by section 748. The authority for the second call in the Committee of the Whole is ample.

The CHAIRMAN. There is a ruling made by a former Speaker of this House, Speaker Crisp, which held that one roll call in Committee of the Whole is all that is necessary. The Chair has not had time to examine the ruling or the circumstances under which it was made nor the wording of the rules of the House at the time.

Mr. SAUNDERS. All of which would be very important.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair dislikes very much to rule on this proposition at this particular time, at this particular moment. It has been the custom of the House and of the Committee of the Whole ever since the present occupant of the chair has been a Member of the House to call the roll twice in Committee of the Whole, and then give to the others who did not answer the call the opportunity to be recorded if a point of no quorum was made. The Chair prefers to follow that custom for this afternoon at least.

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Chairman, the present occupant of the chair has been here longer than I have. It has only been within the last two years that the custom of calling the roll twice in Committee of the Whole has been followed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair, perhaps, may state that possibly he fell into an error about that because of the fact that within the last two or three years there have been more roll calls in committee than before in that time. Roll calls in committee during the first and second terms of service of the present occupant of the chair were very rare. In fact, the Chair does not remember any.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, in order to answer the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. BURKE], I desire to refer the Chair to the ruling that he has referred to. I refer the Chair to section 2967 of volume 4 of Hinds' Precedents:

On March 9, 1894, the Committee of the Whole having risen because of the failure of a quorum, Mr. Charles J. Boatner, of Louisiana, suggested that the roll of Members had only been called once in the committee, and that under the practice of the House it should have been called a second time. He therefore demanded that the Journal should show that he was present when the roll of the committee was called.

The Speaker held that when a Committee of the Whole finds itself without a quorum the rule requires the roll to be called but once, and that such had been the practice of the House.

However, Mr. Chairman, I do not make the point of order at this time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia does not make the point of order?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not; but it may be made at some time later.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to ask the gentleman from Georgia a question. Suppose on the first call of the roll a quorum of the committee does not develop, what would be the duty of the Chairman in such a case?

Mr. BARTLETT. The Chair could count those that came in afterwards and send for absentees by the Sergeant at Arms.

The CHAIRMAN. The Committee of the Whole has no power to send for absent Members.

Mr. BARTLETT. But the Committee of the Whole could report the fact to the House and the House would take steps to produce a quorum. That is the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Georgia does not press the point of order at this time?

Mr. BARTLETT. I do not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I wish to make a brief statement, if the Chair will indulge me.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, early in my service in the House, I think about 12 or 13 years ago, the practice had been to call the roll in committee but once when the point of order of no quorum was made.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I demand the regular order. There is nothing before the House. The gentleman from New York has not made a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. DONOVAN. But, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York can not hold up a roll call. No point of order has been made.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will reserve the point of order for the present.

Mr. DONOVAN. Let the gentleman have his remarks inserted in the RECORD. [Laughter.]

Mr. FITZGERALD. Upon one occasion when the roll was called——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from New York is out of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not out of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York, at the suggestion of the gentleman from Connecticut himself, reserved the point of order, and is now addressing himself to the point of order.

Mr. DONOVAN. But the gentleman from New York can not reserve the point of order. He must either make it or not.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then, Mr. Chairman, I will make the point of order and discuss it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, on one occasion the roll was called but once, and a large number of Members, not having answered the roll when called, presented themselves at the bar of the House and requested to have their presence noted. That had been the practice, and the gentleman then occupying the chair, whom I do not now recall, made the statement that that happened so frequently, and so much time was taken and so much disorder accompanied the attempt to note the presence of those who were present, but who had not answered the roll when called, that he would order the roll to be called a second time so that Members could answer in an orderly manner; and that has been the practice of the House since that time, covering a period of 12 or 13 years.

I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will call the names of those who failed to answer on the first roll call.

The Clerk called the roll the second time.

The committee rose; and Mr. SAUNDERS having assumed the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee finding itself without a quorum, he had directed the roll to be called, that 233 Members answered to their names—a quorum—and he reported herewith the list of absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

It shall be the duty of every common carrier by railroad whose property is being valued under the act of March 1, 1913, to transport free of charge the engineers, field parties, and other employees of the United States who are actually engaged in making surveys and other examination of the physical property of said carrier necessary to execute said act, from point to point on said railroad as may be reasonably required by them in the actual discharge of their duties; and also, without charge, to move from point to point and store at such points as may be reasonably required, the cars of the United States which are being used to house and maintain said employees; and also to carry free of charge the supplies necessary to maintain said employees and the other property of the United States actually used on said railroad in said work of valuation. This free service shall be rendered under such forms and regulations, as to evidence of transportation, bills of lading, and so forth, as will insure an accurate record and account upon the part of the railroad which shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission by the carrier at such time and in such manner as it may require.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order upon the paragraph. While I sympathize with the Interstate Commerce Commission in its work, and believe it is doing very competent work under Judge Prouty, I question the desirability of a provision of this sort requiring the railroads to carry persons and freight free of charge.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this provision was agreed upon by the Interstate Commerce Commission and the representatives of the great trunk lines whose properties are to be valued. It is not so much a question of cost as it is a question of supplying facilities. For instance, these field parties must be taken out or picked up at places along the line of the railroads at which there are not regular stopping places, and they must be sent out or taken up upon trains which do not under the regulations of the road carry passengers. The Interstate Commerce Commission says that the railroads can not carry their field parties or men engaged in the work of the physical valuation of the railroads upon trains upon which the railroads do not permit ordinary passengers to travel, or to stop for the field parties or persons connected with this work at places other than the regular station or stations where they are not scheduled to stop, if they do not stop for the ordinary passenger. To do so would be an instance of favoritism or discrimination of service to the men engaged in the service. The Interstate Commerce Commission had no desire to have a general provision to carry free of charge officials of the Interstate Commerce Commission. It is stated that the roads of the country themselves will expend probably from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000 in addition to what will be spent by the Government in the work of the physical valuation of railroads.

The Interstate Commerce Commission took the question of this provision up with the representatives of the various railroads, and eventually they worked out this proposition. The railroad people believe that it would be desirable to furnish the special facilities required. They are willing to carry the persons designated here free, but they believe that an additional provision should be inserted requiring the Interstate Commerce Commission to specify the form and manner in which the accounts should be kept of the service so furnished, so that the railroads might be able to tell and the public might be able to know exactly what the service costs the railroads. It was a matter of some doubt as to whether we should start a work compelling the railroads to carry any officials free, but this work seemed to be so peculiar, to be so connected with matters in which the railroads themselves were peculiarly interested, that the committee thought it wise to recommend the provision in accordance with the request of the commission. I do not think that the question of free carriage is so important as is the question of enabling the railroads or requiring them—which must be done under the law—to extend the special facilities. These men can ride on trains that will not carry passengers, or they can be afforded facilities that would not be afforded and could not be afforded to the traveling public generally. After going over the matter pretty carefully with Judge Prouty, who has been put in charge of the work, the committee believed that, perhaps, it was best to report this provision.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I have a great deal of confidence in Judge Prouty and in his opinion, and I have no doubt that the railroads might properly carry these parties and their supplies free of charge; and I think they might properly be permitted to do so. I am not sure whether the antipass law would prevent the railroads from doing it if they wished to do so or not; but since the antipass law went into effect there have been a great many propositions, probably not made on paper but floating around Congress, for instance, to the effect that all the railroads should be compelled to carry all Members of Congress free of charge. I never have believed myself that the Government had that power, unless it were incorporated in contracts for the Post Office Department, nor do I believe it ought to be done. Now, here is a proposition which undertakes to say that the Government has the power to compel the railroads to carry passengers and freight free of charge. Well, I do not believe the Government has that power, and I believe it ought not to have that power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, there were two communications from Judge Prouty after the matter was discussed, and under date of April 22 he wrote as follows, and it was because of the statement that the provision was agreed upon by the railroad representatives that it was incorporated in the bill:

WASHINGTON, April 22, 1914.

Hon. JOHN J. FITZGERALD,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: On April 17 I wrote you suggesting the incorporation into the appropriation for the valuation work of this commission of a requirement for the free transportation of certain Government employees and supplies. Yesterday this matter came up for discussion between a committee representing a large part of the railroad mileage of the country and myself, at which the railroads agreed to the provision as sent you by me, but requested that the following addition might be made:

"This free service shall be rendered under such forms and regulations, as to evidence of transportation, bills of lading, etc., as will insure an accurate record and account upon the part of the railroad, which shall be furnished to the Interstate Commerce Commission by the carrier at such time and in such manner as it may require."

The idea of those who favored this addition seemed to be that the railroads were entitled to have it known exactly what free service they gave, and this seems reasonable.

Very truly, yours, C. A. PROUTY, Director.

The Interstate Commerce Commission said that they did not desire any general provision for the carrying free of employees of that commission, and they had this restriction so that it applied to the engineers, field parties, and other employees actually engaged in making surveys and other examination of the physical property of the railroads. The commission seems to be anxious that there should be no opening up of the prohibition against free transportation. This is a peculiar work that these men are engaged in. They are to make, first, preliminary surveys of the entire railroad mileage of the country. They will be engaged on different parts of the road, and it seemed so peculiar and different from any other situation that could possibly arise that it induced the committee to take the position they have.

Mr. MANN. My friend from New York is aware of the fact that the Post Office Committee, I believe, reported a bill providing for free transportation to be furnished by the railroads to all railway mail clerks all over the United States. And we have propositions to have Members of Congress carried free. The antipass law was a good thing. I was not enthusiastically in favor of the proposition before it became a law. I doubted the practicability of it, but I admit the practicability of it now, and I believe it was an exceedingly good thing. I would have no objection whatever to putting in a provision authorizing the Interstate Commerce Commission, under regulations which they might adopt, to accept free transportation for their engineering parties or others engaged in the physical valuation of railroads.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That was suggested, if I recall correctly, and the railroads take the position that they do not want to be put in a position where they can offer it. They want the law made mandatory, so no question can arise about whether they should or should not give it.

I think there was some question as to whether there was power in Congress to compel this to be done. The statement was made that if a mandatory provision were enacted the railroads would be glad to comply with it. They do not want to be put in a position to decline to offer to furnish any particular service to the Interstate Commerce Commission that can not be furnished to other parties, because the railroads seem to occupy the position that they do not wish to be put in an attitude of making a tender of anything in connection with the physical valuation of railroads. The expense to both the Government and the roads is to be so enormous that they want nothing done, want no situation to exist, that might give rise in the mind of anyone to the suggestion that in any way those connected with the work of valuation could possibly have been affected by the fact that the roads volunteered some service.

Mr. MANN. If they volunteered it under the law that permitted it, it would be all right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They were willing to furnish the service if the provision were mandatory.

Mr. MANN. They were willing to furnish passes to Members of Congress, and they not only were willing to do so, but they did, and most Members of Congress and lots of other officials rode on them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. A great change has come over the spirit of Mammon since then.

Mr. MANN. I do not wish to see it come around again where we legislate to require the railroads to furnish free transportation to certain officials, possibly including ourselves in the end. I do not want that temptation placed before me, though I might be able to resist it. And if you commence on the assumption that you have the power to require railroads to furnish not merely transportation of persons but transportation of freight, free, without any recompense whatever, I do not know where it would stop, but I am very sure it would not stop with those engaged in the physical valuation of railroads. Everyone knows that when you make a precedent of this kind it is seized upon by everyone else who wants the privilege.

Mr. BARTLETT. May I interrupt the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman would be willing, as I understand it, to have a provision which would make it lawful for them to agree to carry them without charge?

Mr. MANN. So far as I am concerned, that would be entirely satisfactory.

Mr. BARTLETT. Suppose you would say that it shall be lawful for every common carrier or railroad whose property is being valued to agree to take them free of charge; in other words, to take them out from under that provision of the law which now makes it unlawful, and that it shall be lawful for any railroad whose property is being valued to agree to transport them?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That provision would not do. It is lawful for them now to carry these parties upon freight trains. They transport members of these parties on trains that do not carry passengers, and if they stop the passenger trains for those parties where they do not for anybody else, they would be compelled to do it for everybody else.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes. The Interstate Commerce Commission said they would.

Mr. MANN. There would be nobody else carried free.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Free carriage is not the important part. The important part is to enable them to carry them on trains on which passengers are ordinarily not carried or stop trains at points not regularly scheduled in order to pick up or to drop these parties. If they were to consent now to stop to take up one of these parties at some point not scheduled as a regular stopping point on the railroad, any other passenger could compel them to do it. They are compelled to refuse to stop and pick up these parties except at scheduled places.

Mr. MANN. The point made by the gentleman from New York is not good at all, so far as this language is concerned.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not professing to be sufficiently familiar with the rights of the railroads to do these things, but that is a statement made by the representative of the Interstate Commerce Commission to the committee.

Mr. MANN. That is covered by the other language in the paragraph, where it provides that they carry from point to point; also without charge to move from point to point, and store at such points as may be reasonably required, and so on.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest that we strike out the words "the duty of" and insert the words "lawful for."

Mr. MANN. That is all right.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Then I offer that amendment, Mr. Chairman, in line 1, page 50, to strike out the words "the duty of" duty of" and insert "lawful for."

Mr. MANN. I withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] withdraws the point of order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] offers an amendment. Will the gentleman from New York repeat his amendment?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Strike out, in line 1, the words "the duty of" and insert "lawful for."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York offers an amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Mr. MONDELL. Let me suggest, Mr. Chairman, to the gentleman from New York to strike out the word "the."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 50, line 1, strike out "the duty of" and insert "lawful for," so that the line will read "it shall be lawful for every common carrier," etc.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I wish to speak in opposition to the amendment.

The difference that is proposed by the amendment is really the difference between "tweedledee" and "tweedledum," except that instead of making it obligatory on the railroad companies to give free passes, we are leaving it to their discretion, and it is opening up a danger point that has been avoided since the abolition of free passes.

I do not know of any section of the country where free passes prevail now by law except in the State of New Jersey, which is supposed to be the mother of all "reform" legislation, much of which legislation, I am inclined to think, Congress has been following in the last year or so.

Mr. MURDOCK. It is mandatory in the State of New Jersey, is it not?

Mr. MOORE. Yes; it is mandatory in the State of New Jersey; and I am frank to say that while I may have used passes years ago, I would be ashamed to offer one to-day in the State of New Jersey. The great mass of people there have to pay their fares, and they pay them willingly and cheerfully, and there is no discrimination, except that some one, who happens to be an officeholder, steps forward and offers his free ticket, which is viséed and carefully scrutinized by the conductor, but generally the man with the pass is a mark for the attention of everybody in the car. That is the public view of it.

Now, there is a private view of it which this House ought to consider. You are going to allow groups of men to step into a car because they are engaged in a Government service, for which ample appropriation is made, and take free the seats of passengers who have to pay their fares. I think you will find that when they come in groups and numbers, with their surveying instruments and all their general equipment, the ordinary fare-paying traveling public is going to be very greatly discommoded and inconvenienced.

That is the second view of it. Now, it seems to me that Congress did a good thing when it abolished passes. It relieved all men in public life from the criticism that arose by reason of this special privilege. If there ever was a special privilege which a public man could wield for the benefit of a few of his constituents, at the same time making enemies of hundreds and thousands of others, it was the pass business. Here you propose to open it up again, not under a mandate of the law with regard to Government employees, but leaving it to the discretion of the railroads that are to be investigated and doing it at the instance of the court that is to pass upon that investigation.

In my judgment you are making a mistake to open up the pass business at all. The Government is amply able to pay for the investigation it has ordered, and I am one of those inclined to think that the millions of dollars that are to be spent in this investigation will be substantially wasted by the time you get your reports. When you get your reports not one-tenth of the hundred million people of this country will attempt to read them or even to read the synopsis of them.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Nobody expects that. This information is to be acquired for the purpose of enabling the proper officials to determine whether the rates fixed by the railroads are proper or improper. This is not intended to be summer reading for a man to idle away his time on while off on his vacation. It is to report valuable information that nobody wants to study except those who are officially required to.

Mr. MOORE. It seems to be one of the happy faculties of the present administration to give us plenty of reading matter—plenty of suggestions——

Mr. FITZGERALD. And the gentleman would profit if he would spend time reading it.

Mr. MOORE. But keeping us in session and not giving us any vacation time in which to read them. One of the faults I have to find with your management is that you have been investigating and investigating, and you have been holding Congress here in session continually, until nobody can begin to read what you have been doing.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The trouble with the gentleman from Pennsylvania is that instead of reading these accurate statements of fact he continually calls upon that fertile and vivid imagination of his and pictures horrors and difficulties and conditions which did at one time exist under a Republican administration, but which have been dissipated like mists under the noonday sun by the Democratic administration. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. MOORE. My dear sir, no Republican administration ever attempted such futile investigations as have been conducted by the Democratic Party.

Mr. FITZGERALD. They did not dare. They knew what would be discovered. We believed we knew what would be discovered, and we have discovered it.

Mr. MOORE. The Republican administration never would have wasted the public money in the manner in which it has been wasted in useless and futile investigations under the direction of the distinguished chairman of the Appropriations Committee [Mr. FITZGERALD]. Money has been wasted, scattered, spent in investigations of every character, to disturb business, including the railroads, so that to-day there is such depression as makes every man upon the other side of this House scared out of his wits for fear he may not come back again.

But I am inclined to think this amendment ought not to pass, and that the paragraph itself ought to go out. There ought to be no understanding between the Interstate Commerce Commission and the railroads on a free-pass basis, with regard to an investigation which the Government is to make into the railroads.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this is as far from a free-pass matter as anything possibly can be. Large numbers of these employees are to be carried in cars that will be specially provided by the Interstate Commerce Commission itself. These surveying parties will live in these cars along the routes which they are surveying. The railroads could not drop these cars off at different places without some special authority. I hope the amendment which I have offered will be agreed to.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made a point of order against the paragraph. He withdrew the point of order upon the statement that this amendment would be offered. It seems to me that anybody who wished to antagonize the matter in good faith should have done so before any such agreement was made. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] could have eliminated the entire provision from the bill on a point of order.

I have never been in the habit of getting a gentleman to give up some advantage which he has on the floor as the result of a statement that I made and then tried to take advantage of him and defeat the proposal under which he has surrendered his peculiar advantage. I think, as a matter of good faith, in the legislation of this House gentlemen who listen to such agreements ought to make their opposition known before points of order are withdrawn under such circumstances. I did my best to prevent the point of order being made and to have the original provision retained in the bill.

Mr. MURDOCK. You did it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania really desired to have this paragraph go out, he could have made the point of order. He had ample opportunity to do so; but to wait until the point of order is withdrawn and the amendment is proposed, and then to antagonize both the amendment and the original proposition is, I think, hardly worthy of the distinguished gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. Does the gentleman mean to say that under this paragraph an individual member of a surveying party, or a group of members of a surveying party, may not get on a regular train and pass from point to point?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Suppose a regular train is leaving Philadelphia and going to some obscure, unknown hamlet in the great State of Pennsylvania. These parties are bound from Philadelphia to that particular place, and suppose they were to go on a regular train; they would not wait for a milk train or a freight train. If the constituents of the gentleman from Philadelphia were compelled to travel in that particular train, I do not think they would be contaminated or demoralized or morally or physically affected in any way whatever because they were traveling on the same train and in the same car with the members of the surveying party. If the gentleman thinks it would affect his constituents, we might add a provision that these persons should not travel in any car occupied by the constituents of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MOORE. I would like to have the gentleman yield for a question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman say what effect the passage of his amendment would have in a case like this? A State law forbids the issuance of passes and forbids anybody in the State to ride free.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is easy to answer that question. A child could answer it. I am surprised that the gentleman should ask it. This is interstate business.

Mr. MOORE. However, if there was a branch of the interstate railroad wholly within the State I assume that it would be investigated. It would be subject to investigation by the commission.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I am not much more of a lawyer than is the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and he is no lawyer at all, and I can answer that question.

Mr. MOORE. I am glad sometimes that I am not a lawyer.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, it would not hurt the gentleman if he had a little knowledge of law occasionally.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman is so much endowed with legal knowledge and is so filled with information that he reminds me of the village schoolmaster—

> And still they gazed and still the wonder grew
> That one small head could carry all he knew.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My head is not as small as the gentleman thinks it is. He should see the size of my hat.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Chairman, realizing the desire of the gentleman from New York to expedite the bill I would not take up the time of the committee if I did not know that there was a serious misunderstanding between the gentleman from Pennsylvania and the gentleman from New York. I think the gentleman from New York takes the objections of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to this paragraph too seriously. The impression I obtained was that the gentleman from Pennsylvania voiced his doubts in regard to the wisdom of this provision very largely as a handle for some trite personal remarks as to the state of the Union. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania has any real doubts in regard to it, let me remind him that unless these companies have authority to stop all trains at any point between stations I do not think they can do so. Under the interstate commerce law that could not be done without authorization. That also involves the question of payment, because if a passenger is picked up between stations there is a question of the fare. The fare is ordinarily computed from station to station, so that at first there must be authorization to the companies to stop their trains, of all sorts, at any point where these parties may desire to be picked up and then it is to the advantage of the company to be allowed to waive the charge, because in some instances it would be difficult for the conductor to determine just what the fare would be in a given case where the party was picked up between stations.

Mr. MOORE. Would not the conductor know in the case of an ordinary passenger?

Mr. MONDELL. He would not stop.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

For payment of all authorized expenditures under the provisions of the act of February 17, 1911, "To promote the safety of employees and travelers upon railroads by compelling common carriers engaged in interstate commerce to equip their locomotives with safe and suitable boilers and appurtenances thereto," including such stenographic and clerical help to the chief inspector and his two assistants as the Interstate Commerce Commission may deem necessary and allowances in lieu of subsistence while away from official headquarters to persons whose traveling expenses are authorized by said act to be paid at not to exceed $4 per day, $220,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. There will be some comment on the next item.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman from Illinois is going to delay us on the next item, I will move that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. JACOWAY, for one day, on account of sickness.

To Mr. L'ENGLE, indefinitely, on account of illness.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, does the gentleman from New York recollect that we have an evening session until 11 o'clock to-morrow?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; but I meant meet in the morning at 11 o'clock.

Mr. MANN. That is all very well, because the gentleman from New York will not be here in the evening.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Oh, yes; I will be here in the evening.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman is going to be here to-morrow evening, I do not wish to permit him to work himself to death, and I object.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 6 o'clock and 11 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Friday, June 12, 1914, at 12 o'clock m.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1914.

The Senate met at 11 o'clock a. m.

The Chaplain, Rev. Forrest J. Prettyman, D. D., offered the following prayer:

Almighty God, we come before Thee dependent upon the mercies of Thy providence and grace from day to day. We lift our hearts for Thy blessing upon this new day. Grant us such conscious contact with God that the things spiritual may be real to us and that that which is related to the eternal may be the permanent concern of our hearts and minds and may lead us so wisely to discern the duties of this day as that their outcome will show Thy wisdom, Thy guidance, and Thy blessing. Hear us in our prayer. For Jesus's sake. Amen.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of the proceedings of the legislative day of June 5, when, on request of Mr. SMOOT and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with and the Journal was approved.

ENROLLED BILLS AND JOINT RESOLUTION SIGNED.

The VICE PRESIDENT announced his signature to the following enrolled bills and joint resolution, which had heretofore been signed by the Speaker of the House of Representatives:

H. R. 11040. An act to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis;

H. R. 14242. An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa.; and

S. J. Res. 148. Joint resolution authorizing the President to extend invitations to foreign Governments to participate, through their accredited diplomatic agents to the United States, in the National Star-Spangled Banner Centennial Celebration.

CONSULAR PREMISES AT SHANGHAI, CHINA.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a letter from the Secretary of State submitting an estimate of appropriation in the sum of $375,000 for the purchase of premises for the offices of the Government of the United States in Shanghai, China, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Appropriations.

FRENCH SPOLIATION CLAIM.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a communication from the assistant clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting the findings of fact and conclusions of law filed under the act of January 20, 1885, in the French spoliation claims, set out in the annexed findings by the court relating to the schooner Mary, Thomas B. Covell, master, which, with the accompanying paper, was referred to the Committee on Claims.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented petitions of sundry citizens of Washington, D. C., and Harrodsburg, Ky., praying for national prohibition, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented a memorial of Leo W. Myers Woman's Relief Corps, No. 118, Department of Illinois, remonstrating against any change in the American flag, which was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

He also presented petitions of sundry citizens of South Chicago, Sterling, and Carrollton, in the State of Illinois; of Clearfield, Stratford, and Ottumwa, in the State of Iowa; of Gregory, Howard, and White, in the State of South Dakota; of Colerain and Alexandria, in the State of Pennsylvania; of Belford and Laurel Springs, in the State of New Jersey; of Knoxville, Tenn.; of Waseca, Minn.; of Sterling, Kans.; of Rocklyn, Wash.; of Cloes Ferry, Va.; of Calcutta, Ohio; and of Greencastle, Ind., praying for the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution to prohibit polygamy, which were referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I have a short resolution here from the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce bearing upon a question of great interest to the Senate and the country just now, and I ask that it may be read.

There being no objection, the resolution was read and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, as follows:

Whereas there is now pending in the Congress of the United States of America a series of bills intended to carry out the recommendations of President Wilson as to antitrust legislation, as set out in his message to Congress of January 20, 1914; and

Whereas the legislation proposed in these bills, if enacted, will have a profound and far-reaching effect on the conduct of the commerce and industry of the Nation and on the welfare of all its people; and

Whereas undue haste in the enactment of important legislation such as is proposed in the new bills relating to "a trades commission," "interlocking directorates," and the "Sherman law definitions" is to be deprecated, as every opportunity should be afforded to all persons affected in all parts of the country to be fully heard on these important questions, to the end that their suggestions and recommendations may be considered by the Congress in the final framing of this legislation intended to promote the industrial and commercial welfare of the country, while at the same time conserving and safeguarding the rights and interests of all the people; and

Whereas to fully consult the judgment of the country and arrive at a clear and unmistakable understanding of its desires regarding the various features of the proposed legislation will require more time and consideration than is possible at the present session of Congress, and it would therefore seem to be the part of wisdom to postpone final action until the next session of Congress, utilizing the intervening time in ascertaining the sense of the country concerning the proposed legislation, which is undoubtedly the most important and far-reaching in its influence of any question that has come before Congress for decision in a long series of years: Now, therefore, be it

Resolved by the Humboldt Chamber of Commerce, representing the business and commercial interests of the City of Eureka and of the County of Humboldt, State of California, That the Congress of the United States of America is hereby earnestly requested to postpone final action upon the pending antitrust legislation until its next session, and that the intervening time be employed in ascertaining the sense of the people of the whole country toward the various features of the proposed laws, with a view to so perfecting them that a united and deliberate public sentiment shall stand firmly behind these measures, if enacted; and be it further

Resolved, That duly attested copies of these resolutions be forwarded to each of the Senators and Representatives in Congress from the State of California, and that they each be earnestly requested to advocate and work for the postponement of action petitioned for herein.

SALARIES OF CAPITOL POLICE.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. From the Committee on Appropriations I report a joint resolution and ask for its immediate consideration.

The joint resolution (S. J. Res. 159) authorizing and directing the transfer of a certain unexpended balance in appropriations for salaries of Capitol police was read the first time by its title and the second time at length, as follows:

Resolved, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he hereby is, authorized and directed to transfer any unexpended balance of the appropriation for "Salaries, Capitol police, House of Representatives," for the fiscal year 1914 remaining to the credit of the Clerk of the House of Representatives, to the Secretary of the Senate of the United States, and to be disbursed by him in payment of salaries of Capitol police.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia asks unanimous consent for the present consideration of the joint resolution. Is there objection?

There being no objection, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

STEAM LAUNCH "LOUISE."

Mr. ROOT. By direction of the Committee on Foreign Relations I report back favorably the bill (S. 5739) to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government, and I submit a report (No. 591) thereon. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill. When it has been read I will state the reasons for its passage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill will be read.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That, as a mark of appreciation of the sacrifices and services of the French people in the construction of the Panama Canal, the steam launch Louise, built in France in 1885, and employed in the construction of the canal successively by the French Panama Canal Co. and by the United States, be put in good condition and presented to the French Government; and that, in the first formal or ceremonial opening or passage of the canal, the place of honor be accorded to the said steam launch, bearing the flag of the French Republic.

SEC. 2. That the sum of $6,000 is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay the expense of executing this act, to be disbursed by the governor of the Canal Zone.

Mr. ROOT. Mr. President, the Secretary of War, the Secretary of State, the governor of the Canal Zone, and the French Government have all been consulted and expressed their entire approval of this act of courtesy, and the Committee on Foreign Relations reports the bill unanimously.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I wish to say that I am in hearty accord with the bill. I think it is very appropriate; but I notice one clause which provides that when this ship passes through in the place of honor when the canal is opened it shall bear the flag of the French Government. I have no objection. I will say, to its bearing the flag of the French Government; I think that also is very appropriate; but it seems to me there might possibly be a construction put upon it that no other flag should be borne. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if the expectation is that the American flag will not also be borne on the vessel?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly not. Each vessel sails under its own flag.

Mr. NORRIS. I should like to inquire of the Senator if he thinks it would be inappropriate for the flag of the French Government and also the flag of our Government to be unfurled on that ship?

Mr. ROOT. I think we can leave that to the French Government. I would not make conditions in doing an act of courtesy.

Mr. NORRIS. I would not make any condition; but when this vessel is going through, if that is to be the only flag on board, it does not seem to me to be quite proper. I want to accord to France all the honor—and a great deal is due her—on the occasion, and I think it very appropriate; I am very glad the committee have reported the bill to present this vessel to the French Government; but we ought not to belittle our own work in the Panama Canal, and the first vessel that goes through ought to bear the American flag as well as the French flag.

Mr. O'GORMAN. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to his colleague?

Mr. ROOT. Certainly.

Mr. O'GORMAN. No more gracious compliment could be paid to the French Republic than to do what is proposed by the bill reported by my colleague. If this French vessel is accorded this honor, it should properly fly the flag of her own country. Whatever else may be done in giving place to our flag may be left to the courtesy of the French Nation. As my colleague suggests, it surely should not be imposed as a condition.

It is not necessary, in view of what was said by the Senator from Nebraska, to recite the reasons which prompt this act of courtesy on our part. The French made great sacrifices of men and treasure in the early days of the construction of the Panama Canal. In times past our flags have been united at critical stages in our national history. We need no assurance even by the commingling and unity of flags that a warm and cordial sentiment of fraternal affection exists between the two Republics. We can never forget the ancient friendship which led the French Nation to come to our rescue in the Revolution when we had no other friend in all the wide world.

I trust my friend, the distinguished Senator from Nebraska, who seems to appreciate this legislation as highly as any other Member of the Senate, will not insist upon modifying or altering the bill which has had the careful consideration of the Committee on Foreign Relations, and which is reported here with the unanimous recommendation of that committee.

Mr. NORRIS. I do not want any intimation to be made here that I am in any way opposed to the bill. I do not want anyone to gather from what the Senator from New York has said that I am opposed to any provision contained in it. On the other hand, I am most heartily in accord with it. I feel like congratulating the Committee on Foreign Relations for bringing in the bill.

The French people have made great sacrifices and this action is very appropriate, it seems to me; but I understood the senior Senator from New York to say in answer to my inquiry that it was the intention that there should be no other flag borne on the vessel.

While I am admitting the sacrifices made by the French Government in the construction of the canal and also the long friendship which has existed between our Government and France, and remembering also the assistance that we received from that Government in early days when we were sadly in need of it, and I do not want anyone to get the idea that I would put anything in the way of paying any tribute of honor and respect to the French Government; but at the same time I would not want to belittle our own Government or forget that we have made great sacrifices, and that after all the crowning glory of the Panama Canal is as much ours as that of any other people in the world. It seems to me it would be very appropriate that the French flag should be unfurled on this vessel when it is leading the procession of honor through the Panama Canal, but I would be sadly disappointed, and I believe the American citizens would, if our flag should be excluded.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I appreciate fully the patriotic sentiment of my friend the Senator from Nebraska, but it seems to me that the situation is about like this: The French vessel goes through under the French flag, surrounded or followed by our ships under our flag. It is very much the same as if we were to entertain for the time being officers of the Army or Navy of another nation. We would hardly want to ask them to put on the shoulder straps and the insignia of our Army or Navy; they would be our guests and with their own decorations.

Of course I could not with the love I entertain for the United States flag, to which I have owed allegiance for many long years, see it in any way belittled, but I think in this case it would be enlarged in an act of courtesy, and generous courtesy, and it would be entirely in place to have the vessel itself carry the French flag. If those in charge of the vessel wish to also add the United States flag, all right, but we shall have our insignia there on the accompanying vessels of this country. Our vessels will float our flag.

It is true the French commenced this work and we have finished it, and the one French flag will be added to a number of those of the United States.

Mr. WORKS. Mr. President, I would suppose as the result of the passage of this bill and its execution that this vessel will have become the property of the French Republic when it passes through the canal. It seems to me it would be rather an indelicate thing for us to ask the French Government to carry our flag upon its vessels. I think, as the Senator from New York has suggested, that we might very well leave that question to the French Republic itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the prseent consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS] said that we will extend every courtesy to the Government of France, which we are doing out of the goodness of our hearts, and I think it is only meet and proper that we should leave it to the good judgment of the French Government to return the courtesy. I do not think there is any question when the time comes that the French Government will even try to outdo us in honor to our Nation. So I think there is no reason why the matter should be mentioned in the bill.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I am heartily in favor of the bill, but I think we ought to have a quorum when it is considered, especially when we are meeting at 11 o'clock. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Bankhead	Johnson	Page	Smoot
Borah	Jones	Perkins	Sterling
Brady	Kenyon	Poindexter	Sutherland
Bristow	Kern	Root	Swanson
Bryan	Lane	Shafroth	Thomas

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce that the senior Senator from Oregon [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] is absent and that he is paired with the junior Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. TOWNSEND. I desire to announce that the senior Senator from Michigan [Mr. SMITH] is ill this morning.

Mr. BRANDEGEE. Mr. President, the members of the Committee on Interstate Commerce, which is now in session, have requested me to announce that they are engaged in consideration of public business, and hence have not appeared and answered to the roll call this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Fifty-two Senators have answered to the roll call. There is a quorum present. The bill is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

CRIMINAL PROCEDURE IN ENGLAND (S. DOC. NO. 495).

Mr. FLETCHER. On the 27th ultimo the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] presented a pamphlet on Criminal Procedure in England, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by that committee to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 389) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

I am directed by that committee to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 390) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the communication transmitted to the Senate on May 22, 1914, by the Secretary of Labor, in response to a resolution of November 10, 1913, the same being a compilation of all Federal and State laws relating to convict labor, be printed as a Senate document.

CREEK EQUALIZATION FUND (S. DOC. NO. 492).

Mr. FLETCHER. On yesterday the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. GORE] presented certain manuscript relating to the equalization of Creek allotments and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by that committee to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 391) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the manuscript submitted by Mr. GORE on June 11, 1914, entitled "Equalizing Creek allotments," by R. C. Allen, national attorney for the Creek Nation, be printed as a Senate document.

RATES ON SUGAR (S. DOC. NO. 493).

Mr. SMOOT. On the 28th ultimo the chairman of the Interstate Commerce Commission transmitted to the Senate, in response to a resolution of May 26, 1914, a copy of the transcript of testimony taken before the commission with respect to rates on sugar, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by that committee to report a resolution, for which I ask present consideration.

There being no objection, the resolution (S. Res. 392) was read, considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the communication transmitted to the Senate on May 28, 1914, by the Interstate Commerce Commission in response to a resolution of May 26, 1914, the same being a transcript of certain testimony taken before said commission with respect to rates on sugar, be printed as a Senate document.

DONIPHAN'S EXPEDITION.

Mr. CHILTON. On the 26th ultimo the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE] presented to the Senate an article giving an account of the celebrated expedition led by Gen. Doniphan from Missouri into New Mexico and on to Chihuahua, Old Mexico, and other points during the Mexican War, and it was referred to the Committee on Printing for action. I am directed by that committee to report a resolution (S. Res. 393), which I ask may be placed on the calendar.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be placed on the calendar.

AMENDMENTS TO APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. SMOOT submitted an amendment authorizing the Government exhibit board to determine the nature, character, and extent of the exhibits of the United States Government to be made at the Panama Pacific International Exposition, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. SWANSON submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $12,000 for the purchase by the Public Printer from the publisher of 100,000 copies of McBride's Copyright History of the Federal Elections, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Printing and ordered to be printed.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the river and harbor appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Commerce and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $5,000 for the preparation of designs and estimates for the National Archives Building, Washington, D. C., etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

Mr. LEA of Tennessee submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $50,000 to reimburse the National Conservation Exposition Co., of Knoxville, Tenn., for expenses incurred in transporting, installing, and maintaining, and other circumstances incidentally and connected with the Government exhibit at the National Conservation Exposition during the fall of 1913, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

He also submitted an amendment proposing to appropriate $2,500 to remove the fence and wall around the Botanic Gardens, etc., intended to be proposed by him to the sundry civil appropriation bill, which was referred to the Committee on Appropriations and ordered to be printed.

DONATION OF CANNON.

Mr. THOMPSON submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 5495) authorizing the Secretary of War to make certain donations of condemned cannon and cannon balls, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

RADIUM-BEARING ORES.

Mr. BORAH submitted an amendment intended to be proposed by him to the bill (S. 4405) to provide for and encourage the prospecting, mining, and treatment of radium-bearing ores in lands belonging to the United States, for the purpose of securing an adequate supply of radium for Government and other hospitals in the United States, and for other purposes, which was ordered to lie on the table and be printed.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS—FREDERICK MARSHALL.

On motion of Mr. WORKS, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of Frederick Marshall, S. 495, Sixty-third Congress, be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR CLAPP (S. DOC. NO. 491).

Mr. KENYON. I have a copy of an address delivered by the Senator from Minnesota [Mr. CLAPP] at Gettysburg, Pa., on the 30th of May last. I ask that the address may be printed in the RECORD and also as a Senate document.

There being no objection, the address was ordered to be printed as a Senate document and also to be printed in the RECORD, as follows:

"MEMORIAL DAY ADDRESS.

"ADDRESS DELIVERED BY HON. MOSES E. CLAPP AT GETTYSBURG, PA., MAY 30, 1914.

"Making due allowance for the manifest exaggeration of ancient history, the Civil War was without doubt the most gigantic struggle the world has ever witnessed. Viewed in the light of its relation to history, it stands without a parallel. Christianity brought into the current of human activities a force which, in the chain of sequence, was destined to sooner or later lead man to the goal of free government. But whether when this goal was reached there would be found in the association thus developed, in a case where the element of fear of a common enemy was wanting, that cohesive force necessary to resist the claim of the right of withdrawal from the association, when such claim was made by a large body of its citizens, was perhaps too problematical to class the result of the test as a link in the chain of historic sequence. That test was the fundamental involved in the Civil War, and in the light of that fact it may well be said that Gettysburg beyond question was the most important battle in the annals of warfare. It was the turning point in a struggle which in turn was the turning point in the life of a nation, and that nation undoubtedly is in turn destined to be the instrumentality through which, next to the transition from paganism to Christianity, the greatest transition in human history is to be accomplished, namely, the transfer of human energy involved in the transition from war to peace.

"For centuries war was the rule and peace the exception; wars waged in part to maintain the power of sovereignty, but more often waged in the spirit of conquest to add to its dominion. During those centuries that impersonal spirit which sought to dominate humanity for its own aggrandizement utilized the human force upon the field of battle, and as man approached the point where war was destined to be the exception and peace the rule this human energy which had been exploited in war naturally turned to the more peaceful field of industrial activities. But the spirit which had exploited mankind through the centuries in war did not itself cease to exist as peace came to be the rule and war the exception. We find it to-day seeking to establish in the activities of industrial life that dominion which it finally lost upon the battle field, and if this Republic has any mission in history more than to give to the world something of the radiated spirit of free government that mission is to meet this new condition and develop that industrial justice which must some day be the logical sequence of the political justice established by those who have gone before us, for somewhere and at some time it will be the mission of free government—that is, democracy—to develop industrial justice, for industrial justice is the natural sequence of political justice. Whether that result in the ultimate is the mission of this Republic time alone will tell, but that we have entered the initial stage of the struggle looking to that end is plain to anyone who studies the relation of cause and effect developed through the force of natural law related to human activities.

"The spirit of power and dominion which for so many centuries made the battle field the outlet for human energy and the graveyard of humanity, while its goal was political power, now, in its newer struggle, it makes the power of inordinate wealth its goal, and the unjust acquisition and unfair use of such wealth the instrumentalities of the struggle by which to reach the goal of its ambition.

"No nation can work 'out a great career without wealth. Wealth is essential to a nation's development. While this is true, it is equally true that the unjust acquisition of wealth and its unjust use constitute the real menace to the spirit of free institutions. In other words, as with most things, it depends upon whether it is made to serve common welfare or permitted to play the rôle of master.

"We can not too strongly emphasize the difference between wealth on the one hand and its improper acquisition and improper use on the other. One is the ally as well as the natural product of the development of free government, the other its deadliest foe; and the failure to emphasize this difference has led to much confusion and brought much unjust criticism upon those who have raised a warning voice but failed to make clear this difference—the difference between real service on the one hand and unjust dominion upon the other. The improper acquisition and improper use of wealth in some form lies behind every assault upon a people's welfare, whether that welfare is considered from the viewpoint of the material, moral, or political; and, in fact, in free government the material, moral, and political welfare of a people are so interwoven that they may well be grouped under the general designation of 'welfare.'

"Under the old order of things the overlord, amid pomp and ceremony, received the tribute of his vassals, while the petit baron accomplished the same unjust result by descending upon the unwary traveler, the difference in the unjust imposition being rather in the pomp accompanying it than in the nature of the robbery itself. And so to-day, the difference between the man who has fattened upon special privilege and, so far as the unfair taking is concerned, has violated a moral if not a civil law, and who now uses the fruits of that violation to poison the source of information, to dwarf and divert the spirit emanating from institutions of learning, and to silence and appease the outraged sentiment by the gloved hand that conceals a curse but seeks to show forth in the form of a supposed benefaction, and the man of the underworld who thrives upon vice and with his ill-gotten gains pollutes, locally and at its source, the political activities which surround him, is largely the difference between the overlord and the petit baron of other days.

"This sinister force menaces free government at every point, and, like a beleaguering army, sends forth its sappers and miners to prepare the way for the assaulting columns. In the old struggle the weapons were the battle-ax and spear, and later the cannon and musket, the scaffold and dungeon; while in this new struggle are the glitter and glamour of wealth; its supposed power to withhold or bestow benefactions; its dwarfing of courage and enslavement of mind. Already we have in this country too many who feel that the few should sit around the banquet board heaped so high that some crumbs must fall, and the gathering of those crumbs be regarded as a privilege bestowed upon the masses. There are too many who, in fear and trembling, accept the crumbs, forgetful of the fact that wealth is the product of the activities of all, although its gathering may be the activities of the few; and that the activities of all, being the real source of the combined wealth of the country, to prevent an inequitable and unjust assembling and unjust use of wealth in the hands of the few, is the real problem, or, to paraphrase the expression of Lincoln, the real struggle of the ages is between those who create and those who assimilate.

"The so-called 'captain of industry' who unites existing activities and capitalizes the statutes, or who unites credit in the development of new activities, does not create wealth; that is created by the activities of all. Every overcapitalization, every combination, finds its stock-market value not alone in the wealth created or contributed by those who organize it, not alone in increased efficiency—for the crushing of competition and establishment of monopoly does not develop efficiency—but in their power to collect and the capacity of the people to pay the tolls it expects to impose upon the people for the privilege of using their own highway, the highway of industrial progress. We have too many who are forgetful of the fact that the mailed hand that shows forth its purpose is far less dangerous than the gloved hand which destroys while it conceals its purpose. And yet there is a bright side to this picture, for more and more the American people are awakening to a realization of their situation. More and more they fear that intellectual slavery which is designed to be and is the natural result of pretended benefactions which come not in the form of restitution but for the undoubted purpose of stifling sentiment, dwarfing and diverting judgment, and enslaving mentality. More and more the American people say: If we have not schools, libraries, and hospitals enough, it is better that we build them ourselves, that they may be ours; that in the sacrifice which their building and maintenance involves we may quicken the spirit of sacrifice and deepen the appreciation of its fruits, recognizing the spirit of gratitude to that composite citizenship, ever ready and willing to bear the burdens of a complex civilization, rather than in the building and maintenance by the individual we may see the loss of independence of spirit and a perverted sense of gratitude.

"Schools, libraries, and hospitals, when built by the people, are the visible marks of development, and the sacrifice involved serves as an inspiration; but when built by the individual they are the visible demonstration of the taking in excess of a fair equation, and afford just ground for suspicion, especially when made by those who seek to thwart and evade the progressive spirit that lies behind governmental control, or resisting the efforts of justice to enforce that spirit, that the pretended benefaction is but an ill-concealed effort to appease a just sense of resentment and to stifle that spirit which should control its activities, and if not to redistribute, at least to prevent in the future the taking of the excess. More and more the American people are awakening to the concept of the thought in their relation to this spirit that first unfairly takes and then unjustly uses, and to say to it, 'We do not want yours; we want ours.'

"The lesson of Gettysburg proves that a nation can survive civil strife, for standing here to-day we may see in shadowy squadrons the living hosts that met in battle here. We can see men marching down into the valley of death with a dauntless courage that makes mockery of fear; again we hear the moan of the dying, the shout of the living. We can hear again the sob of the widow and orphan, but we can not forget that back of that battling host there was a spirit of patriotism that subordinated self to the sense of service. While we all will agree to-day that upon one side there was a mistaken judgment, none will question but that both hosts were prompted by a spirit of unselfish sacrifice, and in the mourning homes of that day, North and South, the dark pall of grief that shadowed the heart of motherhood, widowhood, and childhood was pierced by one illuminating ray—the thought that the sacrifice was for humanity.

"Nations can survive the clash of arms where achievement leaves such a legacy of patriotic inspiration, but no nation can long survive such scenes as at Ludlow, where inordinate greed and desire for unlimited power subordinates everything to its purpose, and the struggle leaves, not a legacy of patriotic inspiration, but rather one of malignant hate and undying resentment.

"The spectacle of the great strike at Homestead a few years ago is a picture every American would gladly blot from the pages of our country's history; but the wreck and havoc then wrought by the hand of lawless force, deplorable as it was, is dwarfed almost beyond the reach of vision when compared with the wreckage of American independence of thought since wrought, through intellectual enslavement, by the use of the millions which a deluded public paid as a tribute to false sentiment of industrial supremacy, and the millions added through the questionable process of the capitalization of a commercial greed which, in the main, could only in the end be realized upon by the destruction of competition and establishment of monopoly.

"We have no apology for lawless force, although it must be borne in mind that every protest is related somewhere to the parent of protests, oppression. While lawless force should be deprecated, it is no such menace to the spirit of free government as lawless wealth, for lawless force weakens itself in the very opposition which it develops among the people, while with lawless wealth it is a part of its purpose, the logic of its use, that it destroy opposition by controlling activities, by diverting judgment and enslaving mentality. It is not the mailed hand but the gloved hand that in all ages has retarded human progress and is to-day the real menace to free government.

"It will not do for us as a people to content ourselves with the thought that the sole mission of this Republic is to see itself reflected in a rapidly developing republican spirit throughout the world. We may well rejoice that such has been the result of the establishment of this Republic, and every American may well feel a thrill of pride as he contemplates a world-wide tendency to a transition from monarchy to republic. But we can not develop, nor even preserve, the spirit of our own institutions by simply basking in the sunlight of a reflected effulgence, even though it may be traced to the influence radiating from the Republic which we have established.

"No nation ever fell before external forces until first weakened by internal forces. In all ages a favorite instrument in the hands of that power which enslaved and oppressed was the dazzling picture of foreign conquest, ever so effectively employed to deaden the sensibilities of a people to the wrong and oppression visited upon them. Proud of our influence in the world-wide sphere of thought, purpose, and development, as we have a right to be, let us not make the mistake of those who have gone before, but realize that our mission in the world and our duty to the world, broad, grand, and splendid as it may be, is secondary to our mission in the development of a true democracy at home and a duty to ourselves in preserving our institutions from that same foe to which can be traced the wreck and ruin of empire in the past. So, too, of our boasted world-wide industrial triumph. It may appeal to our pride to be told that the products of our industrial activity are to be found everywhere, indicating the early coming of a world-wide industrial supremacy, but such pride must not blind us to the deplorable condition prevailing at the great centers of industry, and must not blind us to the fact of the awful toll of life, misery, and human decadence such supremacy exacts. We can not still the voice of protest nor conceal the wreckage of humanity in the reflection only of a world-wide industrial supremacy.

"The first and all-important industrial triumph which we should achieve is the triumph of industrial justice at home, and in contemplating the reflected glory born of our republican institutions we must not allow the sense of our mission to the world to blind us to a sense of our duty to America.

"In our struggle against this power, it will not do to yield to the very instrument which is used so effectively in its resistance to the growth of political rights. Chief among these was the force of tradition. At every step of human progress there has been a spirit of Toryism which appealed to the sanctity of the past. That same appeal is made to-day, the sacredness of tradition, and that, too, in spite of the patent fact that every step of human progress has been, and is, either the abandonment or the condemnation of that which went before. Another favorite instrument in the hands of wrong ever has been and is to-day an exhortation to revere what is held up as a false concept of law, because in proportion as man can be made to feel that there is some vague abstraction which is responsible for the burdens which he bears, he is, in a measure, reconciled to the burden, because he is unable to trace it to its real author.

"Of course, there are some rules of civil conduct so long established, so plain of purpose, relating to the intercourse of man with man, as to require no interpretation and have come to be recognized as fixed rules of conduct, but in that sphere of activities where the rights of a people are concerned; in that struggle to prevent the unjust acquisition through the unjust imposition of burdens upon all; in that struggle to establish a real democracy, political and industrial; in that eternal struggle between the past and present, involving as it does growth of power in government to meet the spirit which would subordinate government to the interests of the few; to assume that we have inherited an infallible abstraction known as the 'law,' is illogical. In the sense of such an abstraction, as a fixed law, governing the ever new and varied phases of the struggle, there can be no such thing as 'government by law.' Law for to-day may or may not be law for to-morrow. From the very nature of things, in this sense, government must be government by man, for in the sense that there is somewhere a force, an abstraction called 'law,' disassociated from man acting in the twilight zone of discretion, in the making and administration of rules, there never was and never will be such a thing as 'government by law.'

"From the moment when a legislative policy is a mere shadowy, undeveloped concept in the brain of some man until that policy has been wrought into legislation, and again worked out through judicial construction, and again through the activities of administrative function to the point where some one standing before the bar of justice is directed to go hence acquit or receives a sentence imposing a penalty, at every step it is the result of some man's decision, largely free to adopt one course or the other, and acting all the time within that twilight zone of discretion wherein at one extreme a court may solemnly read into a statute words which a legislature has just as solemnly refused to put in the statute to the other extreme where a mere bailiff can harden or soften the personal comfort of the individual committed to his care under sentence of the court.

"We must, therefore, realize that where there is a wrong, where there is an injustice, there is a human, not an abstract responsibility for such wrong or injustice. There is no slavery so abject as the slavery of fetichism, the blind worship of an abstraction. It was an abstraction, the claim of monarchy, of the divine right to rule, that so long held the human mind fettered and enslaved; and it was only as man began to unmask this fetich of royalty and saw the human, saw that there was nothing but a human exercising the power of wrong and oppression, that he grasped the broad concept of the relation of man to man and caught the vision of that equation of human rights which substitutes justice in behalf of all for the prestige of an abstraction, which has always been the weapon of the few. So we can not emphasize too strongly in this struggle the necessity for looking back and behind every wrong to discover the human force that is responsible for that wrong.

"We must, of course, have due regard for law and ever seek to cure its miscarriage through orderly methods; still, we must recognize that the principle of justice is the only abstraction to reverence, and for every wrong committed and every unjust burden imposed we must trace it to the human agency that is responsible for it, because it is only in proportion as we disillusionize the abstraction and see the human behind the injustice and wrong that we awaken to the sense of the imposition and seek a remedy for its abatement. Law there is and must be, but it is that law worked out through the will and purpose of fallible man acting, in the main, as a self-determining agent, and for a reverence for an abstraction we should substitute a reverence for the principle of justice, which, in turn, should be the guiding spirit of those intrusted, for the time being, with the making and enforcement of the rules of civil conduct, realizing that in free government man is the instrument through which we seek to place, against the injustice of the few, that broad spirit of justice that can only spring from an equally broad equation of humanity.

"Although, perhaps, not strictly germane to this argument, we should remember, on the other hand, that every benefaction which comes from what we call 'government' comes from that broad equation of humanity of which government is the visible evidence of the association, and that every material benefit involving appropriations must first come from the taxpayers themselves—the people—and a just appreciation of this fact would lessen an ofttimes thoughtless demand upon the resources of government, thoughtless because we fail to realize that every dollar expended must first be garnered from the taxpayers.

"Another instrument, or, rather, slogan, of the old struggle was the inhuman cry, 'The survival of the fittest.' This cry we still hear echoed to-day; but we must remember it is the law of the brute world and had its place where everything was subordinated to inordinate greed of power, and man was but the plaything of that brutal spirit personified by such power. The very fundamental of democracy is the right of all to exist. If all are to reap the benefits of the human association called 'government;' all must participate in the making and administration of its policies. If we are to lift ourselves above the level of animal life, if we are to recognize that one man has a right which another man must respect, we must abandon the cry which is the keynote of mere brute existence, 'The survival of the fittest.' It has no place in free government except so far as it relates to purely intellectual supremacy, and even in the sphere of intellectual supremacy we must sometimes protect the weak as against the strong. In the clash and conflict of thoughts and ideas, that which has been proved best by the only test this side of Divine judgment, the ripened verdict of a people, must triumph. Civilization can not adjust itself to a principle, when applied to the material world, to the right to the enjoyment of the comforts of life, an axiom that is the dominant law of brute life and found its only place in human activities while the brute instinct predominated.

"The remedy for industrial injustice must be found in the genesis of man's struggle for political justice. He first awakened to the thought that the glitter and glamour of royalty was unreal, and then to the thought that no man, no truly human being, was ever good enough to be the self-constituted guardian of the welfare of another; then to the thought which was the real mainspring of progress toward civil liberty, viz, that man was not made to be laid as a sacrifice on the altar of royal ambition; and then he grasped the thought that even the moat-protected parapet was powerless to stay God's eternal purpose of justice, wrought out through human sacrifice, and then it blossomed forth into free government in the realization that common welfare should be the goal of human association and that humanity, in the concrete, is able, under Divine guidance, to develop its own instrumentalities. And so in this new struggle to meet error we must uncover error. We must no longer be dazzled by the glamour of wealth; we must recognize that in this struggle it is man for man; we must recognize that no man is good enough to be permitted to constitute himself the guardian of public welfare; we must recognize that man was no more created to serve as a sacrifice to inordinate greed and unrestrained commercialism than he was created to serve as a sacrifice to royal pomp and ambition; we must recognize that buttressed wrong is to-day as powerless as granite parapet was in the past against the resistless purpose of a free people. For selfish greed we must substitute patriotism and then we will discover that man, in the concrete, is just as capable of establishing and maintaining industrial justice as he was in establishing and maintaining political justice; in other words, the establishment of real democracy.

"The opponents of democracy assert that for the evils of democracy we seek to apply more democracy. We should, however, distinguish between the evils of a system, if it has any, and those evils which are foreign to it, and find lodgment there only through the instrumentality of forces opposed to the system. The betrayal and perversion of democracy is not the test of democracy. There is a vast difference between democracy and hypocrisy, although the latter may seek to masquerade as democracy. Democracy means government by the people. Real democracy either contains within itself the elements of the solution of this problem or those who have laid down their lives in the effort to reach democracy have sacrificed in vain. We can not believe this sacrifice has been in vain, for back of the spirit of sacrifice planted in the breast of man there must have been a divine purpose to the fruition of which sacrifice was essential.

"Every great achievement has a dual existence. It lives related to those who achieved. It may also live related to the great movements of humanity, but it has often happened in the past that the flower of a nation's manhood wrote into history some great achievement which, as their achievement, became immortal; but the fruit of the sacrifice was lost by those for whom it was made, and, aside from the achievement showing forth the valor and patriotism of those who wrought it, it has ceased to be of historic significance.

"Gettysburg, as related to those who burned its name into the page of history, will live forever. The achievement of those who, in their victory here, made Gettysburg the turning point in a struggle which involved a nation's life will remain immortal. That immortality you and your comrades, living and dead, secured. It is yours, sacredly yours, and no betrayal of this legacy which we have inherited can ever rob you of that crown of heroic valor, of unselfish patriotism, the luster of which will brighten as time goes on. No betrayal of the legacy which we have inherited can rob you of the immortality of your achievement. On the other hand, whether Gettysburg becomes immortal, as related to one of the greatest transitions in the history of the race, will depend upon whether the American Republic is destined to only serve as a medium from which man passed from monarchy to republic and from which mankind will project itself into a deeper and broader fruition of democracy; or whether this Republic, in itself, shall solve the problems born of the transition from the old to the new, and this depends upon us and those who are to follow. God grant that the American people, in preserving this legacy, may make Gettysburg as immortal in its relation to the story of humanity as those who battled here made it immortal in the annals of heroic achievement.

"For one I believe that the mission of our Republic is something more than to merely give to mankind as its contribution a world-wide extension of free government; that its real mission is deeper and broader than that, being the development of that real democracy that means industrial as well as political justice, and that our people will find the inspiration to this in recalling the achievements of yourselves and your departed comrades, for nowhere in history is there such inspiration. In all ages man has gone forth to battle, obedient to one of three conditions. He was inspired by the lust of conquest, or he went obedient to the conscript law, or the instinct of self-defense steeled his heart and strengthened his arm while he waged the warfare of defense. But in sixty-one there was no thought of conquest, you scarcely knew what the conscript law meant, and no instinct of self-defense born of imperiled fireside prompted you. But lifted to a plane where manhood had never stood before, you went forth to battle and to die that the spirit of free institutions might be preserved. As with the manhood of sixty-one, so with the womanhood of sixty-one. In all ages woman has cheered man when he has gone forth to battle; sometimes she has shared in the lust of conquest; again, she has yielded, with man, obedience to the conscription; and, again, she has shared with him in the instinct of defense, but the womanhood of sixty-one was lifted to a plane where womanhood had never stood before. There was no thought of conquest, scarcely a knowledge of conscript law, and no imperiled fireside; but the womanhood of sixty-one stood where she bade manhood go forth to battle and die for the spirit of free institutions. We must not forget that it is not man alone who sacrifices in war, for it detracts nothing from the meed of praise due you to say that you had the inspiration born of the comradeship of brave men, but the womanhood of sixty-one knew nothing of that. No waving banners, no martial music, no comradeship of brave men in camp and on battle line, but alone she kept her vigils and bore her burden as only woman can. Surely, inspired by the memory of the heroism and patriotism of that day, inspired by the mute eloquence of the graves of our heroic dead, the American people can not be recreant to that trust which your sacrifice committed to their care."

PENSIONS AND INCREASE OF PENSIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate the action of the House of Representatives disagreeing to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 12045) granting pensions and increase of pensions to certain soldiers and sailors of the Civil War and certain widows and dependent children of soldiers and sailors of said war, and requesting a conference with the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon.

Mr. SHIVELY. I move that the Senate insist upon its amendments, agree to the conference asked for by the House, the conferees on the part of the Senate to be appointed by the Chair.

The motion was agreed to; and the Vice President appointed Mr. SHIVELY, Mr. JOHNSON, and Mr. SMOOT conferees on the part of the Senate.

LABOR TROUBLES IN COLORADO.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate a joint resolution introduced on the 5th instant by the Senator from Oklahoma [Mr. OWEN], which the Secretary will read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. J. Res. 158) providing for the appointment of a commission to settle the labor conditions in Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, this joint resolution was introduced on the last legislative day, and at my request it was laid on the table under the rule. Its purpose is obvious and was evidently modeled after the procedure of President Roosevelt, who, it will be remembered, in 1901 appointed a commission, to which both of the contending sides in the anthracite coal strike of that year submitted their respective differences and which happily resulted in their adjustment, and I think there has been no serious disturbance in the locality affected by that controversy since that time.

Now, I hope—and I therefore shall not object to the reference of the joint resolution—that in the event of its passage its purpose will address itself to the good sense and the deliberate judgment of both sides to the unfortunate controversy which has made the State which I in part represent here so conspicuous during the last few months. Whether it will have such effect, of course, depends upon those in conflict in that State and upon a sound public opinion which should favor this or any other practical solution of the trouble. If they shall contribute to the attainment of a common understanding, as was done in the precedent which forms the basis of the joint resolution, they will, of course, benefit themselves, to say nothing of the noncombatants, who are always the chief sufferers in the situation.

I do not flatter myself, Mr. President, that since the announcement of those upon one side of this controversy they will immediately acquiesce in the jurisdiction of the commission which the President, in the event of the enactment of this joint resolution, will doubtless assign to the task contemplated by it.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Indiana?

Mr. THOMAS. I do.

Mr. KERN. I ask the Senator from Colorado to which side he refers?

Mr. THOMAS. If the Senator will be patient, I will answer that question very soon.

And yet, as time passes, I indulge the hope that, in view of the grave importance of the controversy and the overwhelming need of its adjustment so that the people may pursue their usual avocations and the State may resume the discharge of its normal functions and the General Government be relieved of the duty of performing them, the contending parties may be able to agree to the plan as a satisfactory solution of the difficulty.

The Senator from Indiana inquired to which side I referred in my statement which was made at the time of his interruption. I referred to the operators, who, shortly after the events at Ludlow, exclusive of the Colorado Fuel & Iron Co., but which is in harmony with them, so declared in resolutions which were published in the Associated Press dispatches, and copies of which, I presume, were sent to the different Members of both Houses.

Of course, Mr. President, I do not indorse their conclusions, for the public interest is left out of the problem. It must, nevertheless, be remembered that the coal-mine operators in the State of Colorado, quite numerous and consisting of a number of independent concerns, some of them small in extent and all of them entirely legitimate enterprises and carrying on extensive operations, have been included within, and the popular mind has conceived of them as identical with, the greater concerns which dominate the situation. This is true of the time covered by the strike but not previous to that period. A great many of these coal operators have suffered very severely in consequence of these troubles, although not responsible for them, or, at least, not as much so as the others, thus illustrating the natural law that the consequences of men's misdeeds and lawless purposes fall far more heavily upon the innocent than upon the guilty.

I can well understand, Mr. President, how some of these people, smarting under the tremendous destruction of property which has befallen them, face to face with financial ruin, and with the not by any means remote possibility that their smaller properties may ultimately be gathered up into the greater organizations, feel that they have nothing to arbitrate with the authors of their suffering and will not under any circumstances consider any proposition designed for the determination of the controversy of which they are among the victims and for which they feel that they were not responsible. We must make allowance for the operations of human nature, not only with the employed but with the employer; and as time passes it is becoming very apparent, at least to men who have been engaged in gathering information from all possible sources, that this, like all great controversies, has two sides, that wrongs and violations of law, and crime, if you please, have been committed by both sides of the controversy. We must also make allowance for the play of aroused passion which is inherent in human nature everywhere, and which, when usurping reason, makes the calm and just consideration of right and of wrong practically impossible until time shall have passed and sober reflection shall have enabled men to think and act with calmness.

Mr. President, as a typical instance of the attitude of some of the smaller operators in connection with this subject, and as giving some reasons for their announced determination, I may be pardoned for referring to a statement received not long ago from one of them, the Sunnyside Mining Co., of southern Colorado. I feel justified in vouching for it, because of my personal knowledge of and close acquaintance with those who compose the company.

This company is a small concern; it has been reasonably prosperous, and has had trouble with no one anywhere. This is the statement which the company makes, through its officers, of its attitude as one of the coal producers of southern Colorado, of the consequences which the strike has visited upon it, and its reasons for the conclusions which it has reached regarding arbitration.

This statement is signed by W. F. Oakes, the president of the company—a very upright and respected citizen of the city of Denver, and one who justly enjoys the confidence and respect of all who know him. He says:

The property of the Sunnyside Coal Mining Co. is situated in Huerfano County, Colo., 12½ miles northwest of Walsenburg.

The land operated comprises 480 acres, with three veins of bituminous coal, 5, 6½, and 7½ feet in thickness, respectively. Capacity is 700 tons daily.

The owners are W. F. Oakes, Ellen Terry Strong, and Milo W. Strong. The company is not affiliated with any outside interest. The executive head of the business is the president, W. F. Oakes, with general offices in the Gas & Electric Building.

The Sunnyside mines have worked for 10 years on the open-shop plan, making no distinction between union and nonunion labor, and selecting men best qualified to fill the various positions.

Prior to the strike call on September 23, 1913, not a single complaint had been made to the company by its employees, either collectively or individually, as to wages, hours, company store, company doctor, unsanitary conditions, or unsafe conditions in or about the mine—three men in 10 years killed. The few minor individual complaints were always promptly considered and adjusted.

The average wage in August, 1913, just prior to the strike, was $4.12½ per man per 8-hour day.

On Saturday, September 20, 1913, every man was paid off, and the president, W. F. Oakes, personally asked every man that stepped up to the pay window if he had any grievance against the company, and in every case the answer was "No." They simply responded to the strike call of the national organization for the "general cause" (whatever that was the men did not seem to know).

Early in November we reopened the mine with strictly nonunion labor, under a strong protection of the Colorado National Guard, and continued throughout the entire winter and until April 18, when we shut down temporarily for repairs.

A day or so later came the reports of the Ludlow trouble, and the "call to arms."

On Friday, April 24, 1914—

That was just four days after the Ludlow occurrence, Mr. President—a wild mob of 250 armed strikers swooped down upon only 16 people left in our camp, and drove them into the hills. They continued in complete possession until May 6, 1914.

That is a period of 12 days.

The company store was completely wrecked (inside), the entire front broken in, the entire stock of general merchandise stolen ($15,000), the post office robbed of everything—money, stamps, letters, and parcel-post packages. The company boarding house was pillaged, the men's club rooms looted, and every building in the camp was entered and everything of value taken or destroyed, a total loss of $26,000.

I have here photographs of the company store, both exterior and interior, and of the post office, taken some time ago, together with photographs showing their condition after possession was reobtained; showing, among other things, that the company's safe had been dynamited, evidently for purposes of pillage and robbery, which no provocation can justify. These photographs are subject to examination by any Member of the Senate who desires to look at them.

Mr. Oakes continues:

The management of the Sunnyside mines prided themselves for years that they had established such favorable conditions at their mines that they were enabled to procure the very best element of labor in the field.

Our company boarding house, with a capacity of 100 men, was constructed entirely with a view to comfort. Every room in the house was provided with a hot-water radiator, the floors were always kept clean; in front of each bed was a rug; each bed had two sheets, two pillowcases, one woollen blanket, two cotton comforters. The entire building was lighted with electric lights.

In the dining room we served but one table, seating every man at once. We employed the best Jap cooks, and used only the very best materials for our table.

In the basement of this cement building we had bath arrangements, hot and cold running water into porcelain bowls, something unheard of in any mining camp in Colorado.

In addition to this, we established a reading room and supplied all of the papers and periodicals free. We also established a library containing 250 books, and furnished the men with free stationery and envelopes.

We also furnished a hot bath adjacent to the mine for those that desired it.

Our schoolhouse is owned and maintained by the company, and was supplied with every modern appliance.

We also established a miners' club room, to combat the evil of the ordinary camp saloon. A great deal of money was spent in making this a comfortable loafing place for the men, and the hours in which they could buy drinks were limited from 4.30 in the afternoon to 10.30 at night. These goods were sold to the men at a low figure, with a view only of securing sufficient profit to maintain a manager of the place.

This means that the company store here was not that typical company store of which so much complaint is very properly and very justly made, but one maintained for the convenience of the men, as well, perhaps, as for their economic benefit, since the extra charge in the way of profit upon goods sold was sufficient only to pay the expenses of its operation.

I turn to the manuscript:

During working hours of the mine these clubrooms remained closed, also on Sundays.

The miners' clubrooms were completely wrecked and all stock stolen, pictures taken from the walls, phonograph records, chess boards, the cloth on the billiard table ruined, the cues and balls stolen, the barber-shop equipment badly damaged.

In the reading room magazines and books were mutilated, thrown outside, and every condition that had been created for the comfort of our employees was wantonly disregarded.

Our experiments along these lines, after studying the socialogical conditions of miners for 23 years, proved beyond any question of doubt that our theories in regard to improving the social conditions and uplifting the social plane were mere vagaries.

Of course, it is understood that I do not assent to all the conclusions of this gentleman. That is one which, in my judgment, is erroneous. Humanity and the kindly consideration of the welfare of others never can be wasted or unavailing or all history is a delusion:

Our most earnest efforts were simply rewarded by our final destruction, and at the hands of those whom we endeavored to benefit.

The only apparently unanswerable obstacle to a settlement with these striking miners is the recognition of the union, as almost every other material difference between the operator and the miner is covered by the existing law.

There is no law compelling the operator to recognize the union nor to permit the employees to exact that recognition. The statute does provide, however, for the right of the employee to join a union, if he so desires, without coercion or interference. We do not deny the right of our men to organize, so long as they do not interfere with our prerogatives to employ nonunion labor when we so desire it.

We will never agree to any contract that will oblige us to discharge the nonunion men now in our employ.

Mr. President, there is an infinite difference between such a company and one with the history of a larger concern in the strike district, which, prior to its present organization, at least, was the dictator of the political and economic affairs of the two counties where it has operated. I am satisfied that to a very large degree the misfortunes of this small company, in their ultimate sociological causes, can be traced back to the larger concern to which I have just referred.

I do not propose, however, at this time to do more than present to the Senate the statement of Mr. Oakes, which I think is fairly typical of some of the operating companies. If we could for the time being put ourselves in their places, we can, I think, appreciate the reason for their announced attitude as to arbitration in the series of resolutions to which I have referred.

Nevertheless, as time passes and as the gravity of the situation becomes more obvious, as the requirements and the rights of the noncombatants are considered, together with the everlasting and eternal proposition that law and order must at all hazards be maintained in every well-organized society, and must be in operation at all times, and that every individual sacrifice essential to the preservation of law and order and to the establishment of justice in the truest sense of the term requires that private considerations shall yield to public ones, I am led to hope that this resolution, if it is reported favorably and adopted, will result well for the State which I in part here represent, and that contending bodies of men may, through its agency, reach a level of common understanding, and that duty and not selfishness may constitute the mainspring of their action.

While I am on my feet I wish to refer for a moment to another subject. I refer to the Colorado State National Guard, or, as it is called, the State militia.

The National Guard of the State of Colorado constitutes the only force which, in times of stress and of emergency, is subject to call for the maintenance of the established order of things and for the ultimate protection of life and property. The National Guard of every State is an absolute political necessity; and each State should maintain its militia in such wise that it shall at all times be absolutely independent of any influence militating against the impartial discharge by the executive of the duties of his office. That means, of course, that a military fund at all times available, and belonging to the people, should be in existence, to the end that it may be utilized when the exigency requiring it arises.

The State of Colorado, although as rich in material resources as any State in the Union, more wealthy than any other in its magnificent measures of coal, underlying, as they do, one-third, if not more than one-third, of the entire State, and populated by as intelligent, patriotic, and law-abiding a class of American citizens as can be found anywhere, is, from the standpoint of State revenue, one of the poor Commonwealths of the Union. It has sought to meet, and I think has met and solved, some of the insistent problems of the day, the recognition and enforcement of which always increases the expense of public administration. Our revenues have not increased in proportion as the necessities for their use have multiplied, and multiplied legitimately and necessarily. It has had no military fund. As a result, the mobilization of troops has necessitated the use of the State credit, to the end that the expense of equipment might be met promptly; and this, unfortunately, has created obligations that should not be imposed upon an executive at any time.

The militia of the State of Colorado, like that of every other State in the Union, is made up largely of what may be called the average man—the small business man, the clerk, the professional man of limited means, the general run of the youth of the land; and the same may be said of the officers. These, in general, are good citizens, educated, moral, and substantial. I am not prepared to admit, nor have I at any time, nor will I until the proof is absolutely irrefragable, that the National Guard of the State of Colorado as an institution so composed is lawless, cruel, or rapacious. That a considerable number of employees of the mine operators were incorporated into this guard is one of the established facts of the recent controversy, and I can well understand, as I do not hesitate to condemn, the consequences which such a method of recruiting must inevitably produce. That never should have been done. It is as inexcusable as would have been the recruiting of the guard from the other side. No emergency, in my mind, however great, unless it should be one involving the State and everything in it in political and social disaster and which could be averted in no other manner could justify that situation. Even then the enlistments should be mutual. What these men so recruited have done necessarily reflects upon the morale of the entire guard. That, of course, is unavoidable, and it is because of these conditions that the State militia as a body has been anathematized.

I do not condone, and I trust I never will condone or defend, the perversion of the military power of a State to an alliance, whether by way of recruiting or otherwise, with either side to an existing economic struggle. That is as foreign to the power of the commander as the denial to a man of the right either to join a labor organization or not as he may see fit or to work, if he can obtain work, anywhere for his subsistence.

I make these remarks, Mr. President, preliminary to the reminder that on the 29th day of last May the House inserted in the RECORD, by order of that date, the proceedings of a meeting at which the Colorado strike was discussed, and which was held in the city of Washington, I think, on the preceding Sabbath. That incident attracted a good deal of attention, and a general report of it was published throughout the country.

I think, Mr. President, without reference to that particular matter, the incorporation of correspondence and of the various occurrences of the day in the RECORD is reaching an extreme, and one which, unless some limitation be placed upon it, may make the RECORD a vehicle of almost everything that comes to the knowledge of Senators and Representatives rather than what it is designed to be—a record of the current happenings of the two bodies. But inasmuch as great circulation has been given through the columns of the RECORD to that meeting and to the statements there made, I think it is no more than right and just, in the interests of fair play, that the RECORD should also contain this statement to the governor of Colorado, entitled "The Military Occupation of the Coal Strike Zone of Colorado by the Colorado National Guard, 1913–14." This, I understand, is an official document, being a report to the governor by his direction. In connection with what I have said I ask unanimous consent to print it in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, it will be inserted in the RECORD.

Mr. THOMAS. I will modify my request for printing in the RECORD by limiting the request to the first half, or the first 66 pages of the document. The others contain orders and reports with which I will not burden the RECORD.

The matter referred to is as follows:

THE MILITARY OCCUPATION OF THE COAL STRIKE ZONE OF COLORADO BY THE COLORADO NATIONAL GUARD 1913–14.

[Report of the commanding general to the governor for the use of the congressional committee. Exhibiting an account of the military occupation to the time of the first withdrawal of the troops in April, 1914.]

FOREWORD.

I am directed to prefix to the report that follows a word of explanation.

A committee of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-third Congress investigated strike conditions in Colorado. They were not investigating the National Guard, but a mass of testimony was presented to the committee supporting a very bitter attack upon the State troops. To this attack and this testimony the National Guard paid little or no attention. At the conclusion of the committee's sittings in Colorado, his excellency, the governor and commander in chief, directed the commanding general to review the testimony presented to the congressional committee and to investigate and report the truth of all the charges and accusations made against the military arm of the State. The following report is the result of that order. It was prepared by the commanding general after careful investigation, and transmitted to the congressional committee by the governor for the purpose of aiding that body to arrive at a true and just estimate of the military situation. The governor's letter of transmittal accompanying the report to Washington precedes the report itself.

Inasmuch as this report exhibits a fairly detailed history of the military occupation almost to the time of the first withdrawal of the troops, and contains matter that can not fail of interest to all the people, it was directed to be printed in the present form for general public distribution.

EDWARD J. BOUGHTON,
Major and Judge Advocate of the Military District of Colorado.

THE GOVERNOR'S LETTER TO THE CHAIRMAN OF THE HOUSE COMMITTEE ON MINES AND MINING OF THE SIXTY-THIRD CONGRESS.

APRIL 6, 1914.

Hon. M. D. FOSTER,
Chairman Mines and Mining Committee, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. FOSTER: By my direction Gen. John Chase, commanding the National Guard in the strike zone, has prepared a statement of the operations of the guard, and I herewith inclose it, pursuant to conversation I had with you at the time of your departure for Washington. I have looked over this statement and believe it to be a very fair and reliable presentation of the facts. I sincerely hope it will be of value to your committee in arriving at a true understanding of the situation in Colorado.

With best personal regards, I am,
Sincerely, yours,
E. M. AMMONS.

REPORT OF THE COMMANDING GENERAL TO THE GOVERNOR FOR THE USE OF THE CONGRESSIONAL COMMITTEE.

To the Hon. ELIAS M. AMMONS,
Governor of the State of Colorado.

YOUR EXCELLENCY: The Committee on Mines and Mining of the House of Representatives in the Sixty-third Congress, having been authorized to inquire of certain matters connected with the present strike in the coal fields of Colorado, and having in their investigations touched upon certain matters connected with the military occupation and the conduct of the Colorado National Guard, your excellency directed me to submit for the use of the committee a brief report of the peace conditions, military operations, conduct of the troops, and such information in my possession as might aid or interest the committee in the accomplishment of its errand under the House resolution.

Accordingly, and in obedience to your excellency's directions, I have made careful and, in most instances, personal investigation along the lines suggested, have accumulated and arranged the great mass of information that has come to me as commander of the State troops in the field, and beg leave to submit the following report.

For convenience of treatment, the report is divided into the following parts:

1. The general peace conditions existing in the disturbed region upon the calling out of the State troops.

2. A very brief outline of the principal incidents of the military occupation.

3. A succinct statement of certain military policies with respect to some matters inquired of or brought to the attention of the congressional committee.

4. A report upon some specific incidents in the conduct of the military brought to the attention of the congressional committee.

An appendix is added to the report, in which are collated and copied certain orders, reports, and other documents referred to herein.

I.—GENERAL CONDITIONS AT THE OUTSET.

In 1910 a strike was declared in Boulder County, Colo. This strike is still in existence. Deeds of violence have been committed by both sides to the controversy almost from the date of the strike to the present time. The operators in Boulder County repeatedly called upon the then governor of the State, Hon. JOHN F. SHAFROTH, for protection of their lives and property. Controversial correspondence was carried on between the governor, the sheriff of the county, and the mayors of the villages involved, with the strike leaders and with the operators in that county. At times the peace officers seemed able to control the violent individuals on both sides of the controversy, and at other times seemed wholly unable to do so. An utter contempt for legal processes and ordinary peace measures has for four years been exhibited in this section of the State. At one time a district judge incarcerated for a period of several months 16 strike leaders whom he adjudged to be in contempt of his court for flagrantly and defiantly violating an injunction against picketing. This judgment was made the occasion of a demonstration by the strikers in parading around the courthouse in great force, as an intimidation to the civil authority; and the doctrine was inculcated that allegiance should be paid to the union rather than to the State or country.

Because of the failure to effect a settlement between the parties to the controversy in the northern coal fields, a strike in the southern zone was precipitated in August, 1913. On account of threatened violence to the properties of the operators and the lives of the workmen about the mines, the sheriffs of Huerfano and Las Animas Counties, being appealed to by the owners of the mines, placed on duty a large number of deputy sheriffs. The strike leaders selected strategic points for the establishment of the tent colonies which were made necessary by the departure of strikers from their homes on the mine premises. Nearly every one of these tent colonies was so placed that it commanded ingress and egress to and from the mines located in the canyon near by. The location of the colonies was not an accident, and, in view of the statute regarding picketing, it would seem that it was a deliberate attempt, on the part of those responsible for the placing of the camps, to bring about a thorough system of picketing without apparently violating the law. The canvas for the tents had hardly been raised before deeds of violence were reported from the vicinity of nearly every one of the colonies. Additional mine guards were placed about the properties to secure the safety of such workmen as were passing the colonies to work. There is no question but that there were instances where the mine guards unnecessarily provoked the residents of the tent colonies. These latter, in turn, seemed honestly to believe that they and their families were in danger from the mine guards. They, therefore, armed themselves for protection. As instances of violence increased, the opposing parties to the controversy became violently aroused. For at least 10 days prior to the calling out of the National Guard a condition of absolute terror prevailed in the mining camps and in the tent colonies. At least four pitched battles occurred, and at least nine men were known to have been murdered and a large number wounded. The civil authorities seemed, and, indeed, represented to your excellency, that they were wholly unable to do anything for the preservation of peace. A large number of battles had taken place throughout the two counties. Anarchy reigned supreme. No attention was paid to the courts or the civil peace officers whatever. People were arrested and detained in the tent colonies, and the sheriff, armed with civil process, was frankly informed that he would not be permitted to serve it. With all the deputies at his command, the sheriff was unable to discharge his usual duties without battle. This awful state of affairs was represented to your excellency by all of the civil authorities charged with the preservation of the peace. The sheriffs of both counties, the judge of the district court, mayors, aldermen, county officers, and numerous citizens—sympathizers with each side of the industrial conflict—implored your excellency to use the power of the State to end the open defiance of the constitution and laws.

Accordingly, your excellency directed me by executive order to mobilize the national guard and to enforce the constitution and laws, acting either in conjunction with or independently of the civil authorities, doing all such things as in my judgment seemed necessary to conserve the peace and vindicate the dignity of the State. I proceeded with the national guard to Huerfano and Las Animas Counties on the 28th of October, 1913. I found the conditions even worse than had been described to your excellency. I found two bodies of men in large numbers, fully armed, with the intensest hatred of each other in their hearts, ready to fly at each other's throats. The thirst for blood was unmistakably evident, as were the signs of an habitual and long-continued disregard and contempt for all civil government. The mining camps and tent colonies, though very numerous, were detached and widely separated over two large counties, the district presenting a front of about 100 miles. The military problem entrusted to me was interesting. With the all too meager force at my command, I was able, without bloodshed, to occupy this territory, reestablish the constitution, and enforce a sullen peace. The problems that developed day by day have been difficult and often delicate, and when the time came that there was added to our other difficulties the burden of deliberate deceit and misrepresentation, widely promulgated through the press bureau of the unions, our cup of tribulation nearly overflowed. In the discharge of our duties to the State as citizens, this volunteer force has had to go on silently in the accomplishment of the patriotic errand entrusted to it, under abuse and frequent scurrilous attacks, without a press bureau for the dissemination of the truth, often being placed in false light and false position before the public. But at the end of all the mission has been accomplished, and the State may well feel proud of its national guard, whose members, uncomplainingly and at the cost of great personal sacrifice, have served the State so well in its hour of need.

II.—History of Operations.

Under this head no attempt is made to detail the daily occurrences and the daily and even hourly developments in the peace problem. Only a bare outline of the principal events can be undertaken.

Having moved the troops into the field and finding the situation in the disturbed counties as I have indicated above, my first effort was so to distribute the relatively meager forces at my command as to protect the entire line of 100 miles front. Bearing in mind that my sole and only object was to carry out the orders of your excellency and enforce peace and the observance of the constitution and laws of the State of Colorado, without reference to any incidental effect upon either side of the industrial conflict, my only desire was to accomplish my mission without bloodshed or the clash of arms, if possible. With two regiments of Infantry—not, however, fully recruited—three troops of Cavalry, one detachment of the Field Artillery, the Hospital Corps, and Signal Corps, we arrived in the disturbed region on the morning of the 29th of October, 1913.

I established one base camp upon the outskirts of the city of Trinidad, in Las Animas County, and another base camp at Walsenburg, in Huerfano County.

SOUTHWESTERN MINE AND POST-OFFICE ARSON.

While these necessary routine operations were progressing, and during the night of the 29th of October, our first day in the field, a conspiracy was formed among certain strikers at Aguilar, which resulted in a band of men going to the near-by Southwestern mine, pouring oil upon the tipple and mine buildings, setting fire thereto, and destroying that property, and, incidentally, the adjacent United States post office, with the mail contained therein. For a long time thereafter it was impossible to discover the perpetrators of this arson, but months later, through the efforts of the judge advocate's office and the military commission, the offenders were apprehended and turned over to the United States marshal, upon the request of the Department of Justice of the United States.

DISARMAMENT.

On the 31st day of October, the third day of the occupation, when the establishment of the military camps was well under way, I undertook, pursuant to your excellency's express directions, to disarm both sides of the conflict that I found raging upon my arrival. Realizing that in the event of the concealment of their weapons I would have great difficulty in disarming the combatants, I consulted the strike leaders, including John R. Lawson, and obtained from them, and especially from him, an assurance that if I first disarmed the mine guards employed through the Baldwin-Felts Detective Agency to guard the operators' properties, the strikers would then cheerfully surrender the arms in their possession. It must be remembered that upon our first coming into the field the National Guard had, at least, the ostensible welcome and apparent cordial cooperation of the striking miners. Relying upon the assurances given me by Mr. Lawson and the other strike leaders, I proceeded to disarm the mine guards upon the various properties, against whom the most bitter feeling of the strikers prevailed. In the disarmament of these mine guards I had no difficulty whatever. They were assembled by their employers, the operating companies, and promptly turned over the high-power rifles with which they had been supplied. This disarmament I carried on with respect to the mine guards and employees of the operating companies in every camp throughout the entire strike zone and speedily finished the complete disarmament of that side of the industrial conflict.

It was arranged, upon the completion of the disarmament of the operators, that the military receive the arms of the strikers; and accordingly, upon the 1st of November, 1913, by an agreement between myself and the strike leaders, a parade of the troops to the tent colony at Ludlow, by far the largest of the strikers' colonies, was arranged. From all appearances the very best feeling prevailed between the troops and the strikers. I paraded detachments of the troops of various arms within Las Animas County, at the Ludlow tent colony, upon the suggestion and invitation of the strike leaders, including Mr. Lawson. My object was not only to receive the arms of the strikers, as promised, but to occupy peaceably and with good feeling the strategic points in the canyons about Ludlow, which the presence of so large a body of armed men might have made difficult of accomplishment without bloodshed had my entrance been disputed.

The parade of the troops at the Ludlow tent colony was memorable. The road for a half mile or more between the point of detraining and the entrance to the colony was lined on either side by men, women, and children. Many of the men were in the strange costume of the Greek, Montenegrin, Servian, and Bulgarian armies, for the colony numbered among its inhabitants many returned veterans of the Balkan wars. The little children were dressed in white, as for a Sunday-school picnic. All carried small American flags and sang continually the Union songs. Through this line of men, women, and children the troops paraded—Infantry, Cavalry, and Field Artillery. Flags were waved in welcome and an improvised band of the strikers heralded our approach.

We passed by Ludlow, occupied the Berwind and Hastings Canyons, and then returned to the colony to receive the surrender of the hundreds of high-power rifles I knew the strikers to be possessed of. At this point occurred the first instance of bad faith on the part of the striking people. Expecting to receive hundreds, if not thousands, of arms, there were delivered into my possession some 20 or 30 weapons, many of them of obsolete pattern, the strikers topping off the humor of the situation by including in the delivery of arms a child's toy popgun. Since that time the recovery of the strikers' arms has been attended with the greatest difficulty; it has been a game of hide and seek; and, while I have been able to recover, a few at a time, a large number of high-power weapons belonging to the union from various hiding places, I will state that there are hundreds of guns still concealed and waiting occasion for use.

CORONADO RIOT.

In the meantime I had upon my hands a large number of the mine guards, whom I had disarmed, and who being defenseless in the presence of enemies thirsting for their blood, had to receive protection. These mine guards I undertook to ship out of the strike zone. For that purpose I assembled a number of them in Trinidad. On the evening of the 31st of October I had in the Coronado Hotel at Trinidad a number of mine guards who had been disarmed, and were awaiting a train to take them out of the country. Notwithstanding the representations made to me concerning the disarmament of the detested mine guards, and when I had rendered them helpless by disarming them, all of which was known to the striking miners, a great crowd gathered around the Coronado Hotel, in which these disarmed men were contained, for the avowed purpose of reeking condign vengeance upon their enemies, thus, as they supposed, delivered into their hands. Some five or six hundred men assembled around the Coronado Hotel with the express design of killing the disarmed and defenseless guards within. This is what is known as the Coronado Hotel riot. Notwithstanding all of the fair promises of Mr. Lawson and other strike leaders that induced me to disarm the mine guards first, they then rather gleefully assured me that they could not control their people, and that the feeling among the strikers, thirsting for the blood of the mine guards, was such as could not be stayed by any influence of the leaders. I found it necessary upon this occasion to assemble infantry and cavalry in the streets of Trinidad and to disperse the mob, thus bent upon wholesale murder, and to protect the disarmed mine guards until they could take the train out of the district. Fortunately I was able to quell this riot and prevent large loss of life without bloodshed or other serious consequences than a few arrests.

From this time forward, from the breach of faith concerning the disarmament until this day, the history of the strike leaders has been a record of bad faith, subterfuge, misrepresentation, and chicanery with the military forces of the State, who entered the field taking no sides, having no interest in the industrial conflict, intent only upon preserving the peace and guaranteeing the constitution, until by these methods the striking miners have come to look upon the National Guard as a foe, in league with their antagonist, and the guard has come to know that no faith can be placed and no honesty or integrity of purpose can be found in the strikers' camps as conducted by their present leaders. And I say this having no interest whatsoever in the industrial conflict still raging.

SHOOTING AT FORBES.

On the 5th of November the camp at Forbes was fired upon by the striking miners, and I found it necessary to send a company of infantry to that camp, which has received military protection ever since.

ARMIJO MURDER.

On the 8th of November one Pedro Armijo was murdered near the tent colony of Aguilar. Armijo was a nonunion workman, who upon that day was visiting relatives in Aguilar. This town, one of the largest in the district, was inhabited almost exclusively by union people. It has been the center and hotbed of disorder during the entire campaign. A committee of the Aguilar local union was sent to Armijo to urge him to join the union. This committee, comprising the president and treasurer of the union and one other, frankly told Armijo that it was highly dangerous for him to stay in Aguilar unless he took a union card. Armijo, however, was not to be intimidated, and flatly refused to join. While the committee was inside the house threatening Armijo a large crowd of men assembled in the street. The town marshal, a very radical union sympathizer, was then sent by the union committee to deport Armijo from the town. The marshal took him out of his relatives' house and, followed by the crowd, escorted him through the streets of Aguilar in the direction of the tent colony on the outskirts of the town. Before reaching the colony the marshal turned Armijo loose and sent him upon his way toward the camp of his enemies. The unfortunate man was thrust into the jaws of death. Passing along by the tent colony, and about an eighth of a mile from where the marshal left him, he was murdered in his tracks by a gunshot. Instantly both the crowd from town and the inhabitants of the tent colony surrounded the body. That the killing was planned and advertised there can be no doubt. The tent-colony people and the idle men from the town were upon the ground to see the fun. If the murder had been deliberately planned by the town marshal and the union committee, they could not have acted with greater care to insure its success. Upon the examination of these men before the military commission they were most reluctant and unreliable witnesses as to the occurrences of that morning, giving a decided impression that they knew much more than they were willing to tell.

SMITH ASSAULT.

On the same day, November 8, Herbert Smith, a mine clerk at the McLaughlin mine near Trinidad, was overtaken upon his road home by three or four striking miners, and very brutally and severely beaten, so that at one time there was a question of his recovery. No reason for the assault existed other than that Smith was at work, and was considered a scab. The guilty parties were apprehended, and, upon recommendation of the military commission, detained for a while and then turned over to the civil authorities.

LA VETA KILLING.

Also on November 8 occurred what has since been known as the La Veta killing, when three mine guards and the driver of their car were shot and killed without warning.

One John Flockhart, the local representative of the United Mine Workers at La Veta in Huerfano County, learning that William Gambling, a mine guard, was coming to La Veta to have dental work done, with the assistance of Charles Richards and Peter Rich, assembled a number of the strikers, supplied them with guns and ammunition from his private residence, intercepted Gambling by forcibly taking him from a hack, and then conducted him to Miners' Union Hall, where they undertook to make him join the union. Gambling was, however, permitted to telephone to the other mine guards on duty in the vicinity, who at once came to his rescue in an automobile. The armed party, under the leadership of Charles Richards, a professed expert shot, proceeded to the outskirts of the village and took up their position behind an embankment a few hundred yards from the county road, along which the mine guards must pass.

The guards passed into the village without molestation, took Gambling into their car, and quietly drove away within five minutes after their arrival. The party on returning from La Veta was composed of three mine guards, Gambling, and the chauffeur. When arrived at a turn in the road, about a half mile from La Veta, in full view of the detachment of strikers stationed behind the crown of the adjacent hill, a fusillade of shots was rained upon them. The guards tried to return the fire, but could see nothing of their assailants. Of those in the automobile four were shot and killed. Gambling, though wounded, was the only one of the party to escape the slaughter.

I at once sent a detachment to this locality to care for the dead and apprehend the murderers. As a result, Charles Richards, Charles Shepherd, Peter Rich, Sam St. John, and Jose Chavez were arrested Upon examination they acknowledged the shooting. These men are now held for trial on the charge of murder. Flockhart disappeared immediately after the killing, being given the necessary funds for transportation by the union at Walsenburg, and is still a fugitive from justice. It may be well to remark that a large number of the inhabitants of La Veta were apprised of the coming killing and witnessed it from points of advantage, their advance information emanating from Flockhart and other leaders.

PIEDMONT DYNAMITING.

On the 18th of November the house of one Domenik Peffello at Piedmont was destroyed by dynamite. Peffello had been an active union man, but had deserted the ranks of the strikers and returned to work.

BELCHER ASSASSINATION.

Two days later, on the evening of November 20, occurred the assassination of George Belcher in the streets of Trinidad. Belcher had been one of the leaders or foremen of the mine guards employed by the operators through the Baldwin-Felts Detective Agency. I have already described the feeling that existed on the part of the strikers toward these mine guards. This feeling was concentrated and centered in a deep hatred of their leader, Belcher. Rumors were afloat for many days before his murder that he and Belk, another mine-guard leader, were shortly to be assassinated. About half-past 7 in the evening, which in Trinidad is the busiest and most crowded hour of the day, on the main corner of the city, at the intersection of Main and Commercial Streets, beneath an arc light that hangs in the middle of the street, and in the presence of perhaps a hundred onlookers, Belcher was shot from behind as he was walking across the street, by a Tyrolean Italian named Louis Zancanelli.

Belcher fell instantly. His blood flooded the pavement and his brains protruded from the bullet wound through his head. He expired almost at once. It happened that I myself and the judge advocate were present in the immediate vicinity at the time of this occurrence and saw Belcher before he died. Zancanelli was taken on the spot, and within five minutes of the occurrence was interviewed by myself and the judge advocate at the city jail. For five days he sullenly denied any knowledge of the murder, at the end of which time he voluntarily sent for me, with the announcement that he had a confession to make. His confession was astounding, and was gratuitously offered, not as a result of any third-degree methods of examination or any promise of clemency. He was a psychological study, and he was treated with great kindness, for it was believed that only by such means could he be induced to tell what he knew. The result proved that to be the case. He stated to me and to the judge advocate, and later to the military commission, that he had been hired to kill Belcher and Belk by one Anthony B. McGary and one Sam Carter. These two men were, and perhaps are yet, international organizers of the United Mine Workers of America. Zancanelli's story proceeded as follows: That McGary and Carter had made several trips to Ludlow, where Zancanelli lived, to offer him this employment. They offered the job likewise to one Mario Zeni, his tent mate. Zancanelli at first declined, but Zeni accepted and came to Trinidad to do the deed. A week afterwards Zancanelli came likewise, and was told by Zeni that he had not had an opportunity to accomplish the murder. McGary and Carter met Zancanelli in Trinidad and played upon his feelings and pride, telling him that Zeni was no good, had no courage, but that he, Zancanelli, could do the job if he would. Thereupon Zancanelli undertook it. McGary and Carter told him that he would probably be arrested, but that the union was so strong and powerful that it would get him out of jail at once and protect him from the consequences. They told him also that if he succeeded the union would take care of him the rest of his life, so that he would not have to work. They promised him $1,000; that is to say, $500 for each murder. The four of them—Carter, McGary, Zancanelli, and Zeni—went from union headquarters across the street to a saloon, and there McGary cashed a check for $50, receiving the money in gold, and paid $25 each to Zancanelli and Zeni upon account—two $10 gold pieces and a $5 piece to each. Zancanelli then had Belcher pointed out to him, and followed him around and lay in wait for him. On the evening of the second day thereafter his opportunity came, and he stole up behind his victim and shot him with a revolver that McGary had furnished him for the purpose. This revolver had certain peculiarities by which it was identified readily by its owner. It had belonged to one Barulich, a chauffeur employed by the union to drive its car. Barulich stated that he carried the gun in his automobile when driving McGary and Carter around from camp to camp, and that it had disappeared a short time before, and that he supposed either McGary or Carter had taken it.

Upon this confession of Zancanelli's, effort was immediately made to arrest McGary and Carter, and it was then discovered that they had fled the State the day after the murder. This same Barulich stated that he was directed by McGary and Carter to take them in the car to the first railroad station east of Trinidad; that upon arrival there McGary and Carter had directed him to proceed further eastward, and that upon arriving at each town in their progress he received similar orders to drive further, until they reached Lamar, a town on the Santa Fe Railroad near the Kansas border. Upon arrival at Lamar an eastbound train was just pulling in. This train was boarded by McGary and Carter, who directed Barulich to return to Trinidad.

I personally offered a reward of $1,000 for the arrest and return of each of these two fugitives; but, notwithstanding the reward and all my efforts to discover them, their whereabouts are still unknown to any of the authorities.

Possibly there is no significance in the fact, but I have remarked that in the printed statement of the treasurer of the United Mine Workers, compiled at Indianapolis, in addition to the salary account paid McGary, there appears an item "A. B. McGary expense, $50.".

Zancanelli stated that he made this confession because McGary and Carter had not kept their word with him in getting him out of jail, and he felt that they had deserted him, and that they should bear as much of the blame as he. He was told, before he made the confession, that it would be used against him, and that he was under no compulsion to make it. He told his story circumstantially and minutely to a great many persons, but without feeling of remorse or regret. Zeni steadfastly denied all knowledge whatever. Later the grand jury indicted Zancanelli, Zeni, McGary, and Carter. Zancanelli was turned over to the civil authorities and is now held for murder. Zeni was turned over before the grand jury had indicted him, and the civil authorities released him. He stayed around long enough to make a very ridiculous affidavit, manifestly prompted by the strike leaders, concerning alleged cruelties to the military prisoners in the city jail, and then departed for parts unknown—another instance of the many affidavit men who can not be found after their affidavits have served their intended purpose. Zeni, like McGary and Carter, is now a fugitive from justice.

ALEXANDER MURDER.

On November 23 I discovered James Bicavuris in a hospital in Denver. I arrested him and took him to Trinidad, where his case was submitted to the military commission. The occasion was as follows:

During one of the battles between the strikers and mine guards in the Hastings and Berwind Canyons, one Alexander, a mine guard, was deliberately shot by the strikers. It seems that the mine guards at Hastings were not acquainted with the mine guards in the adjacent canyon at Berwind, and so they adopted the device of tying a handkerchief around their arms as a distinguishing mark, whereby they might recognize each other. Early one morning, before the troops arrived in the field, a group of mine guards from Hastings, expecting an attack from the strikers at Ludlow, were reconnoitering upon the hills adjacent to their camp. They were expecting to be reinforced by the mine guards from Berwind. In the dim light of breaking dawn the Hastings guards, of whom Alexander was one, encountered a tall man, with a heavy shock of red hair, with a handkerchief tied upon his arm. This man called to the party of guards, saying, "We are the Berwind guards; come on." By this ruse he led the Hastings men up the side of a hill, and, as they approached the crest, concealed strikers rose from their cover a few feet away, and delivered a fusillade of shots, killing Alexander. The man who had been used as a decoy was seen to approach and rob the body of Alexander after the latter was killed. In the doing of it, however, he was accidentally shot in the leg by a stray bullet from his own people. The wounded decoy disappeared, and when I found Bicuvaris in Denver, just recovered from a gunshot wound in the leg, and maintained in the hospital at the expense of the United Mine Workers of America, I caused to be introduced into the hospital ward Alexander's companions, who instantly picked him out of 20 or 30 patients, and identified him positively as the man who led Alexander to his death. This testimony being submitted to the military commission, Bicuvaris was detained, and later delivered to the civil authorities, in whose custody he now is, awaiting trial for murder. It appeared from the testimony before the military commission that the United Mine Workers had officially taken care of Bicuvaris, concealing him from the authorities, conducting him to Denver, and paying his hospital expenses during his recovery from his wound. Bicuvaris is a Greek, speaking English but imperfectly.

MILITARY COMMISSION.

About this time I instituted the military commission, whose purpose, functions, and service I have explained elsewhere in this report.

STRIKE BREAKERS.

About December 1 your excellency modified your instructions concerning strike breakers, and directed me to see that the law was strictly enforced; where workmen were desirous of entering the State to secure work in the mines to give them necessary protection and see that they knew in advance the conditions of employment and that a strike existed. The first workmen arrived about the 17th of December. I was very careful to ascertain whether they knew the conditions of their employment and the pendency of the strike, and in those instances where I was not satisfied that the law had been complied with in that respect the strike breakers were held for investigation. In other cases they were given safe conduct and protection to the camps where they had contracted to labor.

VACCINATION OF LUDLOW TENT COLONY.

On the 29th of December I found it necessary to insist upon the vaccination of the inhabitants of the Ludlow tent colony. This task was accomplished by the medical corps of the National Guard, under the directions of the surgeon general of the State, Col. Lingenfelter. It was not performed without much dissent and protest on the part of the strikers in the colony, but the vaccination was successful and a plague of smallpox, which had started, was successfully stamped out.

ROUTT COUNTY EXPEDITION.

On the 5th of January your excellency directed me to send a company of infantry to Routt County. Accordingly I sent Company G, First Infantry, Capt. Dorn commanding, together with the necessary staff and medical officers. The occasion for the occupation of Routt County was that the citizens at Oak Creek rose en masse and announced that the union leaders were a menace to society and would have to leave the county within 24 hours or the citizens, banded together for that purpose, would drive them out. The strikers themselves called upon your excellency for protection against the citizens of Routt County, and that protection was promptly afforded.

MOTHER JONES.

On the 11th of January Mary Jones, or Mary Harris, alias "Mother Jones," appeared in Trinidad in defiance of your excellency, with the avowed and proclaimed purpose of stirring up trouble. I have discussed this woman elsewhere in this report. By your excellency's directions I arrested Mother Jones, placed her in San Rafael Hospital, a church institution, giving her every comfort, but depriving her of being at large to carry out her incendiary purposes.

MOTHER JONES RIOT.

Ten days later there occurred a riot in the streets of Trinidad, known as the "Mother Jones riot." By this time the military forces had been able to enforce a sullen and unwilling peace in the disturbed region, and the strikers had evinced a disposition to cause disturbance and disorder through their womenfolk. They adopted as a device the plan of hiding behind their women's skirts, believing, as was indeed the case, that it would be more embarrassing for the military to deal with women than with men. Accordingly a parade of women was arranged as a demonstration to protest against the incarceration of Mother Jones. The leaders in the movement consulted me, asking permission to carry out the parade, and promising that the line of march would be confined to the down-town streets of Trinidad, and particularly that no effort would be made to march upon the hospital where Mother Jones was detained and which is adjacent to the military camp, about a mile from the center of the city. With that understanding I freely gave permission for the parade to occur. The parade of women was had as planned, but it was noticeable that the men, while not in the parade, were present in the immediate vicinity and available to participate in any riot that might occur. Contrary to the promise given me by the leaders, the hundreds of women in the parade, together with the hundreds of men upon the sidewalk, started toward the hospital and the military camp with loud shouts of their intention to liberate Mother Jones by force. I found it necessary to break up the parade and clear the streets, which was done promptly and effectually. So soon as the disorder commenced the men, quite evidently waiting for that to transpire, joined the crowd and participated in the mêlée. The strike leader, Diamond, who was then in charge of the union people of Trinidad, instead of using his efforts to dissuade his people from their unlawful intentions, I discovered to be calmly taking photographs, for use doubtless of the union press bureau and the congressional committee. I was compelled to make numerous arrests upon that occasion of persons who were later released or turned over to the civil authorities. The fact that the parade itself consisted of women has been made the subject of much flamboyant and untruthful comment by the union leaders, but the situation was a dangerous one, and I have to congratulate and commend the National Guard for the patience with which the crisis was handled. It was truly a miracle that no blood was shed, and the miracle is due alone to the self-restraint and patience of the National Guardsmen under the most provoking and trying circumstances. Sticks, stones, and other missiles were freely thrown by men and women alike at the soldiers, but the latter disregarded the blows they received and bore themselves well and manfully, intent alone upon clearing the streets and dispersing the mob.

WALSENBURG BOMB.

On the 27th of January a crude bomb was thrown into the military camp at Walsenburg. It did not explode. Whence it came was a mystery, and no arrests could be made on this account. The incident, however, shows to what lengths those opposed to the military will go and what precautions must necessarily be taken by the State's troops in sheer self-preservation. Had the bomb exploded, it would have killed a great portion of the soldiers about the headquarters of the camp.

HABEAS CORPUS.

On the 29th of January four habeas corpus cases were tried before the district court of Las Animas County involving the right of the military authorities to arrest and detain persons without accusations of specific offenses. After a lengthy argument between counsel for the United Mine Workers and the judge advocate the district judge vindicated the right of the military to arrest and imprison, following in that respect the judicial determinations of the same question by every State court in which the situation has arisen, and by the Supreme Court of the United States.

FREMONT COUNTY EXPEDITION.

On the 31st of January your excellency directed me to send troops into Fremont County, the occasion being an attack by armed strikers upon trains bearing strike breakers to the mines. Pursuant to those directions, I sent Maj. Kennedy with a company of infantry and a detachment of Cavalry to Florence, diminishing by this and the expedition to Routt County the all too meager force at my command wherewith to protect the citizens of Huerfano and Las Animas Counties.

By your excellency's orders, about the middle of February the troops were withdrawn, first from Fremont County and then from Routt County, the necessity for their presence, in your excellency's opinion, having passed.

MOTHER JONES'S HABEAS CORPUS SUITS.

Early in February counsel for the United Mine Workers made application to the Supreme Court of the State of Colorado for an original writ of habeas corpus in the case of Mother Jones. This application was denied by the supreme court.

On the 6th of March the habeas corpus petition in the case of Mother Jones, addressed to the district court of Las Animas County, was denied and Mother Jones remanded to my custody. During the arguments in court upon all of the habeas corpus cases the court room was packed on each occasion with a heterogeneous audience, the major portion of which neither spoke nor understood the English language. The crowd was very unusual and could not have been attracted by any desire to hear the proceedings which it could not understand. Without any doubt in the world these men—Greeks, Montenegrins, Italians, Servians, and other recent arrivals from the southern countries of Europe—were present for the one purpose of participating in any riot that might be started. On the last occasion—March 6—I discovered a conspiracy among certain Italians in the audience to kill myself, the judge advocate, who was presenting the argument, and the district judge, who had incurred the hatred of the strikers by his decisions. The conspiracy was not unusual, since I have had military information of just such plots over and over again; but upon a showing of this particular conspiracy the actual production of Mother Jones in court was waived by counsel for the United Mine Workers. On each of these occasions I found it necessary to surround the courthouse with soldiers. I have always been able to enforce order and prevent riot or disperse mobs, but with all the forces at my command I could not prevent secret assassination, and assassination was impending that day.

FORBES MURDER.

An episode has occurred since the visit of the congressional committee which has been given nation-wide publicity through the press bureau of the United Mine Workers of America. The incident is so typical of the falsehoods spread broadcast concerning the National Guard by the union leaders that I beg leave to acquaint your excellency and, through you, the congressional committee with the facts. A nonunion miner by the name of Neil Smith, working at Forbes, was murdered on the railroad tracks between Forbes and Suffield. The murder was particularly brutal. It was committed with large stones held in the hand, with which the victim was beaten to death. His skull was smashed in and his whole body so pounded and mutilated as to be almost beyond recognition. The blood-deluged stones and clubs used are in the possession of the coroner of Las Animas County. After being killed the victim's body was laid on the railroad track to be run over, as it was, by an approaching train. The train passed over the body at 7.40 in the evening. At 6 o'clock the deceased was seen walking briskly toward Suffield at a point not a quarter of a mile from where he was discovered dead. In an hour and 40 minutes, if the union's theory is correct, he had walked less than a quarter of a mile. The stones and sticks covered with hair embedded in the dried blood found beside the railroad track conclusively negative any theory other than murder. Three distinct sets of footprints led from the body where it lay on the railroad track across country by a devious route into the union tent colony at Forbes. The footprints were very distinct and were not lost once. It was known that by an incident of this kind the union people desired to strike terror into the hearts of those at work. There were two tent colonies at Forbes, known as the upper and the lower colony. In one are men, women, and children; in the other are men only. It was to the latter colony that the footprints of the murderers led.

All of the tent colonies in the disturbed region are so established strategically as to guard the mouth of the canon and by their presence terrorize and intimidate nonunion workmen. This was particularly true of the Forbes colony. It is so established that no workmen can leave the camp at Forbes without passing along or through it. Upon discovering these facts I arrested all of the inhabitants of this lower colony, numbering some 16 men. I then directed the removal of the tents, and they were taken down. In my judgment it was a military necessity. The colony was known to harbor the murderers of Smith and was a menace and continuing intimidation.

So soon as the tent colony was razed the strike leaders besieged your excellency with protests and sent to the President of the United States a message to the effect that I had destroyed the homes of the people and turned women and children—nay, infants in arms—out into a blinding blizzard, homeless and with unspeakable suffering. There was no blizzard; there were no women, children, or infants in the colony; and every inhabitant deprived of a home by the razing of the tents was furnished shelter in the jails of Trinidad. I have the statement of the president of the Forbes local union, made to the judge advocate, that there were no women or children in this colony and never had been since its inception. Accordingly, by your excellency's direction, I telegraphed the true facts to the President of the United States, a copy of which message I attach hereto. In this case it is interesting to note that the president of the local union, in answer to a question of the judge advocate, stated that the Forbes local comprised some 53 members, mosly English speaking, being Englishmen, Scotchmen, Irishmen, and Welshmen, and that of the number there were but three American citizens. The examination of the prisoners revealed over and over again English-speaking men who had been in this country between 20 and 30 years, yet had never attempted to become American citizens, but remained still subjects to the British Crown. These are the class of men who clamor most loudly about their constitutional rights.

WILLIAMS'S ATTEMPTED ASSASSINATION.

As I write this report another instance of outlawry has occurred. The other night the business men of Trinidad met and formulated a joint telegram to your excellency, indorsing your excellency's policy and pleading for the protection that continuance of the State troops in Trinidad assures. One of the business men so joining in approval of your excellency and the military forces of the State was discovered the day before yesterday in a dying condition in his office, having been murderously beaten and left for dead. He was taken to San Rafael Hospital and, from the latest reports received, has not yet recovered consciousness.

III.—GENERAL POLICIES.

USE OF HORSES, MULES, AND AUTOMOBILES.

On entering the field the National Guard owned only 14 head of draft horses, a totally inadequate number for the quartermaster general's department, which is charged with the supplying of the troops with all manner of stores. Two hundred and seventy-nine head of horses were finally purchased for draft use and mounted troops. The commanding general very gladly accepted the offer made by ranchmen and some of the operators to take over horses and mules, to be used without charge to the State. In this way 21 head of saddle horses were in use without expense other than their feed, being drawn from the ranches in the vicinity of the strike zone, and 15 head of mules were secured from the various coal mines of the district.

In Huerfano and Las Animas Counties the troops were distributed over about 120 miles of territory, much of which was distant from railroad transportation. It became necessary to provide transportation other than horses, in order that the commanding general and certain officers of his staff might pay frequent visits to the detached posts. At various times six different automobiles have been used, four of which were private cars and two said to have been owned by the operators. Some complaint was urged by the strike leaders against the use of these cars, and request was promptly made of Mr. Lawson that he also furnish one or two cars for the use of the troops. This request he declined.

ENLISTMENT OF MINE GUARDS.

The enlisted personnel of the National Guard of Colorado is largely made up of small property owners, clerks, professional men, and farmers. It has always been the custom, upon mobilization of the troops for protracted service, to relieve from duty those soldiers whose presence at home is most greatly needed, enlisting in their places men who have served in the Regular Army, in the Marine Corps and Navy, and the National Guard of this and other States, great numbers of whom are usually available in the cities and towns of the State. Among the mine guards who were thrown out of employment by the presence of the troops in the field a few ex-soldiers were found whose discharge papers were of such a character that it seemed desirable to enlist them in the National Guard of Colorado. So far as it has been possible to ascertain, no Baldwin-Felts man ever offered himself for enlistment or became enrolled in the service. All men enlisted in the National Guard were given the pay of the rank in which they were serving as soldiers, and were subject to the same orders as other soldiers. A few of the men enlisted among the mine guards were paid for a time additional sums by the operators. This is a matter in which the commanding general has no interest, as it has been customary for business houses to continue the pay of employees who are serving the State under orders of the governor.

DISARMAMENT.

The governor, in his first letter of instruction, directed that all persons should be disarmed unless authorized to bear arms. In compliance with this order, weapons were taken from the peace officers of both counties, from the deputy sheriffs and mine guards found about the properties of the operators, from the tent colonies of the strikers, and from such homes and stores as were being used to the disturbance of law and order. In all, 1,872 guns and pistols have been gathered from the deputies and strikers, and about two tons of explosives. Directions were given, very soon after entering the strike zone, that the importation of arms and ammunition should cease, and that no guns, ammunition, or explosives should be sold without the permission of the commanding general. Many of the guns which were in transit at the time of the mobilization of troops were returned to the factories and wholesale dealers in the East. Where arms were voluntarily turned over to the soldiers a receipt, carrying a description of the gun, was given to the owner of the weapon. Where false statements have been made as to the presence of guns it has been customary to confiscate the weapons when found. The first weapons gathered in Huerfano County were taken from the sheriff and his deputies.

STRIKE BREAKERS AND STRIKE NOTICES.

In the governor's letter of instruction dated October 28, 1913, occurred the following order:

"To see that all persons desiring to return to work shall be permitted to do so, and to go and come when they will without molestation or interference of any kind whatsoever, and during the restoration of order or until further orders no strike breaker shall be shipped in.

"With these purposes in view you should have the fullest cooperation of every good citizen."

Every operator in the strike zone was promptly notified of this ruling, and was directed that any plans under consideration for the introduction of workmen from outside the State of Colorado should be withdrawn until such time as the governor lifted the prohibition for the introduction of workmen from without the State. One band of 12 Japanese was permitted to come in by a special permit of the governor, as they had previously worked in the strike zone and were fully cognizant of the fact that the strike was in progress. The governor directed by telephone that at any time when two or three former workmen desired to return to any of the mines they should be allowed to do it. The strike leaders repeatedly called the attention of the commanding general to alleged efforts to violate the order concerning the introduction of workmen. Each case was investigated by an officer detailed for the purpose, and in only one instance—that of the introduction of Mexicans at Gray Creek—was there even an appearance of an effort to evade the order of the governor.

Prior to the issuance of General Order No. 17, a copy of which is attached, the operators were informed that they would not be permitted to import to their mines any workman who had not previously been interrogated by an officer of the National Guard as to his knowledge of the strike and conditions of employment in the State of Colorado. Each officer of the National Guard was furnished with copies of General Order No. 17, and the order was printed in the local press. The first importation of workmen arrived from the East, passing through La Junta. In order to test the efficacy of the method adopted for interviewing workmen, Capt. Nickerson was sent to La Junta to meet the train bearing the workmen. Upon his recommendation that there was ample time after the arrival of workmen in the district to test their knowledge of the strike and labor conditions in Colorado, no other officer was sent out of the strike zone to intercept workmen. Upon several occasions complaints were made that workmen had been brought into the mines without a complete check being made. Officers were detailed to investigate, and their reports show that in each instance the check had been thoroughly made.

Prior to the promulgation of General Order No. 17 the operators were invited to a conference with the commanding general to devise a scheme of notification to the workmen entering the strike zone, which would give evidence of compliance with the law. At this time notices were drafted and printed in several languages, which were afterwards, as I am informed, supplied to each laborer imported. One of these printed notices is attached hereto.

UNITED STATES MAILS.

Nearly every mining camp in southern Colorado is located on land which, for purposes other than mining, is almost worthless. Such population as gathers about the mines is for purely mining purposes. This has necessitated the placing of post offices, for the convenience of the inhabitants, on mining property privately owned. One of the delicate situations requiring wise control on the part of the soldiers on duty in the strike region has been to permit all persons who were accustomed to receive mail at these mining post offices to proceed to the post office and at the same time insure against interference with persons or property connected with the other side of the industrial conflict. The condition referred to has been aggravated in several of the camps by the fact that county roads pass through the mining camp, and, as your excellency well knows, no highways in the strike zone are fenced. As an instance of the conditions referred to, of the care exercised by the officers and the good judgment exhibited by the enlisted men, the reports of the officers connected with the alleged interference of the mail at Rouse are herewith submitted.

ALLEGED PEONAGE.

Numerous inquiries have been made of the commanding general by the committee of the trades assemblies of Colorado by strike leaders and individuals among the strikers as to the restraint alleged to have been exercised by soldiers over workmen desiring to leave the various mining properties. It seems incredible that such a charge should be made against a soldier, for it is a well-known fact that the mine operators openly assert they want no man on the pay roll who has become dissatisfied with his work or who desires to leave. Therefore it is easy to understand that no request has ever been received by any officer or soldier of the National Guard of Colorado to prevent the departure of any workmen seeking to leave, nor has there been an instance known to the commanding general where an officer or enlisted man of the National Guard ever prevented the exit of any workman from a mine, unless all egress from a camp had been barred temporarily to investigate some alleged crime.

POLICE INFRACTIONS BY TROOPS.

Something over 2,000 different soldiers have been on duty in the strike zone of Colorado. The discipline of the men, the efficiency of the officers, and the quality of service rendered have been a constant surprise to such soldiers as have had the facts to judge from. No instance of disobedience or neglect of orders on the part of an officer has come to the attention of the commanding general. There have been fewer infractions than might have been expected from the nature of the service, which was peculiarly trying to disciplined soldiers. Every case of drunkenness or other irregularity was cared for by the proper military courts. The summary courts tried 424 cases and the general court-martial considered 30 cases.

THE MILITARY COMMISSION.

I feel it due to explain the purpose and functions of the military commission which was established by my order shortly after the assassination in the streets of Trinidad. I found that military prisoners were accumulating in the jails whose individual cases needed more thorough investigation than the commanding general had time or occasion to make. I therefore detached a board of officers which I designated the "military commission." This board or commission I constituted of officers of higher rank in the service of the State, known in their local communities as representative men of high ability, upright character, and irreproachable integrity. While the personnel of the commission was changed slightly from time to time as the necessities of the service required, still I aimed always to assign to this body officers in whom your excellency, the commanding general, and the people would have the greatest confidence. As originally established the commission comprised the inspector general and paymaster general of the State, Col. C. B. Carlile, who in civil life is a banker in Pueblo; the surgeon general of the State, Col. G. P. Lingenfelter, a distinguished Denver physician; Col. Edward Verdeckberg, commanding the First Regiment of Infantry and the central camp at Walsenburg, a manufacturer of Denver; Maj. A. H. Williams, adjutant general of the First Brigade, a Denver business man; Maj. A. F. Reeves, a real estate man of Montrose, who has since been appointed postmaster of that city by the President; Capt. A. D. Marshall, the secretary of the Sons of the American Revolution; and Lieut. W. A. Spangler, a Denver attorney. Afterwards, at different times, Maj. Lester, a Walsenburg physician; Capt. Dailey, clerk of the district court at Fort Morgan; Capt. Frost, an attorney of Colorado Springs; Capt. F. D. Bartlett, a professional man of Denver; and Capt. Downer, a merchant of Ordway, served upon the commission.

The purpose in view in establishing the military commission was to prevent the imposition of unnecessary hardship and imprisonment in cases where no reasonable grounds existed for detention, and to insure, by the collective judgment of such a board, wise and discriminating imprisonment of those who should be detained as a military necessity. While the board was advisory purely, I yet sought to substitute for the sole judgment of the commanding general the collective wisdom and painstaking results of these high-minded and patriotic gentlemen. The military commission was in no sense a court. It did not undertake to try anyone for criminal offenses or anything else. It was a kindly and humane device established for the sole purpose of minimizing the possibility of error in judgment attaching to the incarceration of civilians.

In the same order I established the office of the judge advocate of the military district, and designated Maj. Edward J. Boughton, an attorney of Denver and Cripple Creek, the judge advocate, assigning to his office as assistants Capt. William C. Danks, of Denver; Capt. Edward A. Smith, of Denver; Capt. Hildreth Frost, of Colorado Springs; and Capt. J. R. Charlesworth, of Delta; all practicing attorneys at law.

The purpose of the military commission and the judge advocate's office was accomplished even beyond my expectations. A very large number of arrests were made for various reasons. All of these cases were investigated, the evidence collected and submitted to the military commission by the judge advocate, and recommendations either of release or continued detention were made by the commission to the commanding general, and acted upon promptly by him. In all, 172 cases were thus investigated and disposed of. It is interesting to note that 325 witnesses appeared before the commission. Of the prisoners, 141 were foreigners, 14 were Greeks, 46 Italians, 43 Mexicans, 24 Slavs, 14 other foreign nations. There were 31 Americans. The moral effect of the military commission was tremendous. It was able to ascertain the true facts in cases where the civil authorities had confessed themselves wholly unable to do anything. Whenever it was discovered that the prisoners were amenable to the civil law for specific criminal offences, they were turned over to the civil authorities, together with the evidence collected by the commission. The nature of the cases submitted may be summarized as follows: Murder, 29; assault, 42; disturbance, 20; rioting, 19; subverting military discipline, 17; arson, 20; drunkenness and disorderly conduct, 15; held as witnesses, 21; insanity, 1; picketing, 1; fugitive from justice, 1. No effort was, of course, made in that direction, but it so happened that the political complexion both of the military commission and the judge advocate's office was distributed very evenly among the recognized political parties in the State, even the Socialist Party being represented thereon.

"MOTHER JONES."

The person known as "Mother Jones" has occasioned considerable publicity and some embarrassment during the occupation. The embarrassment of her presence is not, however, confined to the military authorities by any means. It was at one time stated to me and the judge advocate by Mr. McLennan, one of the principal strike leaders, that Mother Jones was invaluable as an organizer in the early stages of the strike, because she excited the men, but had always proved very embarrassing to the union chiefs in the later stages, particularly when there was possibility of a compromise or adjustment. McLennan stated in that conversation that Mother Jones was a very headstrong old woman, who would not submit to guidance or suggestion of any kind, even from her own people, and that they had to suffer her to do as she wanted, oftentimes to the great annoyance of those in charge of the strike. She is an eccentric and peculiar figure. I make no mention of her personal history, with which we are not concerned. She seems, however, to have in an exceptional degree the faculty of stirring up and inciting the more ignorant and criminally disposed to deeds of violence and crime. Prior to the advent of the State's troops she made a series of speeches in the strike zone, of which I have authentic and verbatim reports. These speeches are couched in coarse, vulgar, and profane language, and address themselves to the lowest passions of mankind. I confidently believe that most of the murders and other acts of violent crime committed in the strike region have been inspired by this woman's incendiary utterances. The fact that she is a woman and advanced in years she uses as a shield, as well as a means of invoking popular sympathetic sentiment in case of her incarceration. She is undoubtedly a most dangerous factor in the peace problem. I am informed that she was so found in West Virginia and elsewhere that disturbance and anarchy held sway. She was held for murder in West Virginia, and I am advised that her police record is in the possession of the Pinkerton detective agency.

As your excellency is fully aware, she defied all government and all authority of the governor to your excellency. Every effort was made to induce her to remain away from the troubled district, and the cooperation in that respect of the strike leaders was invited. These latter, however, while evincing a disposition of keep Mother Jones out of the territory, frankly confessed their inability to do so. She came to Trinidad after publicly declaring her intention to incite trouble.

In view of her history in other places and the evident effects of her incendiary utterances in Colorado, your excellency deemed it wise, and even necessary, as a military measure, to restrain Mother Jones of her liberty so long as she persisted in remaining in the strike region. Accordingly, upon the day of her arrival in Trinidad, I arrested her and placed her in San Rafael Hospital, upon the outskirts of the city, where she was given every attention conducive to her comfort. She was advised that she was always at entire liberty to leave the disturbed parts of the State, but she pertinaciously and with great contumacy insisted on remaining in imprisonment. It was avowedly present in her mind to excite sympathy for the union cause by submitting to a continued incarceration, and with that in mind she was at first very angry that she had been so nicely restrained at the hospital, instead of being confined in a common jail, of which she felt she would be able to make more capital. After many weeks' confinement, however, she sought a confidential interview with Col. Davis, commanding the central camp at Trinidad, in which she discussed ways and means of bringing about her departure and at the same time saving her face. Being anxious only to get rid of the incendiary woman, her suggestion that she be permitted to go to Denver, ostensibly to see your excellency, and that if liberated at that place she would depart upon some excuse of her own, was readily adopted. Upon her own suggestion she was brought to Denver and liberated as suggested, but she promptly repudiated the rest of her proposal, and, after interviewing her attorney and strike leaders and remaining in Denver for three or four days, she returned to the strike district, where again, by your excellency's directions, I have had the unpleasant duty of detaining her. She was again notified that she was free to leave the district at any time she wished. She returned to the strike district, not for the transaction of any business, or for any other purpose than to defy the power of the State, and, as she stated in numerous interviews, "to establish her constitutional right to go where she pleased," and in open defiance of the power and authority vested in the chief executive.

IV.—SOME SPECIFIC INCIDENTS.

I come now to report upon specific incidents testified to before the congressional committee. In this connection, it should be remarked that considerable testimony was presented of complaints against the conduct of officers or soldiers of the National Guard. In a great many of these instances the witness could not, or at any rate did not, state facts from which either the identity of the men complained of or the incident referred to could be established. Such testimony has been painfully illusive, since it has afforded no means of checking the witness by investigation, and affords no opportunity to combat or refute the testimony. Another large class of testimony produced before the committee and attacking the National Guard does not appear to fall relevantly within any of the enumerated lines of inquiry authorized by the House resolution. Again, much was stated to the committee concerning minor police infractions by individual soldiers, whose offenses were properly disciplined in the usual way wherever known. In this connection it was very easily discernible that a disposition existed in the witnesses hostile to the National Guard, and in those individuals conducting the attack upon the guard, to keep secret from the proper military officers any misconduct on the part of soldiers, thus often preventing the disciplining of the offender or proper investigation of the charge at a time when the true facts were ascertainable. It seemed to be a settled purpose to treasure up known charges of alleged misconduct against soldiers to be used as testimony before the committee, great care being taken, wherever possible, not to acquaint the military authorities with the grounds of complaint against individual soldiers, so as to afford means of correction. With the large number of soldiers in the field, and scattered among some 36 detached posts over a territory 120 miles in extent, there have doubtless occurred instances of misconduct and disorder on the part of individual soldiers. It would, indeed, be very strange if such was not the case. But I can confidently assert that no very serious offenses have been committed, and that in every instance where infraction of the law or the moral misconduct of men has occurred, and where the military authorities had knowledge, or could by the exercise of the utmost diligence have obtained knowledge, the offenders have been promptly and severely disciplined and punished. Considering the size of the force, the necessity of such discipline and the occasions of such misconduct have been remarkably few; and, indeed, I have to commend the patience and good conduct of the men in the field as truly exceptional under a great strain and often under almost unbearable provocation.

So far, then, as I have been able to ascertain from the testimony produced before the committee what incidents and what men were referred to by the hostile witnesses, I have thoroughly and personally investigated the cases cited and am able to report the true facts of each.

EXCLUSION OF LABOR COMMISSIONERS.

It was testified by the witness, Eli Gross, that he and certain other representatives of Labor Commissioner Brake were sent to Delagua, Hastings, Tobasco, Berwind, and Forbes to discharge certain official duties, and that at the latter place they were prohibited from seeing the men in the mines, and escorted out of camp and excluded therefrom by Lieut. Olinger, of the National Guard. The facts are that Mr. Gross and his party were ostensibly visiting the properties for the purpose of examining the plant and machinery, as provided by the State inspection law. This they were permitted to do, as testified by Mr. Gross himself; but in the party at Delagua and Hastings was a certain Italian by the name of Mancini, likewise a deputy labor commissioner, who stated to Maj. Hamrock, in command of that district, that by express directions of Labor Commissioner Brake he accompanied the party for the purpose of talking to the employed and working nonunion miners in Italian, and that he had had express directions from his chief to persuade the workmen to quit work by every means, either of argument, cajolery, or intimidation. Colorado has a State law prohibiting such interference with workmen, making it criminal. To have permitted the State labor commissioner to violate the law through his Italian deputy would have increased the difficulty of maintaining peace. Upon this information being furnished by Maj. Hamrock, and observing that the labor commissioner's party desired not to inspect the machinery but to talk to and dissuade the workmen from their employment, as a peace measure, Lieut. Olinger was directed to exclude them from the camp. These orders were carried out by the lieutenant courteously and after entertaining the party at dinner as his guests.

THE LA JUNTA INCIDENT.

It was testified by some witness that, coming into the State as a strike breaker with a number of others, the train was boarded by guardsmen at La Junta, the soldiers guarding the front and rear platforms of the car and preventing any person from leaving it. The witness stated that a woman and child desired to go from one car to another, and were forcibly detained upon the platform for a long time, exposed to the cold. This incident simply did not occur. The only National Guardsman ever sent out of the district to meet an incoming train of strike breakers was Capt. Nickerson, who testified at the committee's request that upon one occasion he went alone to La Junta under instructions to ascertain whether the State law requiring knowledge of the strike conditions to be imparted to strike breakers had been complied with, and that he went through the car and ascertained that in each instance the law had been obeyed, and interfered with nobody.

THE VALENTI TESTIMONY.

A witness calling himself Salvatore Valenti testified that he was compelled by soldiers to remain at work in Delagua after he wished to quit; that, being refused permission to leave, he managed to escape by another way, and, being in Trinidad on the day of the "Mother" Jones riot, heard Gen. Chase says: "Go ahead and fight; kill all you want; kill all the people right away; chase the people out of the road; go ahead and chase these people out and kill them; kill all the people you want."

The latter part of this testimony ought not to be dignified by a denial, and, indeed, I should not have included so ridiculous a statement were it not for the fact that it affords quite a typical instance of much of the testimony that was offered against the soldiers. This witness, Valenti, during his examination stated that his name was Dominick Bonito; that, in giving the name Salvatore Valenti at first, he had forgotten for a moment what his own name was and so gave his uncle's name. He stated that he had served a full three-year's enlistment in the United States Army, being discharged on the 18th of February, 1912, and that he had served in the Philippines in 1910. He could not read or write, nor did he know the difference between a colonel, a captain, and a sergeant. He stated that he belonged to Troop B of the Thirty-sixth Cavalry, and that his colonel was Tom Shaeffer, a German. As a matter of fact, no man who can not read or write has been admitted to the United States Army in the last 25 years. There is no Thirty-sixth Regiment of Cavalry, and has not been. The name of Tom Shaeffer does not appear on the Army Register, either as colonel or anything else. The witness insisted he had his discharge papers in a trunk at Delagua. Upon the suggestion of the committee, it was arranged that the strike leaders should bring this witness to the evening train, and that the general, who happened to be returning to the district that night, should personally give him safe conduct to Delagua to find his trunk and his discharge papers. The general and the strike leaders were at the train, as agreed upon, but there was no Valenti. He has fled, and the strike leaders profess to the general that they do not know his whereabouts. He has no trunk and no discharge papers at Delagua, and the tale that he tells of enforced work and personal restraint by the soldiers is not true. Yet this is the class of witness that was often introduced to the committee as worthy of credit and belief, to attack the National Guard.

THE BARBED-WIRE EPISODE.

It was stated by the witness John Lawson and others that Lieut. Linderfelt had directed that some barbed wire be cut in small pieces and thrown into a well used by the inhabitants of the Ludlow tent colony as a source of water supply, thus polluting the well. The self-constituted committee of labor organizations was at the time of this incident conducting what it was pleased to call an investigation of the militia. That committee had announced that it would make no report until it had completed its so-called investigation; but so appalling did this incident appear to it that the committee interrupted its work at once and telegraphed to your excellency about the matter as of serious and immediate import.

The telegram stated that upon the occasion of the occurrence Lieut. Linderfelt had brutally assaulted an inoffensive boy and grossly abused a man in no way connected with the strike, and unjustifiably arrested Louie Tikas, the headman of the Ludlow tent colony; adding that the lieutenant had a deliberate purpose to provoke the strikers to bloodshed, and asking for his removal.

By your excellency's directions I instigated a searching investigation of this incident at the time of its occurrence and learned, as I advised your excellency, that the facts were as follows: On the evening of December 30 a patrol of Lieut. Linderfelt's company was returning from Barnes, and when opposite the Ludlow tent colony in the county road Corpl. Cuthbertson's horse encountered a double strand of barbed wire which had been strung across the highway. The horse became entangled in the wire and unmanageable and severely injured his rider, the horse itself being severely cut by the barbs. Again, on the 7th day of January another wire entanglement was discovered in almost the same place and removed. Upon one occasion prior to the injury of Corpl. Cuthbertson another wire entanglement was discovered across the county road near the tent colony. After the injury to Cuthbertson, Lieut. Linderfelt directed his men to cut the wire into pieces, which they did, throwing it into a near-by well which was supposed to be abandoned, and I now find this well was at no time used by the strikers for water for drinking purposes. Lieut. Linderfelt then arrested Louie Tikas, together with another man who was pointed out to him as the person who had strung the wire. At first Tikas protested that he did not know the other man, but upon being sent to Maj. Kennedy for examination admitted that he had lied in that respect and that he knew him very well, but protested innocence of the wire entanglement. The inoffensive boy referred to in the labor committee's report denied that Lieut. Linderfelt had struck him, confirming the lieutenant's statement in that respect. This incident is reported in full as showing the lengths of falsehood, bias, and deliberate misconstruction to which those engaged in attacking the national guard have gone.

INTERRUPTED FUNERAL.

Witness Hall, an undertaker of Trinidad, whom the strikers employ exclusively, stated that a funeral procession conducted by him had been interfered with and broken up by a soldier driving an automobile. In this connection it should be explained that mobs and street processions have been prohibited in the strike zone for the very obvious reason that such demonstrations at a time like the present usually result in disorder and riot. Funeral processions have, however, always been allowed and never interfered with. The result is that the striking miners utilize a funeral for the purpose of making a parade through the streets. On such occasions there is very little funeral sentiment, but often considerable sociological demonstration. It matters not that the deceased was wholly unknown to those taking part in the procession, or whether the deceased had lived in the community 1 day or 10 years, the funeral is always made the occasion of a street parade in which flags and banners of the striking miners are carried and large numbers of men march to demonstrate strength. I feel this explanation is necessary to an understanding of what occurred in the incident referred to by Undertaker Hall. Pvt. Ward J. Watson was driving an automobile upon a military errand between the city of Trinidad and the military camp a mile away and overtook one of these funeral processions or parades. Reaching the rear of the procession a short way from the military camp and attempting to pass by without molesting it he slowed up to turn aside. The men in the procession turned about and began to abuse him, calling vile names, making threatening gestures, and climbing upon and over the sides of the automobile. Thereupon Pvt. Watson, guiding his car with one hand, drew his pistol and struck at one of the men attempting to board the car. In fear of what might follow, he being one against so many, he drove the car at full speed through the mass of men until he reached the buggies and cabs in the procession, when he swung to the side and went on to the military camp. Pvt. Watson insists that he felt it necessary to act thus as the only means of protecting himself against the demonstration made. It was really a flight.

THE PATTRUCCI INCIDENT.

A woman by the name of Pattrucci testified that soldiers arrested her husband, taking him to the guard tent at Ludlow, and then returned and offered her $2 to prostitute herself. The offer, she stated, was made in the rather ambiguous language: "Where can I spend these $2?" The witness placed her own interpretation upon it. I have no means of ascertaining whether such incident ever occurred, since the witness, though pressed, was unable to give any information as to who the men were. She said, however, that she complained of the incident to Maj. Kennedy, whom she knew, and that he had punished the men; and, in an effort to discover who the men were, the committee itself requested the presence of Maj. Kennedy, from whom it was hoped to obtain the names. Maj. Kennedy at the time was in command of the force in Fremont County, but upon the committee's request was brought all the way from Florence to Trinidad, and, being upon the stand, testified that he knew nothing of the incident; that none had been reported to him, nor was anyone punished; and that on the date of the alleged incident and conversation with him at Ludlow he was, in fact, over 100 miles away.

MRS. THOMAS.

Two incidents were testified to before the committee in connection with the Mother Jones riot—one by Mrs. Thomas, and the other by a young girl, Sarah Slator. Mrs. Thomas testified that she was shoved, pushed, jabbed in the back with a bayonet, arrested, and held in jail 11 days. The arrest and imprisonment are facts, but the rest of her testimony is largely fiction. She was a vociferous, belligerent, and abusive leader of the mob. She forcibly resisted orders to move on, responding only with highly abusive and, to say the least, unwomanly language. She attacked the troops with fists, feet, and umbrella. In her testimony she made much of the awfulness of treating a riotous woman in the same way as a riotous man. This woman has been under surveillance for a long time, and the truth is that not long before, upon the occasion of the arrest of her husband for knocking down a woman—an arrest directed by the union leader, Uhlich—this same Mrs. Thomas strenuously defended her spouse at Miners' Union Hall, with the argument that women who act the part of men must be treated as such. The next day she appeared at the newspaper office of the Trinidad Advertiser and professed her intention to kill the editor for having printed as a news item the incident concerning her husband, and returned a little later with a pistol to carry out her purpose; but, being excluded from the office, she remained for some time upon the sidewalk, attracting a crowd by her loud, vile, and boisterous denunciations. She is altogether a violent and, upon occasions like the Mother Jones riot, a dangerous woman. She claims to have lived in America a little less than a year. It was necessary to arrest her.

SARAH SLATOR.

This young girl testified that on the same occasion the commanding general dismounted for the purpose of kicking her in the breast. The absurdity of this statement will be apparent to all. The young girl, who was playing truant from school on that day, offered considerable resistance to the soldiers, positively refusing to move on or go home, and continually calling names and abetting the troubles occurring within her sight. Before night her father represented to me her age and irresponsibility, and, feeling that a jail was no place for a girl of tender years, she was released and delivered to her father's custody.

OVERWORKED TRAIN CREW.

A Colorado & Southern trakeman testified that on December 25, 1913, Lieut. Griffin compelled a train crew to work over the 16 hours out of 24, limited by Federal statute. The report of Lieut. Griffin, who had charge of the detachment upon an errand of safe-conduct of workmen, as well as the statement of Sergt. Goodell, who was with him at the time, show that the facts were these: A conversation occurred between the military officers and the train crew concerning the attitude of the National Guard toward the railroad trainmen and unions, and in this conversation members of the crew stated that all trainmen "had it in" for the military, as the military was always against the interests of the unions. It was noticed that a great delay in moving the train was occurring, and upon inquiry it was stated that the crew was "stalling," so that the 16-hour period would expire, leaving the military detachment in the yards. Whereupon the lieutenant told the conductor that he was placed in charge of the train to deliver workmen and return with his command to Trinidad, and that the lieutenant's orders were to see that he did it; at this the train was moved. If the 16-hour limit expired before the time the train reached Trinidad, a matter of which the lieutenant was in ignorance, it was because of the deliberate plot on the part of the train crew to bring that condition about.

PEONAGE.

There was some evidence introduced to the effect that men were forcibly prevented from quitting work and leaving the camps at Hastings and Delagua, and that this sort of peonage was enforced by the soldiers in charge. After a careful examination, I state that this testimony was in every instance false, so far, at least, as the same concerns the troops. The commanding officer in charge of the troops in the Hastings-Delagua Canyon states positively that all civilians who made application to leave the camps were at once given a pass, and that at no time was the military instrumental in detaining anyone desiring to quit work and leave the camp. That a man was killed in the mine in Delagua during December while trying to leave, and that the soldiers were present and participated, as mentioned in certain affidavits, and that the name of the man killed was Hayes, and that a man by the name of Davis witnessed the killing, is wholly false. No man was killed at this mine during December, and the records show that no man by the name of Hayes was employed at the mine, nor was there a man by the name of Davis employed or present, so far as can be discovered.

INSULTS AT STARKVILLE.

Two women of the lower classes, named Ramponi and Minardi, testified to certain vile and nasty insults by soldiers at Starkville. Upon the coming in of this testimony the individuals accused became highly indignant. They are young men of good families in Colorado Springs, who felt besmirched and humiliated by such false and scurrilous testimony. Acting through their captain, Hildreth Frost, the accused men submitted to me their sworn statements, together with the affidavits of several civilians who witnessed the incident referred to by the women, with a request that the same be handed to the committee as a matter of personal vindication. From these affidavits it appears that these women were continually hanging around the soldiers' camp and baiting them with the vilest kind of talk imaginable. These women, prior to the closing of the saloons in Starkville, used to tend bar at a place frequented by the rougher and lower element among the miners, and it would appear that, instead of the soldiers offering insult to them, they went out of their way daily to shout the most libidinous words at the troops. The language used can not find space here, but reference is made to the affidavits supplied by Capt. Frost's men.

JASSINSKY INCIDENT.

The incident of an alleged robbery testified to by the family named Jassinsky, of Suffield, was investigated by my express direction at the time it was said to have occurred. The report of Capt. Smith, who conducted an exhaustive investigation, wholly discredits the statements made. Capt. Smith testified before the committee concerning the matter, and it needs no further attention here.

GRAVE-DIGGING STORY.

A great deal has been said about a man being compelled to dig his own grave by a detachment of soldiers at Lester. One Andy Colnar has related in affidavits, speeches, and interviews with the press a horrible tale of his being told that a hole he was compelled to dig was intended for his own grave; that he was measured for it; that he was told in his own language that he was about to be shot and buried; and that he was so frightened that he fell fainting into the hole. His description of the torture is graphic and has been given the widest publicity. The tale is made of whole cloth. The incident never occurred.

It is perhaps well that the committee and the public know the facts, that they may judge of the methods used by the defamers of the National Guard. On or about the 28th of November, 1913, a letter was written by Andy Colnar, addressed to Paul Antovitch, the fire boss then working at the Prior mine. This letter, written upon the letterhead of the United Mine Workers of America, threatened violence to Antovitch if he did not instantly quit his job and join the union tent colony. The letter was delivered by one "Kink" True, who, as soon as Antovitch had read it, snatched it from Antovitch, saying that it was not necessary for the letter to remain in his hands. True then conducted Antovitch to a cut in the road, part way between Prior and the tent colony, where Andy Colnar and others were awaiting him. At this place Colnar threatened and intimidated the working miner, who did not return to work, but felt it necessary to quit the mine. On this information Capt. Drake, in charge of the district, directed Lieut. Work to arrest and detain Colnar and True, and on the evening of November 28 both were taken and kept in separate apartments. True was placed in the upper part of the building with a sentry, and Colnar was given a bed in the assembly room and handcuffed with his hands in front of him from 11 o'clock p. m. until 6 o'clock the next morning. This was done to prevent escape, as there was not a sufficient number of soldiers to spare a sentry to guard Colnar. The next morning he was given a good breakfast and interviewed by Capt. Drake, who demanded of Colnar that he recompose the letter which he had written to Paul Antovitch. Colnar protested he could not remember it. The captain told him he would remain where he was until he did, and left him pencil and paper. During the day he sat in the assembly room near a comfortable fire. The captain, who had interviewed True, produced the original letter to Colnar. Antovitch was then sent for and identified the original letter as the one delivered to him by True. After a warning against carrying threatening letters and against intimidation, True was released, and Colnar was detained for further investigation. True is the president of the local union at Prior. The night of November 29 Colnar was placed in a comfortable bed in the town jail, and the next morning he was taken out under guard and set to digging a new latrine. The lieutenant had been reprimanded for the condition of the old latrine and, as was customary, utilized his prisoners for the purpose of digging a new one. While Colnar was thus engaged one of the soldiers, who speaks a little Slavish, passed the place and gave Colnar a "good morning" in the Slavish tongue. Colnar asked this soldier if what he was digging was a grave, but before the soldier answered him the drill call sounded, and the soldier replied, "I don't know," and ran hastily to where the detachment was assembling. During inspection that morning Colnar was placed in an interval in the center of the detachment, after which he requested to be permitted to telephone to his wife and babies, but the request was denied. He then said he felt sick, and was asked if he wished to go to the latrine, but his answer was unintelligible. He was taken out and put to work at the same place. About 11.30, after having his dinner, he was again interviewed by Capt. Drake, who stated that he understood that he had a wife and babies out on a ranch north of town, and that if he would promise to go and take care of them and abandon attempts to intimidate workmen he would discharge him and permit him to go home, but would keep him under surveillance. Colnar was exceedingly thankful, dropped to his knees, and invoked the Deity to witness that he would not transgress again. He said that if anybody at the tent colony wanted him to write threatening letters again they could murder him before he would do it. The captain told him to get to his feet and go to his wife. Colnar's thanks and expressions of gratitude were profuse, and tears streamed down his cheeks as he mentioned the good meals given him and the kind treatment accorded him while a prisoner. He was never measured for a grave; he was not told he was digging one; and he did not fall fainting into a hole nor anywhere else; neither was he told he was to be shot. Capt. Drake has still the letter of intimidation as originally written by Colnar. Upon Colnar's release he shortly imagined the weird tale that has earned him so much notoriety.

This campaign has not been a pleasure trip for the members of the National Guard, but a tour of duty, and the magnified stories circulated concerning alleged offenses or indiscretions on the part of soldiers while performing their duty can be assigned for no other reason than that of distracting the attention of the public from the real issues involved.

In concluding this report, I feel that I would be derelict in my obligations toward the officers and men of my command if I did not emphasize again the splendid conduct of the National Guard as a whole. These men are volunteer soldiers, who receive a mere pittance for their services as compared with their ordinary earning capacity in daily life. They have promptly and cheerfully responded to the State's call in the hour of danger, and their service has been attended in almost every instance with great personal sacrifice, and oftentimes downright suffering. The danger of destruction by assassination or otherwise has not been wanting. The errand was a patriotic one and occasioned by a quarrel wholly impersonal and void of interest to any one of them. The men of the guard have discharged their services well, faithfully, and patiently. For all the task has been a thankless one. The only visible return for the sacrificing citizenship displayed has been the heaping of reproach and opprobrium, falsehood and scurrility, upon the shoulders of the Commonwealth's defenders. It is hoped that a just and discriminating public will in the end come to realize the disinterested service of these champions of the State's integrity and honor, who for the present have only the consciousness of a stern and unpleasant duty well performed to console them.

All of which is very respectfully submitted.

JOHN CHASE,
Brigadier General, Commanding the Military District of Colorado.

Mr. THOMAS. I shall make no comment on either of these insertions. I merely insist that it is due to both sides of this controversy, if one is to have the benefit of the columns of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD to any extent the other ought to have it to like extent. My remarks must not be construed as an indorsement of what appears in this document. I have the same reason for indorsing or condemning it that I have for indorsing or condemning the other. Allowance must be made on all sides for the excitement and passion and hysteria which have been engendered by this terrible and unfortunate tragedy. Time will sift the true from the false as nothing else can.

Mr. President, before the General Assembly of Colorado adjourned it voted bonds for military purposes or, to speak more accurately, for the purpose of preserving peace and aiding the Government in the execution of the laws. It voted a series of bonds aggregating $1,000,000, a great portion of the proceeds which, of course, will be required to meet the expenditures thus far sustained during the mobilization of the National Guard. There will be left, however, a very considerable sum—that is, a considerable sum for the State of Colorado—of between $300,000 and $400,000, which will be available for the uses of the State should any similar emergency occur in the future, which God forbid.

The legislature before adjourning appointed a committee consisting of members of both houses and representing the several political organizations of the State, and charged them with the duty of inquiring into and bringing about an adjustment of the difficulties between the miners and the mine operators. That committee has been in constant session ever since the legislative adjournment, which took place, as I recall, on Saturday, the 16th day of May. It has recently reported that the prospect for reaching a satisfactory conclusion is now very promising. It may be, therefore—and I hope it will be the fact—before this commission, if it shall be provided for and appointed and shall have gone to the expense of an investigation, that an adjustment will have been reached.

I am also informed that the Department of Labor, by the direction of the President, has detailed two of its best men especially charged with the duties of an investigation, and have for some time been engaged in the attempt to reach the same result.

I hope that the Committee on Interstate Commerce, to which committee I understand the resolution will be referred, will expedite the consideration of it and make a favorable report upon it as soon as possible.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair inquires of the Senator from Colorado if the resolution ought not to go to the Committee on Education and Labor.

Mr. THOMAS. The request was made by the Senator from Oklahoma, when he introduced the resolution, that it go to that committee. I ask that it may go there, unless it belongs properly somewhere else; and that is one reason why I asked that it might lie on the table under the rule.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Bills and resolutions are referred on motion and not on the request of a Senator, if there is any objection.

Mr. THOMAS. The Chair asked me the question, and I was obliged to answer it as I did.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks it ought to go to the Committee on Education and Labor, and the Chair is going to refer it to the Committee on Education and Labor unless a motion is made to refer it to some other committee.

MISSOURI RIVER BRIDGE.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President, I have just come into the Chamber and I do not know what the Senate is engaged upon, but if it is in order I should like to ask unanimous consent to take from the calendar a bill for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River. It is a House bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The morning business has not yet been closed, but by unanimous consent the bill may be considered.

Mr. STONE. It will not take more than a moment. I have some telegrams, I will say to the Senate, that are urging the importance of speedy action upon the bill. I ask the Senate to proceed to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 14189) to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City.

Mr. JONES. I am not going to object to the consideration of the bill, but I want to ask the Senator from Missouri, who is one of the leaders of the body, if he has any idea when we will be able to get started on the calendar and go through the calendar, and if we can count on his assistance to help us to get consideration of the calendar?

Mr. STONE. I am very anxious to get on the calendar. There are a number of measures on the calendar that ought to be disposed of, and undoubtedly many more important than the one that I now ask to have considered.

Mr. JONES. This bill is no doubt of importance locally, but I feel that if we let all matters of local importance get through we will not be able to get to the bills on the calendar. I am not going to object to the consideration of the Senator's bill; I want to have it passed; but I do hope he will help us to get started on the calendar very soon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the bill indicated by the Senator from Missouri?

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

TRANSPORTATION OF PARCEL-POST PACKAGES.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair lays before the Senate the following resolution coming over from a preceding day.

The SECRETARY. Senate resolution 363, submitted by Mr. SMITH of Georgia on May 14.

Mr. NORRIS. The Senator from Georgia not being present, I ask unanimous consent that the resolution may go over without prejudice.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will go over without prejudice. The morning business is closed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by J. C. South, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House agrees to the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 14385) to amend section 5 of an act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation and government of the Canal Zone, approved August 24, 1912.

LEGISLATIVE, ETC., APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15279, the legislative appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. KENYON. I object, Mr. President.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of the bill. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that this bill will come up as the regular order at 1 o'clock, and if there is any matter the Senate ought to proceed to consider that is of importance, I shall not insist on it now.

Mr. KENYON. I will state very frankly the reason for my objection. I gave notice on March 9 that I would as soon as possible move to take up a certain bill, and for reasons which are within the knowledge of everybody it has been impossible so to do. I thought, inasmuch as the bill the Senator has in charge will come up at 1 o'clock, the time from now until 1 o'clock might be devoted to the consideration of that bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask the Senator what the bill refers to?

Mr. KENYON. It is the bill known as the volunteer officers' retired bill. It has been before Congress for a good many years. I know the Senator is not in favor of it, but I think it is entitled to a hearing.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is perfectly clear that it would be impossible to dispose of that bill in the time before 1 o'clock. It proposes to make a very large appropriation; $5,000,000 is, I understand, the amount involved.

Mr. KENYON. About that; but it is a very simple issue.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a simple issue, but it is going to take a good deal of time. I am exceedingly anxious to get this appropriation bill through, but no more so than must be every other Senator. The summer is far advanced, and we ought to be disposing of some of the measures that we must act on before we adjourn.

Mr. KENYON. I am in accord with the Senator's idea as to the appropriation bill, but I want to say to the Senator if there is no merit in this bill of course it ought to be defeated, and if there is any merit it ought to receive consideration. I want to say to the Senator that of the committee—six officers of the Civil War—who presented this matter to the Military Committee, I understand three of them have already passed away. If we are ever going to do anything, it ought to be done at this session of Congress. Would the Senator have any objection to this kind of a motion, to make the bill a special order for some day next week? It would not take any of the time the Senator desires to devote to his bill; it would come up only during the morning hour.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I have not that familiarity with the bill referred to that would justify me in agreeing to anything in relation to it to-day. I gravely doubt the wisdom of passing the bill at the present session of Congress. I certainly am not prepared to enter into any agreement, as far as I am personally concerned, in reference to it, because my course in respect to it is not determined.

Mr. KENYON. Of course the Senator has no objection to a hearing on the bill upon its merits?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If an opportune occasion should arise, of course I would be glad to have it considered; but at present there is an important appropriation bill regularly before the Senate, and it ought to have precedence. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of House bill 15279.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. 15279) making appropriations for the legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, which had been reported from the Committee on Appropriations with amendments.

Mr. KENYON. I move if it be now in order that Senate bill 392 be made the special order——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I make the point of order that the appropriation bill is before the Senate.

Mr. KENYON. Let me make my motion, please. I move that the bill be made a special order for 12 o'clock June 15.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The motion is out of order, Mr. President.

Mr. KENYON. I do not know whether it is or not. I am going to try to get the bill up on every possible occasion.

Mr. OVERMAN. The appropriation bill is pending before the Senate, and the motion is not in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is of the opinion that the motion can be entertained only by unanimous consent. The Senate has just voted to take up House bill 15279.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask for the regular order, which is the consideration of that bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks, in justice to the Chair, a statement ought to be made now with reference to the unfortunate incident of last night between the Chair and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, if the presiding officer will permit me to say so, I think I was too hasty in the remark I made. I am sure the President of the Senate makes fewer mistakes than any Senator on the floor; and the disappointment to me at the time was such that, under the impulse of the moment, I made a comment which I immediately regretted, and which I wish to withdraw in the fullest and amplest and broadest sense.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not only for the Chair, because the Chair has no feeling about the matter, and he believes that the Senator from Virginia is a friend of the Chair, but the Chair desires to explain what really took place.

There is a rule of the Senate that a Senator shall rise and address the presiding officer and that the presiding officer shall recognize the first Senator who addresses the Chair; but there has grown up a custom in the Senate, which the Chair has been recognizing, of permitting Senators to send up requests to be recognized, both for the purpose of speaking and for the purpose of making motions. There is not any doubt at all that the Chair promised the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MARTIN] that he would recognize the Senator from Virginia; the Chair also promised the Senator from South Carolina [Mr. SMITH] that he would recognize the Senator from South Carolina; and the Chair also promised the Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] that he would recognize the Senator from Nevada immediately on the conclusion of the tolls-bill debate. So the Chair had three promises out to recognize three different Senators. The Chair had forgotten the promise to the Senator from Virginia; he managed a release from his arrangement with the Senator from Nevada, and recognized the Senator from South Carolina. Immediately, when the Senator from Virginia arose, the Chair remembered that he had two promises out; he also knew that the Senator from Virginia had the right of way under the rules; so the Chair stood by the recognition of the Senator from South Carolina. The Chair knows there is no feeling between the Senator from Virginia and the Chair, and hopes there is no feeling on the part of the Senate as to what the Chair did.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I want to say that not only is there no feeling, but there is no sense of grievance—none whatever—on my part.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the formal reading of the bill be dispensed with, that the bill be read for amendment, the committee amendments to be first considered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Virginia? The Chair hears none. The formal reading of the bill will be dispensed with, and the Secretary will read the bill for committee amendments.

The Secretary proceeded to read the bill.

The first amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Legislative," subhead "Senate," on page 2, after line 3, to strike out:

For actual traveling expenses incurred by Senators, including actual traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families, incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved as in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage, $25,500.

And in lieu thereof to insert:

For mileage of Senators, $51,000.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations where the provision for mileage of Members of the House is contained in the bill?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It will be found on page 18, but it is not necessary to turn to it now, because exactly the same provision is made for the House Members as is made for Senators. It restores the mileage law which has been in existence for years.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, there are many more Members of the House than there are of the Senate. As I understand the situation, the House has decided on a plan of mileage that shall cover actual expenses of Members in traveling to the seat of government and of the families immediately dependent upon them. Now, the House having so many more Members, it seems to me that the Senate in this matter ought to defer to the judgment of the House. I think at the time when I suggested an appropriation for the father of former Representative Pepper, who had died, the Senator from Virginia made an argument on the proposition to the effect that that was a matter entirely with the other House. The great bulk of this appropriation is going to the House, and it would seem to me that we ought not to interfere with it.

In the second place, it seems to me that the provision of the House in reference to the mileage proposition is a fair one. It embodies what was always the intention of mileage, to wit, to cover the actual traveling expenses, and this would do it. As the situation is now, a man with no family receives his mileage, and it is more than his actual expenses, while a man with a large family is compelled to bring them here, and the amount allowed for mileage does not cover the expense. For that reason I am very much in favor of the House provision.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, it is true that I have always insisted that each House should take care of its own expenditures, but this is a joint expenditure; this is not an expenditure exclusively appertaining to the other House. This is a provision for mileage for the membership of both Houses. The committee, after careful consideration, was of the opinion that the old flat rate of mileage was juster, and would in the end prove quite as economical as the mode now proposed by the other House.

In addition, Mr. President, we felt that it might be the subject of very great abuse under the language of the House provision, which is very vague. It reads:

> Traveling expenses of the immediate and dependent members of their families.

That is a very latitudinarian phrase. It is difficult to see where it would lead us. It does not fix the mode of travel. Are they all to have drawing-rooms? It is a very vague and unsatisfactory provision for the payment of mileage. The committee of the Senate did not think it was wise to make the change and reported an amendment accordingly. The matter will go to conference; and if there be any strenuous desire on the part of the other House to make this change, it will have due consideration; but the judgment of the Senate Committee on Appropriations is that there should be no change, or certainly not the change proposed by the other House.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I was under the impression that the change proposed by the House of Representatives was in the interest of economy, and that it would cut the mileage expense in half; and I observe that the sum appropriated in the bill amounts to only about half of the usual appropriation for the purpose. I think it would be a good idea to give this plan a trial. There is a great deal of dissatisfaction among the people throughout the country in relation to the matter of mileage.

I do not think that it pays the Members of the Senate or honors the Senate to accept mileage. If there is any other satisfactory way of having such expenses paid, I think we ought to substitute it for this. The payment of mileage has always caused reflections to be made upon the two Houses. I do not think this body can afford to continue the practice if there is any other method which they can adopt; and I support the House provision for that reason.

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator from Oregon allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. LANE. Certainly.

Mr. WARREN. Mileage is by law a part of the compensation of Senators and Members of the other House, and always has been so regarded. Does not the Senator from Oregon believe that there is just as much talk against the increase of Senators' salaries as there is against the payment of mileage?

Mr. LANE. I do not know.

Mr. WARREN. It is all one under the law.

Mr. LANE. It may be, but it is under the law in a different light; and if you are going to increase the salary——

Mr. NORRIS. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me?

Mr. LANE. I will.

Mr. NORRIS. I want to make a remark in reference to the suggestion of the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN], to the effect that mileage is a part of our compensation by law. I may be mistaken, of course, but I think the Senator from Wyoming is wrong about that.

Mr. WARREN. I invite the attention of my distinguished friend, who is a very able lawyer, to the statute; that is all that is necessary.

Mr. NORRIS. I will invite the attention of my distinguished friend to the opinion of the Court of Claims, where they have construed that law. As I remember—I have not looked at the opinion for a good while——

Mr. WARREN. As to the mileage of Senators? Oh, that is merely a technicality. It has been considered as compensation.

Mr. NORRIS. As to the mileage of the Members of the House of Representatives, which is the same thing.

Mr. KENYON. Did that decision have any relation to the income-tax law?

Mr. NORRIS. No.

Mr. KENYON. What was the case?

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Oregon will yield, I think I can outline the case briefly. I speak of it from memory, but the case is accessible and can easily be obtained and read. It arose in this way: I think it was in the Fifty-eighth Congress, when one session of Congress merged into another, as it did at the last session, and a claim was made by a Member of the House of Representatives for mileage that had not been appropriated for. He claimed his mileage for the new session, on the ground that it was a part of his compensation. Of course, if it was a part of his compensation it made no difference whether or not he actually went home and came back. That case was taken to the Court of Claims. I believe there was a joint resolution of Congress passed authorizing the court to take jurisdiction of that case, although I may be mistaken about that; I was in the House at the time; but the case at least went to the Court of Claims, and that court passed on it.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, I have not examined the decision of the Court of Claims, but I know that the contention was that it was different from the ordinary case, because one session was a special session, while the statute, I think, applies to mileage for regular sessions. I do not know whether the Court of Claims decided the case on that point or not.

Mr. NORRIS. No; I think the Court of Claims held that it was a regular session of the Congress, and that in law there was no difference; but they discussed the proposition of what mileage meant, and they decided it. As I remember, the opinion was contrary to the contention of the Senator from Wyoming, and held that the Member of the House was not entitled to mileage.

Mr. WARREN. If the Senator will review the case I think he will admit he is practically mistaken. The law as it has always stood has seemed to contemplate mileage as a part of the compensation. The law for some two or four years read that mileage should only be paid for two sessions of Congress, and, hence, if there was an extra session a Member of Congress could not, of course, draw mileage for that session. Then, at another period, the law read that "in no case shall constructive mileage be computed and paid," which would perhaps cover the case the Senator has mentioned, the mileage in that instance being constructive mileage, there not having been any lapse of time between the close of one session of Congress and the commencement of another, as the Senator has stated it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Will the Senator from Oregon yield to me for just a moment while we are on this subject?

Mr. LANE. I yield.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. This question has been up for discussion several times before. It seems to me that the statute is perfectly plain; that the mileage is no part of the compensation, but is something wholly outside of the compensation and in addition to it. The language of the statute is——

Mr. WARREN. Will the Senator let me call his attention to one thing?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is exactly what I had before me and was about to read. I have no objection, however, to the Senator reading it.

Mr. WARREN. Oh, no; the Senator may read it.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Very well. The statute reads:

> The compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $7,500 per annum—
>
> That is, the compensation—
>
> and in addition thereto mileage—
>
> Not compensation—
> in addition thereto—
> That is, in addition to compensation.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. It is, then, compensation, is it not?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Oh, no; it is "in addition thereto." What does "thereto" refer to? It refers to compensation. The compensation shall be so much, and "in addition thereto"—that is, in addition to the compensation—there shall be allowed mileage.

Mr. SMITH of Arizona. That is, a Member of Congress may have compensation, and then additional compensation——

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No. In addition to the compensation there shall be mileage; not in addition to the compensation there shall be more compensation, but in addition to the compensation—mileage at the rate of 20 cents a mile, to be estimated by the nearest route—

And so forth.

It seems to me the statute is perfectly clear that the mileage is a separate and distinct thing, and forms no part of the compensation. However, I do not see what that particularly has to do with the question of whether it should be allowed.

Mr. NORRIS. If the Senator from Oregon will allow me, I have here the opinion of the Court of Claims, to which I referred a while ago. It is No. 29799, decided March 29, 1910: John F. Wilson against The United States. I do not suppose, without taking time to carefully look it over, I ought to read at random from the opinion in the case, but I will see if I can find something near the close of it that gives the conclusion of the court.

Mr. McCUMBER. If I may ask the Senator one question, I will ask what practical difference does it make whether you call it "compensation" or "mileage," so far as the merits of the proposition are concerned?

Mr. NORRIS. That is the legal proposition in this case. As I remember the case, it was the question at issue whether or not mileage was part of the compensation. However, I did not raise that question here, but it was raised by the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. WARREN. Can the Senator point to the portion of the decision which makes that statement?

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I shall merely make a brief observation, and then I shall be through. I desire to say that this is an unequal way of paying the traveling expenses of Members of the Senate. Some do not receive the amount which they should receive, while others receive more than they are actually entitled to. In my own case I receive 20 cents a mile on a mileage of some 3,200 miles. It amounts to twice the amount that I would be justly entitled to if it were merely the intention of the Government to pay the actual expenses of myself and my family. There are other cases of Senators who live in the eastern portion of the country, where the amount allowed does not pay their expenses, and they have to pay money out of their own pockets.

In a general way the people look upon mileage as a sort of baksheesh, a way of obtaining money indirectly, and for the sake of the Senate itself it would be better, in my opinion, for the Senate to adopt some other method and to slough off this one, which is not respected by the people of the country.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to defend the people in just one word. The people are not picayunish at all. The people are not thinking about this mileage. You can not find one out of a million who is paying any attention whatever to it. They care nothing about it, except when some politician thinks he can make himself stronger by telling the people that they are losing a few pennies, or something of that kind. I do wish that we could consider these matters without all of us thinking the people are watching the pennies, while we are letting millions upon millions slip through our fingers, and the people are not paying a great deal of attention to it. The people are willing to pay a fair, honest amount, and they do not think anything about the salary; they are not inquiring about that; and they are not considering anything about the mileage paid, unless somebody calls their attention particularly to it, and then they have to have it explained.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I did not suppose that my remarks would harrow the feelings of any of the worthy brethren. I wish to say that the Senator is quite right in saying that the people do not care about what salary is paid; they are willing to pay a good salary; but they like to pay it openly. They do not like to have their Senators and Representatives in Congress receiving money with their hands out behind them like a policeman or a waiter taking a tip. That is a different proposition; and that is the basis of my objection. It is not an open method. If you wish to add the mileage to your salary and increase it to that amount and any Senator in the Senate has courage enough to make a motion to that effect, that is a different proposition. I have an idea that very few of them would make a motion to increase their salaries by the amount of the mileage paid. What I want is to keep the matter in the open.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, I wish to ask the chairman of the committee what is the rate per mile of this mileage?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is 20 cents a mile each way.

Mr. SHEPPARD. When was this rate fixed?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can not give the date, but many years ago. Ever since I can remember that has been the rate.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It was fixed many years ago, when the expense of travel was much greater than it is now.

Mr. LANE. Undoubtedly.

Mr. SHEPPARD. It undoubtedly was fixed many years ago, when the expense of travel was much larger than it is now; and when it was fixed at some time before that I think it was a still larger amount, because travel was still more expensive then.

I think we ought to be honest in the matter. I think we ought to appropriate only an amount sufficient for the actual expense of travel. Therefore, as a substitute, I move to insert "$12,750," instead of "$51,000," which is 5 cents a mile.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That does not change the rate. It simply makes that appropriation.

The matter is one of entire indifference to me, except that we ought to do what is right. We have considered it. There are few Senators in this body to whom individually the matter is of as little importance as to me, since I live so near Washington. I considered it on the plane of what was fair and right.

There is a great deal of travel that a Senator has to undergo besides one trip to Washington. When you get down to the real equities of the matter, the present rate does not compensate Senators for the actual travel that they have to undergo. Take the case of a Senator from the far West: He has to go home. The necessities and obligations upon him, both personal and official, are such that he can not get along with one trip a year. He is put to greater expense.

So, when you get at the real equities and real fairness and honesty of the transaction, I believe it is about as well disposed of under existing rules as it would be under any that could be applied. Certainly nothing has been proposed that is an improvement on the present rule. The committee felt that way, and we reported that way. It is for the Senate to determine. It is not a matter in which we have any pride of opinion or any peculiar interest. The only interest we have is to legislate justly and equitably. We have reported the bill as we think it ought to be. It is for the Senate to determine whether the amendment offered by the committee shall be rejected or adopted.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I care very little as to the amount of mileage the Senate agrees upon, but I am opposed to the House provision. If the House provision should become a law, then, in my opinion, there would be scandals, beginning with the first year, until the law is repealed.

Who is an immediate member of a family? Who is a dependent member of a family? When the Congressman or Senator decides that question for himself, is he going to travel in a special car, or in one stateroom, or will he take all the staterooms of the sleeper, or will he travel in a sleeper at all? If so, in an upper berth or a lower berth? Or will he travel in a day coach?

I do not believe the Senate should vote for the ambiguous honor provision. I have heard the present mileage rate criticized by Members of Congress and the Senate, but I have never heard a single person outside of Congress refer to the subject.

I want to say that there are many things to take into consideration in this matter. In the case of a Senator who lives on the Pacific coast it is true that it does not cost him as much to travel to Washington and back as his mileage amounts to. It is true, also, that Senators coming from places near Washington do not receive much more than actual expenses. The Senator who lives around Washington, however, can go home every week if he desires. He can attend to his business at home. He can see his business associates. His family, in many cases, can and does live at home; and he is not compelled to maintain two homes, as every Senator from the West must do. The Senators from the West have their homes in the far West which they are compelled to maintain all the time. They are also compelled to maintain a home while they are in Washington. They can not return weekly or monthly to attend to their business which needs their personal attention.

When we take everything into consideration, it seems to me the present mileage system is about as just a one as can be arrived at.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, the proposition is not to change the present plan; it is to change the rate of mileage so as to conform to the expense of present-day travel. The rate of 20 cents a mile was fixed at a time when that was the ordinary expense of travel. The prevailing railroad rate now is about 2 cents a mile, but in my amendment I have placed the amount at one which is equivalent to 5 cents a mile.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course, as the Senator from Virginia says, the amendment will go into conference and it will be open for consideration between the conferees. If the Senate wants to vote against the amendment offered by the committee, well and good; but as far as I am personally concerned I wish to say now that in my judgment the present arrangement is as satisfactory and as just as any that can be arrived at, taking into consideration all the circumstances and conditions.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Does the Senator mean by "the present arrangement" the present rate also?

Mr. SMOOT. The present rate also. I want to say to the Senator that the amendment he has offered does not take into consideration the number of persons in a Senator's family. A Senator who comes to Washington, especially of late, and remains for 18 long months without even going home or having a chance to go home, is going to have his family with him. Not only that, I believe every Senator ought to have his family with him in Washington. It will cost to bring that family here sometimes more than his mileage amounts to, particularly when the Senator has a number of children.

Mr. SHEPPARD. The expense of bringing his family here ought to be paid out of the Senator's salary. The people ought not to be saddled with the expense of buying the railroad tickets and paying the other traveling expenses of his family.

Mr. SMOOT. I wish to say to the Senator from Texas, as I said before and as has been said, that no Senator has to draw any more of his mileage than he really feels he is justified in taking. I believe every man ought to take just what the law allows him. I do not believe the country is complaining of the amount that is paid for mileage to Senators and Congressmen. The only time the matter ever comes up, or the country ever thinks of it, is when we bring it up ourselves and try to make ourselves appear before the country as receivers of money not due us.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I do not see why it is not entirely fair to charge the actual expenses incurred in traveling. Nothing could be fairer than that, both to the Senator and to the Government.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the provision of the House bill says "traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families." I will say to the Senator right now that if that should ever become the law, there would be a scandal within one year after its passage. There is not any question, in my mind, but that there would be. Why, every Senator and every Congressman would have to pass upon the question as to what a dependent of his family may be. Is a servant a dependent? Is a sick aunt one? Are relatives a Senator is providing for dependents? I might go on and ask other questions of a similar character.

Mr. LANE. I do not think he would make many mistakes of that sort. I think he would be cured of the habit.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, while the discussion has been going on I have hurriedly examined the opinion of the Court of Claims, to which I have heretofore referred, and I find they have decided both of the questions in accordance with the suggestion I made to the Senator from Wyoming—first, that mileage is not part of the salary of a Member of Congress, and, second, that there is not any difference between a special session and a regular session of Congress. They are all regular sessions of Congress. The opinion gives, to some extent, a history of the legislation on this question. It seems to me it would be interesting for Members of the Senate, and also Members of the House, to read this opinion. I do not want to take up the time of the Senate now to read it, but I ask that it may be printed in the RECORD.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there any objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter referred to is as follows:

COURT OF CLAIMS OF THE UNITED STATES.

No. 29709.

(Decided Mar. 29, 1909.)

JOHN F. WILSON v. THE UNITED STATES.

Barney, J., delivered the opinion of the court.

This is a suit brought by Hon. John F. Wilson, who was a delegate to the Fifty-eighth Congress from the Territory of Arizona, for mileage claimed to be due him. Mr. Wilson attended the extraordinary session of the Fifty-eighth Congress which was convened by the proclamation of the President on November 9, 1903. This extraordinary session continued in session until December 7, 1903, the day appointed by the Constitution for the annual convening of Congress, and up to a few minutes before the annual constitutional session was called to order.

The Fifty-seventh Congress at its last regular session made an appropriation for the mileage of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from the Territories for the fiscal year 1904 (32 Stat., 854, 858), and this appropriation was made available and authorized to be paid to the Senators, Members, and Delegates for attendance on the extraordinary session of Congress which convened November 9, 1903 (33 Stat., 1); and the claimant received the mileage due to him out of said appropriation. No further appropriation was ever made by Congress for the payment of mileage to Members of Congress and Delegates for attendance upon the session of Congress which convened pursuant to the Constitution December 7, 1903. It appears, therefore, from the petition, that none of the Members of the Fifty-eighth Congress ever received any mileage for attendance upon Congress at the extraordinary session of November 9, 1903, and the regular annual session of December 7, 1903, except the one mileage provided for and made available in the manner before stated.

The foregoing is a statement in substance of the facts set out in the petition in this case. To this petition the Government has demurred, stating two grounds of demurrer—(1) that this court has no jurisdiction of the subject matter of the petition, (2) that the petition does not state facts sufficient to constitute a cause of action; and the issue of law raised by this demurrer is now before this court for decision.

I. We can not agree with the contention of the attorney for the Government that this court is without jurisdiction in this suit. He has quoted section 6, Article I, of the Constitution, as sustaining this contention, as follows:

"The Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation for their services, to be ascertained by law, and paid out of the Treasury of the United States. * * *"

This provision only places Members of Congress as to compensation upon the same footing with all other officers of the Government, i. e., their compensation is fixed by law of Congress (and not by a provision in the Constitution) and, more important still, is paid out of the Treasury of the United States. The reason for this provision in the Constitution is apparent and needs no discussion here, but reference for a treatment of the subject is made to Story on the Constitution, sections 851–858.

An argument is attempted to be made upon some statutes quoted that the salary and mileage of Representatives and Delegates in Congress is entirely dependent upon the certificate of the Speaker and that such certificate is conclusive upon that subject. We do not think any such conclusion can be made from the statutes called to our attention; and if it could, we do not think any such judicial power can be delegated to that officer.

By the first section of the Tucker Act this court has jurisdiction of all "claims founded upon any law of Congress." The claim in this case is founded upon a law of Congress enacted agreeably to the express words of the Constitution; hence our jurisdiction is beyond question.

II. Some discussion has been had as to whether there were two or three sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress; in other words, whether the extraordinary session which convened November 9, 1903, by proclamation of the President, continued over the 7th day of December following, the date prescribed by the Constitution for the annual convening of Congress, thus constituting but one session. Without discussing the question at length here, we simply state that we are of the opinion that the extraordinary session closed when the time arrived for the convening of the session provided by the Constitution, thus making two sessions even if the meeting of the Members of that Congress from day to day had been continuous.

By thus holding we are confronted with the question, Whether the Members of the Fifty-eighth Congress are entitled to pay for mileage for each of these sessions? It appears from the petition that the claimant never returned to his home after the close of the extraordinary session and came back again to be present at the opening of the constitutional session; in fact, had no time to do so, unless he traveled upon the wings of lightning.

As the right of the claimant under the law to receive anything for mileage at either of the sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress, except actual traveling expenses, has been questioned by Government counsel, we deem it proper at this point to give the history of legislation on this subject so far as it can be said to relate to this case.

The act of July 28, 1866 (14 Stat., 323), provided:

"That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum, to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and, in addition thereto, mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session."

This statute was in force until 1873, when it was superseded by the act of March 3, 1873 (17 Stat., 486), which provided:

"And Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, including Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in the Forty-second Congress holding such office at the passage of this act and whose claim to a seat has not been adversely decided, shall receive $7,500 per annum each, and this shall be in lieu of all pay and allowances, except actual individual traveling expenses from their homes to the seat of government and return, by the most direct route of usual travel, once for each session, of the House to which such Senator, Member, or Delegate belongs, to be certified to under his hand to the disbursing officer, and filed as a voucher."

This law was repealed the very next year by the act of January 20, 1874 (18 Stat., 4), which is as follows:

"That so much of the act of March 3, 1873, entitled 'An act making appropriations for legislative, executive, and judicial expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1874,' as provides for the increase of the compensation of public officers and employees, whether Members of Congress, Delegates, or others, except the President of the United States and the justices of the Supreme Court, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act."

It is insisted by the Government that the law of 1874 only repealed the law relating to the salary of Members of Congress, and never repealed the provision for mileage in the law of 1873. It is true that in the law of 1874 there was no repeal as to mileage in express terms, but after the repealing clause the section further provides that "the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act." The law in force at the time of the passage of the salary law of 1873 was the act of July 28, 1866, which was thus reenacted as to salaries, compensation, and allowances; and certainly mileage is either compensation or an allowance. Thus it will be seen that the law of 1866 as to the salary and mileage of Members of Congress was in force during the Fifty-eighth Congress. If there was any doubt about this question, the fact that Congress has so construed the law for more than 30 years would be very persuasive at least.

3. It is contended on behalf of the claimant that the mileage provided for in the law of 1886 is a part of the salary of Members of Congress, and that they are entitled to receive it each session regardless of whether they perform any travel or not; while on the other side it is insisted that the provision for mileage is a recompense for travel actually performed, and that Members of Congress are only entitled to it when travel is necessary to attend upon the sessions of Congress whether extraordinary or the sessions which convene under the Constitution on the first Monday in December.

The statute of 1866 under consideration provides:

"That the compensation of each Senator, Representative, and Delegate in Congress shall be $5,000 per annum to be computed from the first day of the present Congress, and in addition thereto mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session."

It is contended by the claimant that the mileage provided for is arbitrarily payable regardless of actual travel, because after providing for the $5,000 per annum the law says, "and in addition thereto mileage"; that is to say, as we understand the argument, the words "in addition thereto" couple the $5,000 provided for and the mileage so inseparably that they both together constitute the annual salary of Members of Congress.

We see no force in such a construction of those words. Mileage, in whatever terms provided for any public officer, is in addition to the per diem or annual compensation received—i. e., it is compensation allowed for traveling expenses, besides, together with or in addition to the compensation otherwise provided, and whichever of those terms is employed the signification is the same. Doubtless when a Member of Congress receives his allowance for mileage he puts it in the same pocket or the same bank to be added to his annual salary, but that fact does not deprive it of its quality as mileage. If only actual traveling expenses were allowed, as in the act of March 3, 1873, supra, the same language might well have been employed and its signification would have been the same as in the act of July 28, 1866. The separation of salary from mileage, in providing for the compensation of Members of Congress, is clearly indicated by the language used in the repealing act of January 20, 1874, supra. It says, "and the salaries, compensation, and allowances of all said persons, except as aforesaid, shall be as fixed by the laws in force at the time of the passage of said act" (i. e., act of July 28, 1866). Thus we see that this provision for mileage was regarded as an "allowance." While the term "allowance" has a very indefinite legal signification, it here certainly means something entirely separate from salary, and can only refer to mileage.

In the case of Sherburne v. United States (16 C. Cls. R., 491), in which the signification of the words "pay" and "allowances" was involved as applied to officers of the Army this court said:

"Pay is a fixed and direct amount given by law to persons in the military service in consideration of and as compensation for their personal service. Allowances, as they are now called, or emoluments, as they were formerly termed, are indirect or contingent remuneration, which may or may not be earned, and which is sometimes in the nature of compensation, and sometimes in the nature of reimbursement." (Id., 496.)

There was no provision in the law of 1866 for the payment of any money for "allowance" as distinguished from "salary" except the provision for mileage. This fact clearly indicates no intention of Congress in the acts of March 3, 1873, and January 20, 1874, to make the mileage provided for an inseparable part of the salary or compensation of Members.

It is also a fact of some significance in the discussion of this question that Congress, at least ever since 1874, in every legislative, executive, and judicial appropriation bill has appropriated for the salary and mileage of Members of Congress separately in the following language:

"For compensation of Senators, Members of the House of Representatives, and Delegates from Territories * * * dollars."

"For mileage * * * dollars." (18 Stat., 87, 345; 34 id., 392, 938.)

"Mileage" is defined in the Century Dictionary as payment allowed to a public functionary for the expenses of travel in the discharge of his duties, according to the number of miles passed over. Substantially the same definition is found in Bouvier's and other law dictionaries.

Smith v. United States (26 C. Cls., 568; 158 U. S., 346) was a suit brought by a United States district attorney for the Territory of New Mexico to recover mileage, which had been disallowed him by the accounting officers of the Treasury on the ground that such mileage was a part of his compensation provided by law. At that time United States district attorneys received the larger part of their compensation in fees, with a maximum limitation in the case of district attorneys from New Mexico of $3,500; and it appeared that the plaintiff in that case had already been allowed sufficient fees for the year in question to make up that sum.

The statute in fixing the fees of United States district attorneys, among other items, provided "For traveling from his place of abode to the place of holding any court of the United States in his district, or to the place of any examination before a judge or commissioner of a person charged with a crime, 10 cents a mile for going and 10 cents a mile for returning." (Sec. 824, R. S.)

The Supreme Court affirmed this court in deciding that the mileage thus provided for was not compensation for official services, but was an allowance by way of reimbursement for expenses incurred or presumed to have been incurred in traveling.

In its opinion the Supreme Court used the following language:

"While an allowance for travel fees or mileage is, by section 823, included in the fee bill, we think it was not intended as a compensation to a district attorney for services performed, but rather as a reimbursement for expenses incurred, or presumed to be incurred, in traveling from his residence to the place of holding court, or to the office of the judge or commissioner. The allowance of mileage to officers of the United States, particularly in the military and naval service, when traveling in the service of the Government, is fixed at an arbitrary sum, not only on account of the difficulty of auditing the petty items which constitute the bulk of traveling expenses, but for the reason that officers travel in different styles; and expenses which in one case might seem entirely reasonable might in another be deemed to be unreasonable. There are different standards of traveling as of living, and while the mileage in one case may more than cover the actual expenses, in another it may fall short of it. It would be obviously unjust to allow one officer a certain sum for traveling from New York to Chicago and another double that sum, and yet their actual expenses may differ as widely as that. The object of the statute is to fix a certain allowance, out of which the officer may make a saving or not, as he chooses or is able. And while in some cases it may operate as a compensation, it is not so intended, and is not a fee, charge, or emolument of his office within the meaning of section 834." (Id., 349.) The liberal allowance of mileage in the act of July 28, 1866, doubtless operates as a compensation, as was said by the court in the above case might sometimes occur, but that fact does not take from it its characteristic as mileage.

The act of February 22, 1875 (18 Stat., 333–334), was a statute to regulate the fees and costs of district attorneys, marshals, and clerks, and among other things it provided: "And from and after the 1st day of January, 1875, no such officer or person shall become entitled to any allowance for mileage or travel not actually and necessarily performed under the provisions of existing law."

In commenting upon this statute, in a case before him, the Attorney General said:

"That provision was intended to apply to cases in which no actual travel is performed in serving process, as, for instance, where the writ is sent through the mail to be served by a deputy at or near the place of service. It was well known to Congress that under the fee bill the practice of thus serving writs and charging mileage therefor as if travel had been actually performed to serve them, prevailed. The claim of an allowance for travel for such service—the travel being in fact constructive only—was regarded as an abuse. To remedy this and to confine the allowance of mileage to cases in which there has been actual travel it is believed the provision in the act of 1875 was enacted." (16 Op. Attys. Gen., 165–169.)

This opinion was cited by the Supreme Court with approval. (Harmon v. United States, 147 U. S., 268–280.)

In short, under all the authorities "mileage" means an allowance for actual travel about the public business, and mileage and travel are thus inseparably connected.

The language of the statute in question reenforces this interpretation, for it provides for "mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session." This also seems to be the interpretation which Congress has given to the statute, for during the present session of the Sixtieth Congress a Member who, for reasons unnecessary to state, had not been in attendance at all, wrote to the Sergeant at Arms for his mileage (presumably for the purpose of "adding" it to his salary), and he was promptly informed by that official that as he had not attended the session no mileage was due him. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 60th Cong., 2d sess., 1178.) This Member was paid his regular salary until he was declared to have vacated his office. If mileage is a part of the regular compensation of a Member of Congress under the law in question, there was no reason why this Member should not have received his mileage as well as his $7,500 per annum. Or if, under this law, this Member was not entitled to mileage because he did not come to Washington to attend upon the session of Congress, why should a Member of Congress receive mileage for a session beginning almost simultaneously with the closing of a session for which he had been paid his mileage?

If we look beyond the letter of the law and look at its spirit and reason, we must come to the same conclusion; for the construction asked for by the claimant would make the compensation of Members of Congress unequal. The compensation of a Member of Congress of the Fifty-eighth Congress from one of the Pacific States, would be more than a thousand dollars more than the compensation of a Member from any of the States in the vicinity of Washington, with no traveling having been made to justify this extra pay.

The act of July 28, 1866, provides for mileage for Members of Congress for attendance upon "each regular session." There is no distinction in the nomenclature of sessions of Congress in the Constitution, and we believe every session of Congress regularly called and convened is a "regular session." At least we so consider them for the purpose of deciding this case, and we hold that there were three sessions of the Fifty-eighth Congress—the extraordinary session, beginning November 9, 1903, and closing December 7, and the two regular annual sessions following.

The Fifty-seventh Congress made an appropriation for mileage of Members of Congress for the fiscal year 1904, and this was made available by the Fifty-eighth Congress as soon as it convened in extraordinary session, as before stated. It appears from the petition that but one travel was necessary to go to and return from both this extraordinary session and the December session, and for this travel the claimant had received his mileage.

It might not be out of place here to state that the House of Representatives of the Fifty-eighth Congress, while in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, by a unanimous vote refused to make an appropriation for an extra mileage for these first two sessions. (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, 58th Cong., 2d sess., 1419.) This is at least persuasive that that great body was of the opinion that the law did not authorize such an appropriation. We say this realizing, of course, that if the appropriation had been made that would have been the law regardless of what the act of July 26, 1866, provided.

We think the claimant has received all the mileage to which he is entitled under existing law, and the petition is dismissed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment proposed by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. NORRIS. I have not yielded the floor, Mr. President.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs the pardon of the Senator from Nebraska.

Mr. NORRIS. I desire to make an inquiry about the very question that the Chair propounded. I supposed the amendment offered by the committee was before the Senate, and I wish to inquire whether the Senator from Texas has moved to amend the amendment of the committee. Is that the idea?

Mr. SHEPPARD. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. In what respect?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I have moved to amend by substituting "$12,750" for "$51,000." The amount I propose is one-fourth of $51,000, or 5 cents a mile.

Mr. NORRIS. Is the Senator from Texas opposed to the text of the bill as it came from the House?

Mr. SHEPPARD. I am opposed to it as I view it at present. I think it is better to have a plain provision of a stated sum for mileage; to have a flat rate of mileage. Then there will be no scandal and no complication.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I confess that I was impressed with the provision of the bill as it came from the House. It seemed to me that it was a fair proposition. I know that for quite a number of years I served in Congress with two colleagues coming from adjoining districts, one of whom had a family consisting of 9 or 10 and I am not sure but 11 members, while the other Member, adjoining him, was a bachelor. The towns in which they lived were very close together, not more than 50 or 60 miles apart. The one with the large family did not get, under the law, enough mileage to pay his actual expenses, while the other one, without any family, got practically the same amount, an amount to which his expenses bore no relation whatever.

I think it is conceded by everybody that a man with a family ought to have his family with him, especially when he has to remain during the long sessions of Congress. I do not think there is any objection to paying the actual expenses. Now, I am not sure but that he would find difficulty in applying this provision practically. There may be something in that; but it seems to me there ought to be some other method devised than the one we have now, because that evidently is not fair. The effect of it is that some Members of Congress have their salaries increased a thousand or sometimes fifteen hundred dollars over the amount paid some other Members, while their actual and necessary expenses in coming to and going from the sessions of Congress may be less. It has always seemed to me that that was not fair, and that we ought to adopt some other method.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Iowa?

Mr. NORRIS. In just a moment. It strikes me that the mileage ought to be so adjusted that it would do what it is intended to do, as the court says—pay the actual expense of the Member in coming here and going back.

I now yield to the Senator from Iowa.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I thoroughly agree with the statement of the Senator. I rose to ask him a question, however. He suggested that there might be difficulties in the practical operation of the House provision, and the Senator from Utah made the same suggestion.

Mr. NORRIS. I think the Senator from Texas has that idea in his mind, too.

Mr. KENYON. That is really an indictment, is it not, of the honesty of Members of Congress, if they would abuse any privilege of that kind? The law would be reasonably clear. It says, "immediate and dependent members of their families."

Mr. NORRIS. I will say to the Senator from Iowa that of course there is a possibility of abuse of it, and occasionally that might happen; but it seems to me it would be more just than the present law.

Mr. KENYON. It would not happen a second time, would it?

Mr. NORRIS. I should not think so. I am not saying that it would happen. It strikes me that if you find out there is some abuse of it there may be a way to rectify it. At least the present system is not right, it is not fair, and it strikes me that the House provision, honestly and fairly enforced, would be fair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. SHEPPARD. Mr. President, when I come to examine the bill I do not think my amendment is in order on this particular paragraph. As I understand, the question now is, Shall the House provision be stricken out?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. What is the suggestion of the Senator from Texas? The Chair does not quite understand it.

Mr. SHEPPARD. I wish to know whether my amendment is now in order, to substitute, on line 11, "$12,750" for "$51,000," or whether I should wait until we vote on the preceding paragraph?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The committee amendment is to strike out and insert. There is no proposition by the committee to amend the part stricken out; so a motion to amend the part to be inserted is in order. The Senator's amendment is in order.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My amendment is to amend the part to be inserted.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Texas a question. The motion of the Senator from Texas is to strike out "$51,000" and insert "$12,750," which would then make the appropriation read:

For mileage of Senators, $12,750.

That would be all there would be on the subject in the appropriation bill; but we have a general standing law which says that Members shall receive mileage at the rate of 20 cents a mile. Upon what authority will this $12,750 be divided up?

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President, a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from North Carolina will state the point of order.

Mr. OVERMAN. On lines 4 to 10, inclusive, the committee amendment proposes to strike out that language; and then, on line 11, to insert "$51,000." I submit that the question is whether or not the Senate will agree to the committee amendment proposing to strike out the House language. If we should strike out the House language, then I think the amendment of the Senator from Texas would be in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion to strike out and insert is in its earliest consideration two motions, and when put in the form of one motion the adoption of the committee amendment to insert $51,000 will have the effect of striking out the part of the text indicated; in other words, the House provision on the subject.

Mr. SMOOT. I did not quite understand what the Chair just said, but I take it for granted that the ruling of the Chair was that the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas is in order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is no doubt of that. That part has been settled.

Mr. SMOOT. There is no question about it at all.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In answer to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] I wish to submit my amendment in a modified form in order to relieve it of the objection. I will move to insert:

For mileage of Senators at 5 cents per mile, $12,750.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. How is the Senator to arrive at it? Who is to determine the mileage? The law now is quite specific. It says, "Mileage at the rate of 20 cents per mile, to be estimated by the nearest route usually traveled in going to and returning from each regular session," and it further provides that "mileage accounts of Senators shall be certified by the President of the Senate, and those of Representatives and Delegates by the Speaker of the House of Representatives." The Senator is not making a very complete law on the subject, as it seems to me.

Mr. WARREN. I make a point of order against the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Wyoming will state his point of order.

Mr. WARREN. The point of order is that the amendment proposes to change existing law and without any estimate or without any recommendation of a committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to sustain the point of order, but there is some complication about it in view of the fact that the House sent here a provision which does change existing law.

Mr. WARREN. That is true, but the amendment to the amendment only alludes to the part which is the Senate committee amendment and does not refer to the text of the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair thinks the point of order is well taken. Of course the Senator from Texas can make a motion to amend the amount even though it might leave a deficiency under existing law to be provided for hereafter. A motion to reduce the amount appropriated is in order. The effect of its adoption would be to create a deficiency which would have to be taken care of hereafter.

Mr. SHEPPARD. My original amendment was simply to reduce the amount from $51,000 to $12,750.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The effect of the adoption of that amendment would be to create a deficiency. It would not change the rate a Senator or Representative is entitled to receive, and the disbursing officer would pay out $12,750 on the basis of 20 cents a mile as long as it lasted, and there would be a deficiency to be taken care of hereafter.

Mr. WARREN. The consequence would be that some Members would draw mileage and others would not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That would, of course, follow.

Mr. WARREN. The amount is too small, as the Senator from Texas must know. In fact, the amount put in by the House committee is only a guess. They probably do not expect that it is enough, because it has developed already that in some families there are seven or eight children, not counting other dependents, and hence the proposed new way would be more expensive than the old. We would have to consult the Vice President and find out what his opinion might be as to what our expenses are under the new proposition. So the Senator's amendment can not affect anything if he leaves the law as it is and appropriates only enough to pay a few of the Members.

Mr. SHEPPARD. In view of the situation as it has developed, I will withdraw my amendment and introduce an amendment to the general law.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the adoption of the amendment of the committee.

Mr. KENYON. I ask for the yeas and nays on agreeing to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. KENYON. I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa suggests the absence of a quorum. Let the Secretary call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Brady	Johnson	Owen	Stephenson
Bryan	Jones	Page	Sterling
Burton	Kenyon	Perkins	Stone
Catron	Kern	Ransdell	Sutherland
Clapp	Lane	Shafroth	Thomas
Clarke, Ark.	Lea, Tenn.	Sheppard	Thornton
Crawford	McCumber	Sherman	Tillman
Cummins	Martin, Va.	Shively	Warren
Fletcher	Martine, N. J.	Simmons	West
Goff	Nelson	Smith, Ariz.	White
Hollis	Norris	Smith, Md.	Williams
James	Overman	Smoot

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN] and to state that he is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER].

Mr. WARREN. I wish to announce the unavoidable absence of my colleague [Mr. CLARK of Wyoming]. He is paired with the Senator from Missouri [Mr. STONE]. I make this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Sergeant at Arms will notify Senators in the cloak rooms that a call of the Senate is being made.

Mr. KERN. I suggest that the names of the absentees be called.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. HUGHES and Mr. SMITH of Georgia answered to their names when called.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to announce the necessary absence from the city of the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. WEEKS]. That announcement I will let stand for the day.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey. I was requested to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from West Virginia [Mr. CHILTON]. He is paired with the Senator from New Mexico [Mr. FALL].

Mr. CATRON. I wish to announce the necessary absence of my colleague [Mr. FALL] from the city.

Mr. HOLLIS. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Montana [Mr. WALSH]. He is paired with the senior Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. LIPPITT].

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH]. I wish also to announce that the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER] is unavoidably detained from the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-nine Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The question is on the adoption of the amendment proposed by the Committee on Appropriations.

Mr. KENYON. With a larger attendance, I trust we can now secure a yea-and-nay vote. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator know of any precedent for making a second call for the yeas and nays? The Chair is not advised of any. That call was made and put to the Senate and denied, and nothing has intervened. The Chair is disposed to be liberal about it, and if the Senator has any precedent that justifies it, he will be very glad to conform to it.

Mr. KENYON. I made the call for a quorum, and I again call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is not disposed to make any ruling against it, but the Chair simply wants to know what the precedent has been. He has none that justifies a second call for the yeas and nays when the first call has been denied.

Mr. KENYON. Do I understand that the Chair declines to entertain the call?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair is inclined to entertain it if the Senator can cite him to any precedent to justify it. He simply desires not to make a precedent when he does not find a precedent. In the absence of such a precedent the Chair can see very readily that the rule insisted upon by the Senator may be abused. The question is on the adoption of the amendment reported by the Committee on Appropriations to strike out the matter which appears on page 2, from line 4 to line 10, inclusive, and to insert "For mileage of Senators, $51,000." [Putting the question.] The ayes seem to have it. The ayes have it and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I assume now that business has been transacted I can call for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The matter has been disposed of. The amendment has been adopted. There is now nothing upon which to call the yeas and nays.

Mr. KENYON. The Chair decided it so quickly that it was impossible to make the request before the Chair announced it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That was the very question upon which the yeas and nays were called and the call was denied. A yea-and-nay vote was denied with reference to the amendment. It is not open to a Senator to call for a vote after the vote has been taken. The amendment has been adopted. The Secretary will continue the reading of the bill.

The Secretary resumed the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 2, line 22, after "chief clerk, $3,250," to strike out "and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent."

Mr. McCUMBER. I should like to have an explanation of the amendment. What is the reason for striking this out?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The committee were of the opinion that the salary of $3,250 is a sufficient and adequate salary. In the next place, the committee were indisposed to the addition of $1,250 which was put in the bill when an incumbent of long service held the office. For myself I will say that I do not approve of supplements to salaries to hold simply during the tenure of a particular officer. I think the office ought to carry a salary, that none but competent men ought to be put in these positions, and when they are in those positions they ought to receive a salary which is sufficient for a competent man. The committee felt that $3,250 was a sufficient salary for a competent man, and it struck out those words in order to accomplish that purpose.

Mr. McCUMBER. Does the Senator think that the present incumbent holding the same position—I do not know who he is—is worth less and should be paid less than the other should have been paid? Is that it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I can not say. I have no doubt he is as competent a man, but through long association in that particular position the former incumbent was dealt with generously, more generously we think than the services rendered required. We feel that $3,250 is a sufficient salary for the position and we have reduced it for that reason to that sum.

Mr. McCUMBER. I confess I feel that the position ought to have a fixed salary and the salary ought not to be fixed according to the individual who may happen to hold it. It ought to be sufficient to pay a reasonable, a fair compensation. That compensation ought to be paid to whomsoever fills the official position, and whether he fills it 1 month or 20 years; it is the office, the official position that we are filling.

If the Senator from Virginia feels that the amount now proposed, $3,250, is proper and adequate, I shall make no objection, but I think it ought to have been the same, no matter who holds the position.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is the opinion of the committee that it is a sufficient and adequate salary.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say to the Senator from North Dakota that this position was held for many years by Mr. Gilfry and $1,250 additional was given to him on account of his long service in the position. He has been removed from that position and holds another of less importance, I suppose on account of his age. There has been appointed a chief clerk now at a salary of $3,250, and I understand he is capable and also satisfied with the salary named. It is for that reason that the additional amount named in the former appropriation acts has been stricken from the bill.

Mr. McCUMBER. It is the additional amount that I am particularly protesting against. There are Senators here who have served for a great many years and undoubtedly they are more valuable and better informed than those who have just arrived, at least they may be in some instances, but I do not think that would be any justification for making a difference in their salaries.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 3, line 3, after the word "clerk," where it occurs the first time, to strike out "2 clerks"; in the same line, after the word "and," to strike out "clerk compiling a history of revenue bills" and insert "3 clerks"; and in line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out "$96,730" and insert "$95,480," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Secretary: Secretary of the Senate, including compensation as disbursing officer of salaries of Senators and of the contingent fund of the Senate, $6,500; hire of horse and wagon for the Secretary's office, $420; assistant secretary, Henry M. Rose, $5,000; chief clerk, $3,250; financial clerk, $3,000 and $1,250 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent; minute and journal clerk, principal clerk, reading clerk, and enrolling clerk, at $3,000 each; executive clerk, and assistant financial clerk, at $2,750 each; librarian, file clerk, chief bookkeeper, assistant journal clerk, printing clerk, and 3 clerks, at $2,500 each; first assistant librarian, $2,400; keeper of stationery, $2,400; 4 clerks, at $2,220 each; 2 clerks, at $2,100 each; assistant librarian, $1,800; skilled laborer, $1,200; clerks—1 at $1,800, 2 at $1,600 each, 1 $1,440; assistant keeper of stationery, $2,000; assistant in stationery room, $1,200; messenger, $1,440; assistant messenger, $1,200; laborers—3 at $840 each, 3 at $720 each, 1 in stationery room $720; in all, $95,480.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 3, after line 15, to strike out:

Mr. BRYAN. On behalf of the committee I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 8, line 16, after the numerals "$1,200," near the end of the line, amend the amendment of the committee by inserting the following: "Cuban Relations—clerk, $2,220; assistant clerk, $1,440; messenger, $1,200."

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, the object of the amendment to the amendment is to provide for a committee created by a resolution of the Senate since the bill was considered originally by the committee. The Senate, by a resolution, created an additional committee, and this is designed to provide the necessary clerks.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the Senator from Florida or some one in charge of the matter, why a distinction is made in the salaries paid messengers of these different committees. Why are some paid $1,440 and others $1,200? Why are some clerks of committees paid higher than clerks of other committees? A messenger does not do any different work.

Mr. BRYAN. I understand the messengers for the minority Senators who are not chairmen of committees receive $1,200, and the messengers of the committees receive $1,440.

Mr. KENYON. The messenger of a committee where one of the minority is chairman is paid $1,200, and where one is a majority chairman the messenger is paid $1,440. Is that the distinction?

Mr. BRYAN. I think so. That has always been the distinction.

Mr. KENYON. The work is the same, is it not? The messenger for the Committee on the Distribution of Useless Papers in Executve Departments does not work any more than some other messenger?

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words "messenger, $1,200" wherever they appear, and inserting in lieu thereof "messenger, $1,440."

The reason for this amendment, Mr. President, as we all know, is that the messengers in the committees of minor importance are doing the work of clerks; in other words, there is no Senator who has not enough work to do in his office to keep at least three clerks employed in clerical business, and to keep them all busy; and it is necessary that he should have those who are competent to do the business. He can not use what we would ordinarily understand to be a messenger only, but must have some one who is capable of assisting him in the clerical work. While Senators in the minority are not at the head of committees, they are all members of large and important committees, and are often put on subcommittees, to do work in which they must use the messengers for their clerks. If we are to consider them in the light of messengers only, then a messenger upon an important committee has no other or different character of work than a messenger upon an unimportant committee, and in important committees sufficient clerks have been provided to do the clerical business independent of the messenger. If it is necessary to use the messenger, as it often is—I am not complaining that you are paying him in every one of these instances $1,440 a year—in actual justice every one of the messengers who are used by a Senator to do his clerical work ought to receive at least $1,440. The amount involved would be a mere bagatelle; and yet it would put them all upon a standing in which they should be, and it would make their compensation correspond in some degree to the actual services that are rendered to the committees with which they are connected. For that reason, Mr. President, I urge the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, no request has been made to the committee for the increase of salaries now suggested; no amendment has been offered for that purpose. These salaries were not fixed by the committee at this time, but they are the salaries which have been heretofore paid. There are very few, perhaps two or three, instances in this bill where the committee has increased the salaries of Senate committee employees, when Senators appeared before the committee and gave special reasons why increases should be made; but the proposition now presented is that the salaries shall be increased on a general idea of abstract justice. No such increase has been requested; the committee has not considered the increase; we can not say that it is right, and the Senate can not say that it is right.

In some of these positions on important committees, or with Senators who have a great deal of work, it may be that the messenger in such case should have $1,440 a year. There are other cases where the messengers are doing only the work which properly belongs technically to a messenger, and even the work of a laborer. When the work that is being done is compensated for at $1,200, we ought not to increase the compensation. We are not paying salaries according to the nomenclature of the service. As I have said, nobody has asked for these increases and nobody has stated to the committee any facts justifying them. Many of these messengers are doing merely nominal work. You must bear in mind that until recently each Senator only had two employees, unless he was a chairman of a committee. Then we were asked to give three employees to each Senator and to fix the salary of the third man at $1,200. I think it would lead to a very great increase in the expenses of the Government if we are to increase salaries on the abstract idea when nobody has explained the service which is being rendered or asked for the increase.

I am sure that the committee has been very liberal. Whenever it has been shown to the committee that a salary was too low, we have increased it; and I do protest against a wholesale increase without any explanation or without any facts to justify it.

Mr. McCUMBER. The Senator from Virginia says that no one has asked for this increase; that nobody has suggested it to the committee. Who would the Senator expect to make the suggestion, and who would be better qualified to make the suggestion than the Senators themselves, who employ, or who at least appoint, these messengers, who act as clerks, and the Senators who know what they are doing?

I believe there is not a Senator here who has one of these clerks—because that is what they are, although they are denominated messengers—who will not say that his messenger does exactly the same character of work that his clerks do; that he calls upon him to do the same clerical work that is performed by the others.

We do not need any great discussion, any hearings before the committee, on this matter, because every Senator knows just exactly what it means. It is for the Senator from Virginia to vote upon an amendment in the proper place just exactly what he thinks ought to be done. If he feels that I am in error in my statement that the messengers for all of these committees do clerical work, he would be justified in saying they ought not to receive as much as those denominated clerks—I mean the $1,440 clerks—but if he feels that they are performing, and he himself knows that he is using them to perform exactly the same service, then I certainly feel that he is justified in supporting this amendment to give them the same salary, which amounts to $240 per year more than the $1,200 salary now paid.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, it seems to me that everyone knows that he has grades of clerks who really ought to have different compensations. That is true as to the chief clerk of every committee. He gets a higher salary than the first assistant, and the first assistant gets a higher salary than the messenger. The messenger, in many instances, is not a stenographer and does not perform the same character of duty as the other members of the Senator's staff. That being the case, it seems to me that the salary of $1,200 a year is amply sufficient to pay the messengers a fair compensation.

We know, as a matter of fact, that we can go down town here and get such services at a great deal less than $1,200 a year. I do not believe in absolutely cutting it down to the very salary which is paid in stores and in private offices, because one can get even stenographers at from $50 to $60 a month; but I believe in allowing a fair amount, and $1,200, it seems to me for that class of work, is a fair amount. This compensation has to be graded. We have to limit the governmental expenditures to some extent, and it seems to me, this being the custom, we should adhere to it.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from North Dakota?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. McCUMBER. May I ask the Senator what class of clerks he refers to when he says $1,200 is sufficient for that class of work?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I mean any assistant around an office. Every Senator knows that his chief clerk does a great deal of dictating which the Senator ordinarily would do, and he is supposed to command a higher salary than persons who simply take dictation from others. The second person who is employed generally assists in that particular to some extent, and is always a stenographer. The messenger is sometimes a stenographer and sometimes he is not. These places, however, are being sought at the present salaries. They are paid better compensation than clerks can get down in this city or in any other city in the United States. That being the case it seems to me that we are doing fair by them.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the position of the Senator is correct that the person called a messenger, for whom there is appropriated $1,200 a year, is a messenger only, and that he is used for that purpose alone, then I entirely agree with the Senator that this is good pay; but if, as a matter of fact, which I understand to be the fact—and I know it is the fact so far as my own office is concerned—the messenger does exactly the same kind of work as does the $1,440 clerk, and may be called upon to do exactly the same kind of work, and if that is practically universally so in all of the committees, then I believe that such messengers should be paid the same for doing the same kind of work.

If the Senator's position is correct, and that it is messenger service only that these persons are performing, then they are receiving a sufficient salary; but, as a matter of fact, that is not correct. Practically all of them are performing the work of a clerk and an assistant and doing good work. They are required to do that work, and they ought to be paid $1,440.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as I said before, every Senator has grades of work for his employees. The first man does the important work, dictating very largely in cases where the Senator ordinarily would do it, which directly relieves the Senator of work. He generally dictates to the second person, who is a stenographer; he is a person better skilled and more experienced, who would get more compensation in the open market if his services were demanded. The third is usually a helper, and does not take the important dictation that is required, even if he is a stenographer. Inasmuch as we find no person who is willing to resign these positions, for they all want them, as the class of employment is higher here in the way of compensation than the ordinary commercial salaries, it seems to me that these salaries should not be increased.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, the last remark of my colleague [Mr. SHAFROTH] suggests a very important truth; and I venture to inquire of him whether, if there is going to be a change here for the purpose of equalizing the salaries of all messengers, it would not be better to strike out "$1,440," wherever it occurs, and to insert "$1,200"? If I have counted correctly, there are about 23 messengers who get $1,440 and 20 or 21 whose compensation is $1,200. It seems to me that that is ample when you consider the work that is required of these people and what they could command in the same position outside of public employment. It would be far better for the public service, in my judgment, and a move toward economy to take off the difference between $1,440 and $1,200, instead of adding the difference to the salary of the $1,200 clerks.

Mr. McCUMBER. I want to ask the junior Senator from Colorado, who has a messenger at $1,440, if that messenger only performs the service of a messenger, why he should not also be cut down to $1,200, the same as the other messengers?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Is that question directed to me?

Mr. McCUMBER. Yes. If the Senator's statement is correct that plenty of employees for this class of service can be obtained at $1,200, and that in every one of the committees, including the Senator's committee, messengers perform the character of work which might be called messenger work, then why should not, as suggested by the senior Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS], the messenger employed by the junior Senator from Colorado be cut down to the $1,200 basis? I am assuming that some of the messengers are being paid $1,440 because in reality they are performing the work of clerks, and I am not complaining of that; I think they ought to have it; but if you pay them $1,440, why should you not pay all the others $1,440, and if the services of the others are not worth more than $1,200, why should a messenger in another committee be paid more than $1,200?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the salaries attached to the various employees assigned to the different committees were fixed some time ago. So far as my committee is concerned, the salaries of its employees were fixed before I was made chairman of the committee. I have heard of no change in their salaries, and I had no part in fixing them. I presume the salaries are fixed upon the basis of the importance of the committees, upon the theory that one committee has more work than another committee; and that, therefore, in the end really more work is required of some employees than of others. The employees designated as messengers do not perform exclusively messenger service; there is no doubt about that; they do help in every line of work in the office; there is no question of that; but the relative importance of the work always descends with the diminution of the responsibility and the amount of work required. That is true of all the committees, I think, and that is the reason I am not in accord with the position taken by the Senator.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to state, in response to the Senator, that I think he is in error. I have been chairman of one of the larger committees during my term of service here, and I am free to say that the messenger of the larger committees does not perform the same amount of work nor the same grade of work as is required of the messenger of the smaller committees, because in the larger committees there is a sufficient number of competent clerks to do the work and the messenger has little to do, except what might be called purely messenger work. There is not a Senator here who does not really require three clerks to do his work; and, therefore, as a matter of fact, the messenger of a smaller committee or the messenger of a Senator, where he has only three employees, is really required to do a higher class of work and more important work than is the messenger of a larger committee.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I do not want to object to any reasonable compensation for the employees of the Senate. I tried to find out from the Senator from Florida [Mr. BRYAN] why it was that certain messengers were paid $1,200 a year and others were paid $1,440 a year. He gave as the reason, as I understood him, that the chairmen of minority committees, Republican Senators holding chairmanships, were allotted messengers who were paid $1,200, while the messengers to majority committees were paid $1,440. I was not making any objection to that. Now, the Senator from Colorado gives as one of the reasons the difference in the importance of the committees. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Colorado to one or two items in this bill. I am merely insisting that these employees ought to be paid the same amount for the same kind of work.

Here is the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of State, of which the distinguished Senator from Illinois [Mr. LEWIS] is chairman. The messenger of that committee is paid $1,200 a year. The messenger of the Committee on Expenditures in the Treasury Department is paid $1,200 a year. Those are both what would be called majority committees. The messenger of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice, of which the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] is chairman, is paid $1,440. The various committees on expenditures in the departments certainly rank about the same. I do not suppose any of those committees have ever had any meetings. Now, why is a messenger of a minority committee, whose chairman is a member of the minority side of the Chamber, paid a higher salary than is paid the messengers of the same class of committees on the majority side? I am not objecting to it, but I am wondering why it is.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President——

Mr. KENYON. I am not through, but I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. If the Senator will permit me, I should like to say a word.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator has called attention to the committee of which I am chairman. I will say to the Senator that the salaries paid to the employees of that committee were already fixed when I was made chairman of that committee, and I had nothing to do with the fixing of the salaries. I will say very frankly to the Senator from Iowa that I think all messengers of committees ought to be paid the same amount. I think I am not entitled to a messenger at $1,440 a year while the messenger of the Senator from Iowa, who has as much work as I have and whose work is of the same character, is paid $1,200; it is not fair.

Mr. KENYON. That is the point I was making.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I entirely agree with the Senator, and, while it would be a hardship upon the young man who is holding this position in my committee to cut his salary down, I would vote to make the salaries of all messengers of Senate committees $1,200 or to make them all $1,440. They ought to be the same; the Senator from Iowa is quite right about that.

Mr. KENYON. I want to call attention to one other matter.

Mr. OVERMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from North Carolina?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. OVERMAN. I want to say to the Senator that we have discussed this matter considerably heretofore, and I think there is a disposition to arrange it in some way so as to equalize conditions. This practice, however, has grown up and has been followed here for 20 years, and we have simply followed that practice, but we all feel that something ought to be done to remedy the existing situation, and it probably will be done in the near future.

Mr. JONES. I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

Mr. KENYON. I desire to hold the floor, Mr. President.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Iowa has the floor. Does he yield to the Senator from Washington?

Mr. KENYON. I yield.

Mr. JONES. I want to say to the Senator from North Carolina that I am endeavoring to prepare a plan of reorganization so far as the employees of committees of the Senate are concerned, and I want to ask the Senator if he will help me when we get a chance to vote on that proposition?

Mr. OVERMAN. The Senator from Washington appeared before the committee, and we all agreed that something ought to be done. As I have said, however, the practice has grown up here through a number of years, and it is time that conditions should be changed. Probably we ought to have a committee appointed to bring about a reorganization; and if the duty is assigned to the Committee on Rules, they will undertake it.

Mr. JONES. I am endeavoring to prepare a proposition which I should like to submit either to the Committee on Rules or to a special committee; and what I want to ask the Senator is, if he will not help me?

Mr. OVERMAN. I will be glad to help the Senator in adopting any plan that will bring about an equalization.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Iowa yield to the Senator from Wyoming?

Mr. KENYON. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think there should be some explanation in regard to the minority committee referred to by the Senator from Iowa which has a messenger who is paid at the rate of $1,440 per year. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND], who is chairman of that committee, has either forgotten or else he is too modest to state the fact that that committee was up to within a recent time a majority committee and not a minority committee; and, like many of the other old majority committees, its messenger was paid $1,440. I happen to be serving on the Committee on Committees, and so I am in a position to know something about the matter. After the committees had been tentatively made up—the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN] having charge of the Committee on Committees on the majority side—the Senator from Utah was assigned to the chairmanship of a committee different from that of which he is now the chairman. It was, I believe, Woman Suffrage. As I recall now, there came to us a direction or, perhaps it would be better to say, a request that we make changes in certain committees. The majority side wanted to take over the Committee on Woman Suffrage, of which the distinguished Senator from Colorado [Mr. THOMAS] is now chairman, from the minority and make it a majority committee, and in place of that and one other committee they gave us the Committee on Expenditures in the Interior Department and the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Justice. The appropriation bill carrying the salaries of the employees of those committees had passed and was a law, and so the Senator from Utah, without knowing it himself, because I think I was the one who, later on, told him of it, fell heir to a committee to which was attached a messenger drawing $1,440 per annum.

As everyone knows, the distinguished Senator from Utah has been here a good while. He is a member of very important committees, and although the committee of which he is chairman may be a very small one and may have but little work, yet in other and larger committees of which he is a member he has hard work to do and has greater necessity of more and a better class of service than perhaps a Senator who has just come to the Senate and has not yet received the benefits that later follow in being assigned to the more important committees.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President——

Mr. WARREN. Just a moment, please, and then I will be through. For that reason the committee did not cut down the salary of the messenger attached to the committee of which the Senator from Utah is chairman. I say this in justice to the Senator from Utah.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, to my mind there is nothing too good for the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND]. I am not raising any objection at all that the messenger to his committee is paid $1,440; it did not occur to me to object to that.

Mr. WARREN. I thought I should explain that it happened in that way in the exchange. The Senator can see how it came about.

Now, one word more. I have always, so long as I have served on the Committee on Appropriations, been a member of the subcommittee on this bill. I was always in favor of paying liberal salaries to employees of committees when we were in the majority, and when the minority asked for increases in the salaries of their employees I was always willing, if the minority were nearly a unit in the demand, to try to meet their demands. I recall now that two distinguished Senators, whom I see on the other side, approached me when I was chairman of the committee with requests to increase certain salaries of employees attached to their committees, but I think the distinguished Senator [Mr. CLARKE of Arkansas] who now occupies the chair was about to make a point of order if the change had been made at that time, and so the Senators did not follow it up, and it fell by the wayside.

I feel that we ought not when in the minority to ask any more of the majority than the minority asked and received of us when we were in the majority; in other words, "Turn about is fair play." There is something, to my mind, not in the committees alone, but, taken in connection with the personnel of the Senate, which must lead to some distinction between a Senator who is serving on various committees and who has a great deal of work to do and a new Senator who serves on committees, of course of distinction, but involving less labor.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, the Senator has sounded the exact keynote and has very frankly, I think, stated the reasons for the differences in this bill. It is the difference between Senators. Some are more distinguished and some have more committees and should have more help. It is right along that line.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, the Senator must not impute to me the idea that one Senator is more distinguished than another, but some have more work to do than have others.

Mr. KENYON. I am responsible for the statement that they are more distinguished. I want to call attention in that connection to the fact that under this bill the employees in the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of Commerce and Labor are paid as follows:

Clerk $2,200, assistant clerk $1,440, messenger $1,200.

The chairman of that committee is the Senator from Kansas [Mr. THOMPSON], of the majority. The next item of the bill reads:

Expenditures in the Interior Department—clerk $2,220, assistant clerk $1,800, messenger $1,200.

The chairman of that committee is the distinguished Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT]. Now, why should the assistant clerk of the distinguished Senator from Utah receive $1,800, the Senator from Utah being the chairman of a minority committee, while the assistant clerk of the committee of which the Senator from Kansas, a member of the majority, is chairman receives but $1,440? It seems to me that what the Senator from Wyoming has said is true, and, of course, if that is the way the clerks and messengers of committees are to be paid, it is well to know it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will detain the Senate but a moment. I simply want to say to the Senator from Iowa particularly, and to all other Senators, that of the Senators who employ messengers at $1,200 a year—and there are between 25 and 30 of them, and some of the majority Senators have attached to their committees messengers who receive only $1,200 a year—not one of those Senators has appeared before the committee and said that he had a messenger in his employ receiving too little compensation. Not a single instance can be cited where the Senator employing a messenger has appeared before the committee and stated that his messenger was receiving too small compensation.

Mr. KENYON. May I ask the Senator from Virginia a question?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Certainly.

Mr. KENYON. Why was the salary of the assistant clerk of the Committee on Expenditures in the Department of the Interior raised from $1,440 to $1,800?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Who is chairman of that committee?

Mr. KENYON. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT].

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Utah gave what the committee considered good reasons for that increase in the salary of the assistant clerk of his committee; and if the Senator from Iowa has a clerk or a messenger attached to his committee who he thinks is inadequately paid it does seem to me it is due, in fairness to the committee and in fairness to the Senate, that he should take it up in the orderly and systematic method of legislation and should appear before the committee preparing the appropriation bill and explain why his clerk or his assistant clerk or his messenger is not receiving the amount to which he is entitled.

Mr. KENYON. That is not at all my object in calling attention to that matter. The employees allotted to me are paid sufficient. I am not raising any objection to that. My messenger is paid $1,200 a year, and I use him as a stenographer; and that is sufficient compensation. I am simply objecting that one employee is paid differently from another employee who is doing the same kind of work.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, they do not all render exactly the same service; and Senators who think their messengers or their assistant clerks or their clerks are entitled to more money than they are receiving, in justice to themselves and in justice to their employees and in justice to the committee, ought to appear before the committee and state the facts, and the committe will give careful consideration to them.

The committee, I think, has been very liberal in the matter of paying the employees of Senators. It must be borne in mind—as the matter was referred to just now I reluctantly refer to it myself—that each of the minority Senators now has a third man to assist him in his work. When the Democrats were in the minority they had only two men. The Democrats have been more generous, or at least they have allowed a larger number of employees and better salaries than were allowed to them by the Republicans when the Republicans were in the majority.

I do not wish to claim any credit for this generosity. The work of Senators has increased, and we have met it. I do not think politics enters into it. We have endeavored to deal fairly by every Senator. No Senator has appeared at any time before the Committee on Appropriations and complained without his complaint having careful consideration, and redress when the committee could see its way clear to give him the redress. Not a single messenger nor a single Senator employing messengers has appeared before the committee to ask that these salaries be increased. They were fixed within the last 12 months, when these additional employees were given to the minority Senators, about 25 of them.

The minority asked for these employees. The majority thought the request was right and reasonable, and it provided for them and provided salaries that were satisfactory. No complaint has since been made of these salaries, until we hear it to-day on the floor of the Senate. I do not think that is a reasonable or fair or safe way to legislate. If these things are not right, the objections should be made to the committee, and the committee should have an opportunity to investigate thoroughly. I am sure the committee is open-minded in the matter and is ready to do what is just and right for all of these employees.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I had supposed that one of the functions of the Senate as a body was the right to offer amendments, even though those amendments had not been offered before a committee. I think the Senator will agree with me that the Senate as a body now sitting here is better able to determine what ought to be done in justice in the matter of these clerks than anyone could do in appearing before the committee.

I have believed at all times that the salaries of these messengers should be above $1,200. When we were in the majority on this side I was just as earnest and ardent in my desire, and I think every year I made the motion to raise those salaries in every instance to the $1,440 figure. That always has been my view, and I still think it ought to be done. It is not a question of going before the committee beforehand, because every Senator knows about what service he is employing in his own committee. While the Senator from Iowa [Mr. KENYON] thinks the amount of $1,200 is a sufficient amount for the assistant he has, I am perfectly frank to say that the messenger I have is worth more than $1,200 a year, and ought to be paid $1,440; but I would not go before a committee and ask that one should be put on a different plane from the others. If they were all $1,200, I would say that they would have to be satisfied with that, although I should insist they were all worth more than $1,200. What I do claim is simply that there ought to be no difference in the salaries paid to messengers, and that all should be put on the $1,440 basis, according to my view.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, with the permission of the Senator, I simply desire to correct a statement I made just now. I said there were about 25 messengers. I had reference to the minority appointments. There are about 45 messengers in all, instead of 25, employed by the committees of the Senate, who are receiving only $1,200 each.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that the minute you raise these salaries universally to $1,440 the assistant clerks will want $1,800, and they will be in here insisting upon it, because they will show you and show each one of us that their work is more important, that they are called upon to do work on more important occasions, and that it is a higher class of work than the messenger performs, even where the messenger is a stenographer and does relieve the assistant clerk of the committee.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] to strike out "$1,200" where it appears in connection with the salaries of the messengers named in the amendment proposed by the committee and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,440."

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 12, after line 6, to insert:

All Senate resolutions passed prior to July 1, 1914, authorizing the payment for clerical and messenger services from the contingent fund of the Senate are hereby repealed.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by inserting, on page 12, line 10, after the word "Senate," the words "whose services are specifically provided for herein."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator will send the amendment to the desk and let the Secretary state it.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, line 10, in the committee amendment, after the word "Senate," the Senator from North Carolina proposes to insert the words "whose services are specifically provided for herein."

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I will ask the Senator from Virginia if the committee will not accept that amendment.

Mr. SMOOT. I should like to have the amendment stated again.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah asks that the amendment may be again stated to the Senate.

The Secretary again stated the amendment.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as I understand, the Senator from North Carolina asks if I will accept that amendment for the committee. I can not do so. I am not authorized by the committee to do so, because the committee has not acted upon it.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then, I offer that amendment.

The Senator will observe that in the preceding section of the bill, beginning on page 7, line 17, it specifies various salaries for committee clerks and assistant clerks. The committee amendment now pendng repeals all resolutions passed by the Senate prior to July 1, 1914, authorizing the payment for clerical and messenger services from the contingent fund of the Senate. It is very well known that occasionally a resolution passes the Senate providing for extra service for certain committees. If this amendment should be adopted it would repeal all of those resolutions and abolish the right of the committee to appoint these extra men.

To illustrate, the Finance Committee, of which I have the honor to be the chairman, has been from time immemorial permitted by resolution of the Senate to employ an expert to assist the committee, and the committee has been allowed to fix his salary at a reasonable sum. I do not think there has been a time since I have been in the Senate, in the last 13 years, when a resolution of that kind has not been in force. In fact, it has been the custom before the adjournment of every Congress to pass a resolution of that kind with respect to this committee. My understanding is that there are probably other resolutions of a similar character; but these other resolutions, as I understand—I may be mistaken about it—are probably provided for in the preceding section.

The effect of this amendment will be largely to repeal a resolution providing for extra service for the Finance Committee. The majority has an expert and the minority has an expert. Heretofore, in addition to the expert, the minority and the majority, as I understand, have each had an additional man. We have cut off those men, and we are now only employing one expert each for the majority and the minority.

Personally, I should be very much embarrassed if this amendment should be agreed to without this qualification, because it would deprive me of the services of an expert in connection with the work of the Finance Committee, and I am seriously in need of him every day. There is scarcely a day, or certainly not many days at any time, when I have not inquiries about the tariff, the effect of its operation, and its meaning which require some investigation before being answered. I have not the time to do it, and I have had this gentleman to do that work for me. It requires an expert to do it. An ordinary clerk or secretary could not well do it.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Carolina yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. SIMMONS. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. If I understand the amendment offered by the Senator, I do not believe it will accomplish what the Senator desires to accomplish.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think it will.

Mr. SMOOT. In that connection, I wish to say to the Senator that I am in full accord with the former practice of having an expert for the majority and an expert for the minority of the committee, but I do not believe it ought to go further than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is as far as it goes.

Mr. SMOOT. I say, it has gone further, but I do not think it ought to go further.

Mr. SIMMONS. It has; but we have abolished that.

Mr. SMOOT. I think it ought to be abolished. If the Senator's amendment is not agreed to, however, and the amendment of the committee is agreed to, all that it would be necessary for the Senator to do would be, on the 30th of June, to have a resolution passed, as we always have done in the past, providing for those two positions.

Mr. SIMMONS. Of course, I understand that; but I wish to avoid the necessity of having to secure the passage of such a resolution.

Mr. SMOOT. I was going to say to the Senator that if his amendment does accomplish what he desires to accomplish by it, then it is going to affect also a great number of others who are on the rolls to-day by virtue of special resolutions of the Senate, and that we do not want to do.

Mr. SIMMONS. No; I think the Senator is mistaken.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President——

Mr. SMOOT. I will give way to the Senator from Virginia in just a minute. I will say to the Senator that all of the employees of committees are provided for now by being specifically named in the amendment that has just been adopted by the Senate. That being the case, we wanted to repeal all the resolutions that have been passed prior to July 1, because every messenger, clerk, and assistant clerk is provided for that we think ought to be provided for in the amendment that has already been adopted. I will say frankly, however, that the two positions of which the Senator speaks are not provided for; and they are the only two, I understand, that the Senator wants to reach.

Mr. SIMMONS. This amendment repeals all resolutions authorizing them.

Mr. SMOOT. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to confine that repeal to the provisions of this particular section.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that if his amendment is put in here it will not repeal the many resolutions that have been passed by the Senate; and I believe that now would be a very good time to have everything cleared up, so that we will know just exactly where we are up to date, anyhow. That was the object of this amendment. I will say to the Senator that I believe the Senate would gladly pass on the 30th day of June a resolution providing for the two positions of which he speaks; but this amendment not only provides for those two, but it also prevents the repeal of the resolutions of last year.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as we all know, a custom has grown up here of making appointments of persons to be paid for out of the contingent fund of the Senate. The committee found 30 of those appointees, and our object was to take in all of them. We felt that where employees were needed permanently they ought to be provided for by law and not by Senate resolution; that they ought to be paid out of the Treasury and not out of the contingent fund of the Senate.

I have before me a list of 30 employees that we took from the list of persons that were being paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and we have provided for them in this bill by appropriation. Having done that, we do not wish to have those same names stay on the pay roll, to be paid out of the contingent fund of the Senate, and our object was to prevent that duplication.

Mr. WARREN. If my colleague on the committee will permit me, was it not the object to get a perfect clean-up, and then, if extra men for extra seasons or for extra purposes were wanted, of course, it can be reached by resolution?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That was the purpose of the committee. I will say for myself, and I think I can say for the committee, that none of us knew anything about, or certainly did not have in mind, the fact, if we ever heard of it—and I do not think I ever have, though I can readily see now how the practice arose—that the Finance Committee had some experts employed. Our object was, as the Senator from Wyoming says, to clean up this matter and put on the permanent roll all the employees that were needed and have them paid by law and not by Senate resolution.

Mr. WARREN. It ought to be freshened up by passing new resolutions.

Mr. MARTIN of Vriginia. It has now come to our knowledge, however, that in using general language, repealing all of these Senate resolutions, there are some few that we did not provide for in this bill that no doubt ought to be continued in the service of the committees. With a view of protecting such cases as that, I asked the clerk of the Committee on Appropriations to prepare an amendment, which is the amendment that has been offered by the Senator from North Carolina, and which limits the repeal to the cases where the employees have been put by this bill on the permanent roll, and does not repeal the resolutions where the persons paid by Senate resolutions out of the contingent fund have not been provided for by the pending bill.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. POMERENE in the chair). Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Utah?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. SMOOT. That is absolutely true if they are specifically provided for in the amendment that has just been adopted; but I call the Senator's attention to the fact that not only are there the two cases the Senator has undertaken to reach by his amendment, and which he has explained to the Senate, but, if the Senator will remember, there are a number of resolutions that have been passed here for temporary help.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I will say to the Senator that if that is so this amendment protects them. This amendment repeals those resolutions only where the employees have been put in this bill and appropriated for.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, but we wanted to go further than that. We wanted, as I understood—and being a member of the committee I thought the Senator understood it the same way I did—to go further than that. We wanted to adopt an amendment to the bill repealing all of the resolutions in regard to every employee that is not specifically provided for in the bill, just as the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN] stated. If there were only the two that the Senator from North Carolina has mentioned, then the amendment would be perfectly right; but I wish to say to the Senator that we have passed resolutions here for temporary employees whose employment does not cease at the end of the fiscal year, and if these words are put in this amendment now it will not repeal those particular resolutions.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It will not.

Mr. SMOOT. I think they ought to be repealed.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is a question for the Senate to determine. I was simply explaining the attitude of the committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, does the Senator from Utah know of any case except that of the Finance Committee, and possibly the Committee on Interoceanic Canals? They were authorized to employ some extra service in connection with the bill just passed on yesterday. I think they are probably the only cases that are not included in the enumeration in the amendment of the committee.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, as I stated at the outset, as the committee had adopted this amendment I did not feel at liberty, for and in behalf of and in the name of the committee, to consent to the proposed change; but really, when it is stated that these assistants are necessary, it seems to me not of any great consequence whether they are paid for by law or out of the contingent fund. We certainly diminished this evil very much when we provided for 30 of these employees.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator does not understand that I am objecting at all to taking care of those two men?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. No; I understand the Senator very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator will find that every clerk or employee who has been provided for by special resolution is taken care of in the preceding section, except the two cases I have cited. At least, that has been my understanding from conversations I have had with the officials of the Senate who pay these clerks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, as a member of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, I will state that we have had up for consideration before the committee several times the matter of help that was desired by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, as well as the ranking minority member of the Committee on Finance. The temporary employment, as I understand, which was authorized by the resolution and was payable out of the contingent fund of the Senate, consisted of three employees. They remained on the roll for a considerable length of time, until the committee felt that it ought not to——

Mr. SIMMONS. Three on the part of the majority and three on the part of the minority.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir; three on the part of the majority and three on the part of the minority. We had the matter up several months and we refused to audit for two of those persons for a while, and at last we would yield, until we came to the conclusion that we would audit for one for each—one additional employee over the regular help of the chairman and one to the ranking minority member.

We want to get rid of this very thing of paying salaries out of the contingent fund of the Senate, because we do not think it is the best way to do it. It ought to be provided by law.

I do not know what force the Senator has in his committee. He has a good-sized force. How many clerks, messengers, and so forth, are regularly provided in the Finance Committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have two assistant clerks.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Two assistant clerks? I thought the force was considerably larger than that.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is, in addition to the chief clerk.

Mr. SHAFROTH. The Senator has three altogether, then?

Mr. SIMMONS. Yes; and I have a messenger.

Mr. SHAFROTH. And a messenger; a total of four. I am perfectly willing to insert in this bill, if necessary, a specific provision for the one man that the Senator wants. Of course that would be perfectly satisfactory. How many are provided in this bill for the Finance Committee?

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I wish to call the Senator's attention to the fact that the minority have always been accorded the same number that the majority have, as far as that is concerned; and I would not want to claim for myself a right that I would not concede to the minority, in view of the practice in this matter from time immemorial.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, here is a general provision that is sweeping in its effects, and which may affect a good many committees. We can not tell. Perhaps you can not point them out now; but it is not wise, it seems to me, to legislate in a general manner when you are attempting to get a specific thing. If the Senator wants this one expert, I am perfectly willing to vote for it; but it seems to me it ought to be done by a direct insertion in the bill, together with the salary which should be attached to the position.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I think I can assure the Senator, from conversations I have had with an official of the Senate who has charge of the payment of these salaries, that nobody would be affected by the amendment I propose except the two assistants allowed the Finance Committee, one for the majority and one for the minority.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why not make it specific, then, so that we can not have any difficulty about it?

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall not object if that is done, and two experts are provided for—one for the majority and one for the minority. I shall have no sort of objection to that.

Mr. SHAFROTH. What salaries have they been drawing?

Mr. SIMMONS. I think $2,000 each. That is my recollection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. My objection to this amendment, more particularly, is to avoid the difficulties we have had in the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It mixes up matters considerably. We do not know where we are in the way of salaries. We do not know what resolutions may be affected by this very provision. If the Senator will insert "two experts" or "one expert for the chairman, at a salary not exceeding $2,000," and the same for the minority, or for the exact amount of $2,000, if that is the salary—I want it exactly the same——

Mr. SIMMONS. I think that is the salary.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That would be perfectly satisfactory; but it seems to me it is unwise to put in a general clause here that may affect 30 committees, and that we would wake up and find that there were several cases covered by it that we did not intend to have covered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, in order to save time I understand the Senator from North Carolina withdraws the amendment and will prepare an amendment providing for two experts, one for the majority and one for the minority.

Mr. SIMMONS. I ask the Senator if we can not agree to that right now as an amendment on page 9, line 19.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Simply for the reason that unanimous consent has been given to dispose of the committee amendments first, and we have not finished with them. If the Senator will wait I am sure there will be no objection—I certainly have none—to his proviso for two experts.

Mr. SIMMONS. Very well.

Mr. KERN. In this connection I desire to inquire only for information as to if, when there are no tariff bills or other important measures pending before the Committee on Finance, it is necessary that they should keep in their employment these two experts? What purpose is to be served? What kind of work is to be done?

Mr. SIMMONS. I explained, probably before the Senator came into the Chamber, that ever since I have been here the Finance Committee has been allowed these experts, one for the majority and one for the minority, and then when a tariff bill has been up the committee has been allowed additional force. While we were considering the tariff bill the majority had three extra men and the minority had three extra men. In addition to that, I suppose we had in the employ of the committee at least 10 or 12 other persons and they were at work from morning until night and very frequently far into the night. After we finished the tariff bill in a short time I discharged all of my three men except one. Finally the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate decided that they would permit the majority to have one extra man and the minority to have one extra man.

Now, as to the need of this man, I stated before the Senator came in that ever since the passage of the tariff law—and I suppose that has been the experience all along—there are numerous inquiries of the chairman of the committee with reference to provisions of the tariff, its meaning and effect, the construction, and all those things, and a great deal of work has to be done in order to get up the necessary data to answer those inquiries. No one can do it except a man who has some knowledge of the tariff. I have found that the gentleman who has been on the roll as an expert for the majority has been about the hardest-worked man in my office. If I did not have him, I would have to do that work myself. It is no invasion of the ordinary custom. I do not think there is a Senator here who can name a time when the Finance Committee, whether a tariff bill was up or not, has not been allowed one extra man to help in the performance of this work. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SMOOT] has long been upon that committee, and I will ask him if my statement is not absolutely correct?

Mr. SMOOT. I will say in answer to the Senator that his statement is correct. I will also add to what the Senator has stated, and in answer to the Senator from Indiana, that when tariff bills were not before Congress in the past we have always kept the experts for this particular work. As the importations and exportations take place and the decisions of the customs court are given and also at the port of entry are made, he keeps track of all those. He is virtually a library for the committee, and when any question may be asked the committee from any part of the United States he is supposed to have the answer at hand. When a Senator asks a question upon the importation of goods or any other question affecting the tariff he is supposed to have the information at his fingers' ends. We keep those men for that purpose. They are just as busy, or should be just as busy nearly, when a tariff bill is not before Congress as when it is.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will yield, in order to save time, no one is disputing this, and if he will just give Senators an opportunity to vote on it, I think it will be disposed of.

Mr. KERN and Mr. LANE addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. To whom does the Senator from North Carolina yield?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator from North Carolina will yield to me, I offer this amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia offers an amendment, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 9, line 19, after the numerals "$1,440," insert:

Two experts, one for the majority and one for the minority, at $2,000 each.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from North Carolina a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One moment. The Secretary advises the Chair that the amendment of the committee has already been agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that it be reconsidered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to a reconsideration of the amendment of the committee? The Chair hears none, and it is reconsidered.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I now offer the amendment to the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, which has just been read, to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I wish to ask the Senator from North Carolina, so that the Committee on Contingent Expenses of the Senate will understand exactly where they are with relation to this matter. The bill provides that there shall be 1 clerk to the Finance Committee, at $3,000; 1 assistant clerk, at $2,220; 1 assistant clerk, at $1,600; an assistant clerk, at $1,440; and a messenger, at $1,440. That makes 5. Under any resolution will there be any money that will be expended out of the contingent fund?

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely none.

Mr. SHAFROTH. None whatever?

Mr. SIMMONS. None.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is, when these experts are added there will be nothing for the Committee on Contingent Expenses to allow for your committee.

Mr. SIMMONS. Absolutely nothing.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Very well.

Mr. SIMMONS. Unless we have another tariff bill coming up.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, the regular order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment offered on page 12. Without objection, it is agreed to.

Mr. LANE. Let it be reported, please.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment will be again read.

The SECRETARY. On page 12, after line 6, insert:

All Senate resolutions passed prior to July 1, 1914, authorizing the payment for clerical and messenger services from the contingent fund of the Senate are hereby repealed.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. McCUMBER. Before we proceed further I wish to reserve the right to offer, as soon as I can have it drawn, an amendment, following line 6, on page 12, which will provide for an extra month's salary for each of the employees of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair takes it that that would properly come up after the committee amendments have been disposed of.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; after the committee amendments are completed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. For fear that I may omit it, I will take occasion now to ask unanimous consent that the clerks shall be directed to change the totals so as to conform to all changes that the Senate is making.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Without objection, it is so ordered. The next amendment of the committee will be stated.

The next amendment was, on page 12, line 12, after "$6,500," to strike out "horse and wagon for his use, $420, or so much thereof as may be necessary"; in line 16, after the word "each," to strike out "37" and insert "32"; in line 17, after the word "each," to insert "1 at $1,000"; in line 23, after the word "each," to strike out "1 at $900"; on page 13, line 4, after "$840," to insert "3 at $800 each"; in the same line, after the word "each," to strike out "27" and insert "32"; and in line 7, after the words "in all," to strike out "$133,220" and insert "$131,700," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper: Sergeant at Arms and Doorkeeper, $6,500; Assistant Sergeant at Arms, $2,500; Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000; Acting Assistant Doorkeeper, $3,000; messengers—4 (acting as assistant doorkeepers) at $1,800 each, 32 at $1,440 each, 1 at $1,000, 2 on the floor of the Senate at $2,000 each, 1 at card door $1,600; clerk on Journal work for CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, to be selected by the official reporters, $2,000; storekeeper, $2,220; upholsterer and locksmith, $1,440; cabinetmaker, $1,200; 3 carpenters, at $1,080 each; janitor, $1,200; skilled laborers—4 at $1,000 each; laborer in charge of private passage, $840; 3 female attendants in charge of ladies' retiring room, at $720 each; telephone operators—chief at $1,200, 2 at $900 each, night operator, $720; telephone page, $720; press gallery—superintendent, $1,800, assistant superintendent, $1,400; laborers—1 $840, 3 at $880 each, 32 at $720 each; 16 pages for the Senate Chamber, at the rate of $2.50 per day each during the session, $4,600; in all, $131,700.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, after line 7, to strike out:

For the following for service of the Senate Chamber (heretofore paid from appropriation "Miscellaneous items on account of the Maltby Building"), namely: Messengers—4 at $1,440 each, 1 $1,000; laborers—3 at $800, 5 at $720 each; in all, $12,760.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 13, line 15, after "$1,200," to strike out "attendants in bathing rooms 1 in charge $1,800, 2 at $720 each; janitor, $720," and in line 20, after the words "in all," strike out "$10,620" and insert "$6,660," so as to make the clause read:

For the following for Senate Office Building under the Sergeant at Arms, namely: Stenographer in charge of furniture accounts and keeper of furniture records, $1,200; 3 attendants to women's toilet rooms, at $720 each; messengers—2 acting as mail carriers, at $1,200 each, 1 for service to the press correspondents $900; in all, $6,660.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 14, after line 16, to strike out:

Clerks to Senators: For 30 annual clerks to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, at $2,000 each, $60,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 14, after line 19, to strike out:

Stenographers to Senators: For 23 stenographers to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, and 3 stenographers to the chairmen of the 3 minority committees, at $1,200 each, $31,200.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was on page 14, after line 23, to insert:

For assistance to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, as follows: Twenty-five clerks, at $2,000 each; 25 assistant clerks, at $1,200 each; and 25 messengers, at $1,200 each; in all, $110,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move to amend the committee amendment on page 14, line 25, by striking out "twenty-five" and inserting "twenty-four"; on page 15, line 2, before the words "assistant clerks," strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-four," and in the same line, after the word "and," strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-four," so as to read:

For assistance to Senators who are not chairmen of committees, as follows: Twenty-four clerks, at $2,000 each; 24 assistant clerks, at $1,200 each; and 24 messengers, at $1,200 each—

And so forth.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will explain the amendment to the amendment. The provision made for the Committee on Cuban Relations made it proper to reduce the number here, as we added it there.

Mr. SMOOT. That is true, but I thought we were going to have a leeway of one or two.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We have. We had it before. We still have it. The 25 being changed to 24 leaves exactly the same leeway which we had before.

Mr. SMOOT. The same leeway we had before?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Exactly the same.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 5, to strike out:

For postage stamps for the office of the Secretary of the Senate, $200; for the office of the Sergeant at Arms, $150; in all, $350.

And to insert in lieu thereof:

For postage stamps for the office of the Secretary, $100; for the office of the Sergeant at Arms, $100; in all, $200.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am informed by the financial clerk of the Senate that the allowance for postage in his office is inadequate; that in the absence of Senators there is a great deal of correspondence, sending checks, and correspondence of one sort and another. He will not expend the additional amount unless it is necessary. I move that "$100," on line 9, be increased to "$200."

The SECRETARY. On page 15, line 9, strike out "$100" and insert "$200."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, after line 10, to insert:

For the purchase of two automobiles, including the driving, maintenance, and care of same, one for the use of the Vice President and one for the use of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, $9,000; one half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. KENYON. I think there are some Senators who desire to be present when this amendment is considered, and I suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Borah	Lane	Ransdell	Smoot
Brady	McCumber	Robinson	Stephenson
Burton	Martin, Va.	Saulsbury	Sterling
Clarke, Ark.	Myers	Shafroth	Sutherland
Crawford	Nelson	Sheppard	Swanson
Cummins	Norris	Sherman	Thomas
Hollis	Overman	Shively	Thornton
Hughes	Owen	Simmons	Tillman
Jones	Page	Smith, Ariz.	Townsend
Kenyon	Pittman	Smith, Ga.	Warren
Kern	Pomerene	Smith, Md.	White

Mr. LANE. I wish to announce the absence of my colleague [Mr. CHAMBERLAIN]. He is paired with the Senator from Pennsylvania [Mr. OLIVER]. I should like this announcement to stand for the day.

Mr. SMOOT. I desire to announce the unavoidable absence of the junior Senator from Maine [Mr. BURLEIGH] and also of the senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. GALLINGER]. I will allow this announcement to stand for the day.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will call the names of the absent Senators.

The Secretary called the names of the absentees, and Mr. CHILTON and Mr. JAMES answered to their names when called.

Mr. MARTINE of New Jersey and Mr. WILLIAMS entered the Chamber and answered to their names.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Forty-eight Senators having answered to their names, a quorum of the Senate is present. The pending amendment will be read.

The SECRETARY. On page 15, after line 10, insert:

For the purchase of two automobiles, including the driving, maintenance, and care of same, one for the use of the Vice President and one for the use of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, $9,000; one-half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I simply want to give my reason for one vote against the amendment. I am perfectly willing to vote the Vice President $4,000 or $4,500 extra salary if it is necessary and if it can be shown in any way that it is necessary. I do not know but, considering the position that he occupies, he ought to have a greater salary than he is now being paid, and I shall most cheerfully agree to vote a proper salary, but I am unalterably opposed to any system whereby the Government begins to pay the family expenses of any officer, whether it be the Vice President or any other. It is a part of the old system of monarchy that we got rid of a great many years ago. I do not want to see it introduced again, but I do wish to see a salary paid to the high officers of the Government that will enable them to have their horses and carriages or automobiles and drivers, and I would suggest——

Mr. POMERENE. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Ohio?

Mr. McCUMBER. Certainly.

Mr. POMERENE. In view of the statement of the Senator with respect to automobiles, would he advise selling the White House?

Mr. McCUMBER. No, Mr. President; I would not advise selling the White House; I would not advise selling any building that we may have for our diplomats; but I would advise against paying the cook for the White House or paying any particular expenses connected with the White House. However, I am perfectly willing to pay a sufficient salary to enable the President to live as a President ought to live, and leave the matter of family expenses to be defrayed by him in accordance with the way he would desire to live. That is the only proper method. I think we all understand the reasons why it should be so. There is no use in making any argument about it, but I confess I do not believe any good reason can be given for picking out one item of the expenses of a family any more than to pay their board or any other particular item. We ought to give them a sufficient compensation, so that they can live as they ought to live in the city of Washington.

Mr. SAULSBURY. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from North Dakota that I have very earnestly, as far as I could, advocated and tried to accomplish a raise in the salary of the Vice President. I think the Vice President's salary ought to be at least $25,000. It is a high, dignified position, and the idea that he should be paid a mere pittance, such as is paid now, practically, to men on the reserve bank board, I think, is absolutely absurd, when you consider the dignity of the position and the necessities he has to uphold the dignity of the position.

I feel, however, that it is absolutely impossible, in the present temper of the Members of the Senate, as I have talked with them, to obtain that salary for the Vice President of the United States. I am therefore in favor of helping along toward the maintenance of his dignity and the necessities under which he lives in this city.

I shall certainly vote for this provision for an automobile. I would vote gladly to pay the rent of a house in this city, suitable to the dignity of the Vice President of this country, where he is engaged in the performance of his duty.

I sincerely hope that this small increase toward the payment of his necessary expenses will not be denied, as it appears to be the only thing at this time that we can get.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I agree with the Senator from Delaware that the salary of the Vice President ought to be $25,000 a year, and I would gladly vote to afford him that extra salary. The duties incumbent upon him are such that he is compelled to keep up an establishment that requires certainly $25,000 to do it. He is in demand over the country to make addresses here and there, and I regard it as his duty to accept such invitations wherever it is possible for him to do so and get in full touch with the American people.

I can not understand why any Senator will say, "I am willing to vote the Vice President $4,500 extra for an automobile, and yet I am unwilling to vote him that much more salary and let him use it as he sees fit in the proper way that he sees fit." I can not imagine that there is any Member of the House or of the Senate who is so shortsighted that he would be willing to vote a particular item of expense and enumerate it, but on the other hand would not be willing to vote the same amount as an addition to his salary.

I sincerely hope that those on the other side who have the power will modify the bill, so as to put everything in the form of a salary, and let us avoid this very bad precedent of paying the family expenses of the officials of the Government.

Mr. OVERMAN. This is not a precedent. This item was put in an appropriation bill about six years ago giving the Vice President an automobile. The present Vice President has that automobile, and it is worn out; it has cost more to maintain it perhaps in the last two years than a new automobile would cost. If you would count the expense incurred for its upkeep, you would find that it would amount to enough to purchase a new automobile. This worn-out automobile is the property of the Government; it is continually breaking down. If we could afford to give the last Vice President an automobile, it seems to me we can afford to give the present occupant of that office an automobile.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, the office of Vice President of the United States is the second office in dignity and in importance in this Government. Congress gives very ungrudgingly to the office of President a very large sum of money each year for the maintenance of that office, in order that the President may live decently and in a manner befitting the Chief Magistrate of a great Nation. Most Vice Presidents in recent years have been men of wealth, some of them of large wealth. The last distinguished Vice President from New York, Mr. Sherman, was a man of moderate circumstances, well to do. Members on this side of the Chamber cheerfully voted for an appropriation to provide an automobile for Vice President Sherman. That automobile has worn out. The present Vice President is a poor man; he has no independent means; and it seems to me to be very small economy to refuse now to permit him to have an automobile, as his predecessor had, and which was voted to him by the votes of Members on this side of the Chamber.

Mr. McCUMBER. If the Senator will yield, I hope he does not think that I would deprive the Vice President of what he ought to have—an automobile and a chauffeur.

Mr. KERN. I do not believe the Senator would desire to deprive him of that.

Mr. McCUMBER. But the point I am trying to make is that instead of taking up a particular item of expenditure we should take the same amount, which is $4,500, and vote it directly as an addition to the Vice President's salary. He can then use it to purchase an automobile or use it in any other way that he thinks it is for his best interest to use it.

Mr. KERN. That proposition does not meet the situation at all. As stated by the Senator from Delaware [Mr. SAULSBURY], it would be impossible at this time, as I think would be recognized by the Senator from North Dakota, to provide an addition to the salary of the Vice President.

The Senator speaks of this being a precedent. It is not a precedent at all. The vice presidential office had voted to it an automobile; it was in the possession, control, and use of the former Vice President, and it has been in the use of the present Vice President until now it can no longer be used. The question is, whether this automobile shall be replaced. If this were a precedent, it would be a different question; but, I repeat, it is not a precedent we are establishing at all. It is simply to give to the Vice President what he has already had and what his immediate predecessor has had.

Mr. McCUMBER. The voting of expenses in a particular line to different officers is a precedent. I will not say it begins here, but the time has been of very short duration since we began that system, and I should like to get out of that system as soon as we can, and pay our officers such a salary as they ought to receive. I want in good faith to ask the Senator from Indiana why anyone should oppose raising the salary of the Vice President by $5,000 who would vote to pay him $5,000 extra to be used in some particular manner?

Mr. KERN. For the same reason that Senators will refuse to raise the salaries of Members of this body, though a large number of us have no independent means; we have no independent source of income aside from our salaries, and are struggling along to make both ends meet here on the salary which we receive. There is a sentiment, a prejudice, against the increase of salaries of public officers; but that prejudice and criticism would be unjust, and yet that situation prevails.

Mr. McCUMBER. Would there not be the same prejudice against voting a Senator $4,000 for an automobile as there would be against voting him $4,000 extra salary?

Mr. KERN. As a matter of first impression, I imagine there would; but that is not the question here at all. The question here is, whether or not an automobile that has been in the use of the Vice President, which was provided for a former Vice President, shall be replaced. It is introducing nothing new in the way of a precedent.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I think I can bring this matter to a focus, at least in a better manner, if I offer as a substitute for this provision on page 15, line 11——

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the Senator from North Dakota yield to me?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from North Dakota yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. McCUMBER. I yield.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I want to say that there is a good deal of difference, in my judgment, between allowing those things that are necessary to the office and increasing the salary. I am opposed to increases of salary. I think every time you increase a salary in any particular case you offer an inducement to persons occupying other positions to make demands for similar increases. That does not always apply in the case of giving the things that are necessary to the proper carrying on of an office, and would not in the case of the President and the Vice President in giving them the things that are necessary for the use of the highest officials of the Government. Take, for instance, the increase of the salary of the President of the United States. It was advocated upon the theory, first, that there should be an increase because of the traveling expenses on the part of the President, and $25,000 was added on that account; yet two years had not elapsed—I do not think one year elapsed—until an additional $25,000 was appropriated for the expenses of the President in traveling.

Mr. WARREN. I think those increases were made the same year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. In the same year, then.

Mr. WARREN. An effort was made to fix the salary of the President at $100,000 per annum. The amount was reduced to $75,000. It was provided in another bill that thereafter $25,000, or so much thereof as might be necessary, should be appropriated each year for the traveling expenses of the President.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If we attempt to cover this item of expense by putting it in the form of an increase in salary, we shall find that it will not be long until Senators get up here and try to secure the appropriation of an additional amount for an automobile. Consequently, so far as the Government is concerned, that would be more expensive than to allow this item of $4,500 to the Vice President for an automobile.

Mr. President, it does seem to me that in connection with the position of Vice President of the United States there is a certain amount of entertaining that is absolutely necessary, and in order to have the office conducted in a manner commensurate with the dignity of the position the Vice President should have an automobile. On that account, it seems to me we ought to provide one. While the amount proposed to be appropriated is apparently large, it is not really so when you take into consideration that it provides for a chauffeur, for the upkeep of the automobile, and also for the expense of its running. So, altogether, $4,500 for that purpose is not an exorbitant amount. Of course, the Vice President should have a good car, not one that he would be ashamed of, or one that we would be ashamed to see him enter. For that reason, it seems to me that it would be far better for the Government that this appropriation, so requisite and so necessary to the position, should be made than it would be to increase the salary of the Vice President.

I believe that the influence of increasing salaries permeates every officer in the Government. I have always been opposed to increases of salaries. I have felt that whenever you increase a salary there will be a constant demand on the part of other officers of the Government who hold positions at least somewhere near to those as to whom increases have been made that their salaries also shall be increased. Thus the line of increases will be far greater than if you give to the proper officer such amount as it is now proposed to appropriate for an automobile for the Vice President,

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to say in reply to the Senator that the danger arising from an increase of salary is not nearly so vicious as that of adopting a system of taking care of the family expenses of Government officials. It is that system that I do not want to see inaugurated in this country.

I appreciate that it may be of little avail to offer any amendment against the recommendation of the committee, but I am going to offer an amendment so that I can at least give one vote for principle, and that vote will be in favor of a salary as against a vote for paying a like amount to defray some particular family expenses. I move, as a substitute for the amendment, from lines 11 to 16, inclusive, to insert:

For additional salary of the Vice President and Speaker of the House of Representatives, $5,000 each; total, $10,000.

Mr. BRYAN. Mr. President, I raise the point of order against the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota that it has not been estimated for nor reported by a standing committee of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is a substitute for a provision already in the bill; it is not an independent proposition. The Chair thinks that the point of order is not well taken. The question is on the adoption of the substitute offered by the Senator from North Dakota.

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, perhaps the President pro tempore has overlooked the fact that this refers to an annual salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is an item of appropriation in the nature of compensation for the Vice President.

Mr. WARREN. It is for this one year, and part of it would go for the upkeep and part of it for the automobile.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair has made the ruling. The Senator's remedy is open to him.

Mr. WARREN. I am not excepting to the ruling of the Chair, but I wish to make a few remarks, if the Chair will bear with me.

I want to say that I fully agree with the proposition that the salary of the Vice President ought to be increased, but we can hardly do it just now, at this late time, on an appropriation bill. On the other hand, the Senate when it was Republican in the majority, and likewise the other House, provided $6,000 each for automobiles for the Vice President and Speaker of the House, the minority making no objection. Under the circumstances, until such time as the salary may be raised, I think we ought to be as liberal as the other side then were and provide new automobiles. I do not object to the appropriation of $9,000, and should be glad if it were a little more. I hope it may carry, and carry ungrudgingly.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask the Senator from Wyoming a question. The Senator speaks of the appropriation for an automobile for the Vice President and the Speaker of the House of Representatives. Does the Senator from Wyoming know whether the Speaker of the House accepted that automobile?

Mr. WARREN. Why, certainly he did.

Mr. KENYON. There was a good deal of comment in the newspapers at the time that he had refused to accept an automobile at the expense of the Government.

Mr. WARREN. I think the Senator from Iowa is slightly mistaken as to dates. The automobiles mentioned were purchased when a Republican occupied the office of Speaker and when a Republican occupied the office of Vice President; and, as has been said by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], it was done ungrudgingly on the part of the minority. We furnished $6,000 apiece for automobiles for the Speaker of the House, Mr. Cannon, and for the Vice President, Mr. Sherman. Since that time I am unable to say what may have been said by the present Speaker. I never heard him say anything of the kind.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, inasmuch as we are to vote on the proposition for an automobile for the Speaker, as well as for the Vice President, if the Speaker did not decline to accept an automobile at the expense of the Government last year or the year before last?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not know whether or not the Speaker will accept one, but if he does not want it the item will go out in conference, so far as he is concerned. He has only to say so, and the amendment can be modified to suit his wishes. If he does not want an automobile, he need not accept one.

Mr. KENYON. He will not be compelled to take it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The bill can be changed to suit his pleasure when it goes to conference.

Mr. WILLIAMS. Mr. President, I do not know with that degree of certitude that would justify me in making the positive assertion, but I do remember when the provision was in a former appropriation bill that the newspapers, at any rate, published the purported fact that the Speaker of the House of Representatives refused to accept an automobile.

Mr. President, I agree substantially with what has been said by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER]. I think that public officials ought to be paid proper salaries, and that their salaries ought not to be extended by perquisites of an uncertain and varying character. I think that the Speaker of the House, who, in matter of influence, is perhaps the second most important officer under our Government, and the Vice President of the United States, who presides over this body and who is nominally the second officer of the Government, ought to receive higher salaries than they do receive. I know that one ex-Speaker, who attempted to keep up what he regarded as his social duties and provide a place where he could receive people in some decent number, had to pay $4,000 a year rent, and then had a house that was not by any means perfectly suited to the purpose. I know that the present Speaker had to live for a while in apartments, and had no way in which he could receive people in a proper way.

I do not take much stock in this business of receiving people as being a part of one's official duty; but, at the same time, the legislative branch of this Government ought to be able to compete in a social way to some extent, to a respectable extent, at least, with the executive branch of the Government. I therefore would vote very readily for an increase in the annual compensation of the Speaker and of the Vice President, but I would not be in favor of voting either one of them any perquisites in the shape of automobiles or anything else, and I hope that the motion, if I understood it correctly, to increase their salaries by $5,000 will prevail with the Senate. I believe that the people of the United States would justify it thoroughly.

Some years ago the President of the United States received an addition to his salary and also was allowed $25,000 a year for traveling expenses. He receives virtually everything else. He has a house which the Government furnishes him; the flowers around the house the Government furnishes him; every employee around the White House is upon the Government pay roll, I believe; and even the plate and the silver in the White House are those of the Nation and not those of the temporary incumbent, until his compensation amounts to a very considerable sum, the exact amount of which I have now forgotten; while these two other officers just below him in grade, one of them just below him in influence—and if he is a Speaker who controls the House of Representatives equal to him in influence—receive only $12,000 a year. It seems to me nothing is more right and proper than that the small increase of $5,000 a year should be made to these two officers of the Government.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. WILLIAMS] and the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. MCCUMBER] have expressed my views on this subject, but I feel as though I ought to state them, because, when this matter was before the other House some six years ago I opposed it there, as I did the provision at that time for granting a certain allowance to the President of the United States for traveling expenses.

I held the idea that we ought to increase the salaries of the Vice President and Speaker of the House of Representatives, and I am very much in favor of doing so. I am not unwilling to face the public in doing directly a thing of that kind. I do not think the people of the United States are opposed to paying the Vice President of the United States or the Speaker of the House of Representatives or any other prominent official what his services are reasonably worth and what he ought to receive, according to the position which he holds. So, it seems to me that we ought not to evade this proposition, but ought to vote directly upon it and increase the salary. That is the direct way to proceed, and I think we have votes in this body to carry it.

Let it be understood that we believe that these two positions are of sufficient importance to demand a salary of $15,000 a year, or whatever the salary would amount to if increased in accordance with the proposed amendment of the Senator from North Dakota. If it is not desired to increase it that much, the amount may be reduced. Because of the fact that the automobile appropriation would not need to be renewed for several years, perhaps it would not involve as great an annual expenditure as would the amendment proposed by the Senator from North Dakota, but still it would not relieve the situation so much. For instance, take the case of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, while I can not speak with authority, yet I am convinced that the Speaker of the House of Representatives does not care for an automobile of the kind contemplated. I take it, however, that, while he would not ask for an increase of salary, he would recognize the propriety of an increase, for he is not receiving a sufficient amount of money to properly conduct the office which he holds; and so, inasmuch as the point of order does not lie against this amendment, I sincerely trust that it may be adopted.

Mr. KERN. Mr. President, it is very apparent, I think, to everybody who knows anything about the situation at the other end of the Capitol that the proposition to increase the salary would not be agreed to. If Senators on the other side do not want to grant this automobile, if they do not want to treat the Democratic Vice President as the Republican Vice President was treated, and treated ungrudgingly and generously, let them say so, but do not undertake to sidetrack it through an amendment that you know will not be agreed to at the other end of the Capitol.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Will the Senator yield a moment?

Mr. KERN. Certainly.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I said a moment ago that I am perfectly willing to grant to the Democratic Vice President and to the Democratic Speaker what I have granted a Republican Vice President and a Republican Speaker. I am taking no different position, as the RECORD will show, in this instance from the one I occupied when this question originally arose in Congress.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I want to say to the Senator from Michigan that I do not agree with his statement that the people believe in large salaries. The history of the States demonstrates that the people will turn down nearly every proposition involving large increases in salary. The governor of the Senator's own State for years and years was only entitled under the constitution of the State to receive $1,000 a year, and his compensation has only been increased to $5,000 a year in recent times. Whenever propositions to increase salaries are submitted to the people, the Senator will find that three-fourths of them are turned down by the people, even in cases where it is only proposed to increase a salary above $5,000.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President, will the Senator yield?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Suppose, then, a proposition were submitted to the people of buying an automobile for an official?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think, as a matter of fact, that they would prefer to provide an automobile as one of the necessary accessories in order that the office might have the dignity which it ought to have. I submit to the Senator that if the amendment of the Senator from North Dakota were adopted it would not be two years before there would be a motion here to give the Vice President an automobile in addition to the increase of salary. That is what will happen.

The system of a republican form of government does not take to big salaries; it never has taken to big salaries. The people have been opposed to them, and almost every increase of salary that has been authorized by Congress has met with the condemnation of the people when they have had an opportunity to express themselves in a concrete way with regard to it. When salaries of Members of Congress were increased from $5,000 to $7,500 in 1873, there is no question that the condemnation of the people followed, although there was perhaps another question involved, and nobody seemed to dare to present a motion or to offer an amendment to increase the salary of a Representative or of a Senator from that day until about six or seven years ago.

Mr. TOWNSEND. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Colorado yield to the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I do.

Mr. TOWNSEND. I recognize the fact that there was a degree of cowardice on the part of a great many Congresses when they knew that the salary ought to be increased, but it finally was increased, and the people did not complain, and I heard no complaint when the salary of the President of the United States was increased.

I desire to say that I have not advocated big salaries; I simply advocate just and proper salaries, and I do not believe the people of the United States are opposed to paying proper salaries. They are opposed to paying big salaries, if by that the Senator means improper and unjust ones, but the proposition of the Senator from North Dakota can be justified.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Salaries of officials of the Government of the United States have been pretty largely increased. You must remember that John Marshall was the Chief Justice of the United States for 30 years at a salary of $3,500 a year. The Vice President and the Speaker of the House for years and years received a salary of only $8,000 a year, and it has only been within the last 10 or 12 years that their salaries have been increased to $12,000 a year. Now, if you add another $5,000, and next year grant an automobile, perhaps a mansion, and things of that kind, you will find that these offices will require twice the amount of money from the Public Treasury that they require now.

It seems to me, Mr. President, that when something is necessary to an office and goes with an office, it should be provided. The automobile appropriation which is contained in this bill is a proper appropriation, but the proposition to increase the salary of these offices is not good.

Mr. McCUMBER. Mr. President, I want to say just a word in answer to the suggestion made by the Senator from Indiana [Mr. KERN], that the amendment proposed by me could not be carried through the House, and that therefore it would defeat the proposition. I would be perfectly willing to leave the automobile provision in the bill if it were necessary, and offer my amendment in addition to that, and thus leave the matter in such shape that the House could accept my amendment without endangering the amendment reported by the committee.

I simply would like at some time this session to get back to the old Jeffersonian way of paying not emoluments and traveling expenses, but salaries that are just and fair.

I believe that the Senator from Indiana agrees with me that the Vice President of the United States ought to have a salary of at least $25,000 a year. The position demands it. And I believe that if Senators could vote for that directly, they would be glad to do so. I believe further that the American people would never make the slightest complaint against it. Most of the people that I have ever heard speak about the salary of the Vice President have, with one accord, agreed that the salary was insufficient for the position, and it is such a mere bagatelle in the expenses of this Government that it does seem to me that we ought to try to do justice and be brave enough to follow our own convictions.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the Senator from North Dakota [Mr. McCUMBER] as a substitute for the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question recurs on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 15, line 17, after the word "equipping," to strike out "horses and mail wagons" and insert "motor vehicles," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of maintaining and equipping motor vehicles for carrying the mails, $6,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 15, line 22, after the words "per thousand," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$8,000," so as to make the clause read:

For folding speeches and pamphlets, at a rate not exceeding $1 per thousand, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 5, to insert:

For rent of warehouse for storage of public documents for the Senate, $1,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, after line 7, to insert:

The Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds is hereby authorized and directed to remove any unused documents and material now in the Capitol Building or Senate and House Office Buildings, and the Patent Office models now stored in the Senate and House Office Buildings, to some building or buildings located on Reservation No. 13, in the District of Columbia, and the Superintendent of the Capitol Building and Grounds is hereby made the custodian of the building or buildings so selected.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 16, line 23, after the words "printed page," to strike out "$25,000" and insert "$50,000," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of inquiries and investigations ordered by the Senate, including compensation to stenographers to committees, at such rate as may be fixed by the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, but not exceeding $1 per printed page, $50,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Capitol police," on page 17, line 2, before the word "lieutenants," to strike out "two" and insert "three"; and in line 3, before the words "special officers," to strike out "three" and insert "two," so as to make the clause read:

For captain, $1,800; 3 lieutenants, at $1,200 each; 2 special officers, at $1,200 each; 47 privates, at $1,050 each; one-half of said privates to be selected by the Sergeant at Arms of the Senate and one-half by the Sergeant at Arms of the House of Representatives; in all, $57,150, one-half to be disbursed by the Secretary of the Senate and the other half to be disbursed by the Clerk of the House of Representatives.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "House of Representatives," on page 18, after line 4, to strike out:

For actual traveling expenses incurred by Representatives, Delegates, and Resident Commissioners, including actual traveling expenses of immediate and dependent members of their families, incurred in going to and returning once from each session of Congress by the nearest route usually traveled, the same to be paid on certificates duly approved and in the manner heretofore prescribed for the payment of mileage, $87,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 18, after line 12, to insert:

For mileage of Representatives and Delegates and expenses of Resident Commissioners, $175,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 24, line 14, after the word "adopted," to strike out "June 5, 1900," and insert "April 28, 1914," so as to make the clause read:

To continue employment of the person named in the resolution adopted April 28, 1914, as a laborer, $840.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KENYON. Mr. President, I should like to ask if the amendment on page 18, relative to mileage, was adopted?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes; it was adopted when it was reached in the regular order.

Mr. KENYON. I had intended to try to get a yea-and-nay vote on that proposition, so that I could record my vote in favor of the House provision; but I see it has gone by.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is too late to call for the yeas and nays now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The amendment will be under consideration again when the bill is reported to the Senate. It is now being considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. KENYON. I should like to reserve that question before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It has already been adopted. It can not be reserved at this time as in Committee of the Whole. Of course, it can come up in the Senate, and the Chair will take notice of the request made by the Senator from Iowa.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 27, line 17, after the words "House of Representatives," to strike out "$75,000" and insert "$37,500," so as to make the clause read:

For miscellaneous items and expenses of special and select committees, exclusive of salaries and labor, unless specifically ordered by the House of Representatives, $37,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Library of Congress," on page 33, line 8, before the word "each," to strike out "$720" and insert "$900"; in line 15, after the word "each," to insert "two assistant wiremen, at $840 each"; in line 17, before the words "skilled laborers," to strike out "ten" and insert "eight," and, in the same line, after the words "in all," to strike out "$74,525" and insert "$77,645," so as to make the clause read:

Library building and grounds: Superintendent, $5,000; chief clerk, $2,000; clerks—1, $1,600; 1, $1,400; 1, $1,000; messenger; assistant messenger; telephone-switchboard operator; assistant telephone-switchboard operator; captain of watch, $1,400; lieutenant of watch, $1,000; 16 watchmen, at $900 each; carpenter, painter, and foreman of laborers, at $900 each; 14 laborers, at $540 each; two attendants in ladies' room, at $480 each; 4 check boys, at $360 each; mistress of charwomen, $425; assistant mistress of charwomen, $300; 52 charwomen; chief engineer, $1,500; assistant engineers—1, $1,200; 3 at $900 each; electrician, $1,500; machinists—1, $1,000; 1, $900; 2 wiremen, at $900 each; 2 assistant wiremen, at $840 each; plumber, $900; 3 elevator conductors, and 8 skilled laborers, at $720 each; in all, $77,645.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JONES. Mr. President, as I understand, the bill is being read now merely for committee amendments?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is correct.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It is being read at this time for committee amendments.

Mr. JONES. It is being read first for committee amendments?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Yes.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Civil Service Commission," on page 35, line 18, after the words "chief examiner," to strike out "$3,000" and insert "$3,500," and on page 36, line 4, after the words "in all," to strike out "$261,830" and insert "$262,330," so as to make the clause read:

For commissioner, acting as president of the commission, $4,500; 2 commissioners, at $4,000 each; chief examiner, $3,500; secretary, $2,500; assistant chief examiner, $2,250; chiefs of division—3 at $2,000 each; examiners—1, $2,400; 3 at $2,000 each; 4 at $1,800 each; clerks—6 of class 4, 26 of class 3, 34 of class 2, 44 of class 1, 34 at $1,000 each; 22 at $900 each; messenger; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; 4 messenger boys, at $360 each. Custodian force: Engineer, $840; general mechanic, $840; telephone-switchboard operator; 2 firemen; 2 watchmen; 2 elevator conductors, at $720 each; 3 laborers; 4 charwomen; in all, $262,330.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 36, line 23, after the words "efficiency ratings," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$30,000," so as to make the clause read:

For the establishment and maintenance of system of efficiency ratings, $30,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 37, after line 18, to insert:

Examination of fourth-class postmasters: For necessary additional office employees, printing, stationery, travel, contingent, and other necessary expenses of examinations, $11,190, and the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this purpose in the urgent deficiency act approved October 22, 1913, is hereby made available for the fiscal year 1915.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 38, to insert:

For field examiners at the rate of $1,500 per annum each, for work in connection with members of local boards and other necessary work as directed by the commission, $5,700, and the unexpended balance of the appropriation made for this purpose in the urgent deficiency act approved October 22, 1913, is hereby made available for the fiscal year 1915.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be reported to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 38, line 12, after the word "each" and the semicolon, it is proposed to insert:

Assistant to the Secretary, to be appointed by the Secretary, $4,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk another amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be reported to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 39, on line 6, it is proposed to strike out "17" and insert in lieu thereof "19."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the head of "Department of State," in the appropriation for the maintenance of the office of the Secretary of State, on page 39, line 8, after the words "telegraph operators," to strike out "18" and insert "36"; in line 9, after the word "each," to strike out "13, at $900 each"; and in line 13, after the words "in all," to strike out "$320,060" and insert "$321,860," so as to read:

Telegraph operators—36, at $1,000 each; chief messenger, $1,000; 5 messengers; 25 assistant messengers; messenger boy, $420; packer, $720; 4 laborers, at $600 each; telephone-switchboard operator; assistant telephone-switchboard operator; in all, $321,860.

The amendment was agreed to:

The next amendment was, under the head of "Treasury Department," on page 40, line 7, after the word "each," to insert "assistant to the Secretary, to be appointed by the Secretary, $4,500"; and, in line 9, after the word "Secretary," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$3,000," so as to read:

Office of the Secretary: Secretary of the Treasury, $12,000; three Assistant Secretaries, at $5,000 each; assistant to the Secretary, to be appointed by the Secretary, $4,500; clerk to the Secretary, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk an amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia proposes an amendment, which will be reported to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, lines 9 and 10, it is proposed to strike out "executive clerk, $2,400," and to insert in lieu thereof "two executive clerks, at $2,400 each."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 40, line 12, after the word "Treasury," to strike out "$2,250" and insert "$2,500," so as to read:

Government actuary, under control of the Treasury, $2,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 40, line 16, the committee proposes to strike out "$60,670" and insert "$68,320."

Mr. WARREN. Mr. President, I think the Secretary should alter the footings to accord with the amendments already adopted.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. That is what is being done.

Mr. WARREN. But the Secretary read the old total.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. No; the Secretary read the new footing, which was just sent up by the chairman of the committee.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 41, after line 22, to strike out:

General Supply Committee: Superintendent of supplies, $2,000; clerks—2 of class 2; in all, $4,800.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 42, to insert:

General Supply Committee: Superintendent of supplies, $2,250; clerks—1 of class 4, 1 of class 3, 3 of class 2, 2 of class 1; 12 temporary clerks for 4 months, at $900 each; in all, $15,850.

Mr. LANE. Mr. President, I wish to inquire of the chairman of the committee what this new item is for. I refer to the new item for the General Supply Committee. It seems to be adding a number of new officials. There should be some explanation made of this new item, carrying fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars, out of courtesy to other Members of the Senate who are being held in part responsible for the provision.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is correct, and I am very glad to give the best explanation I can of this matter.

There are 17 new appointments. Twelve of them, however, are temporary clerks, whose employment will last only four months; 5 of them are permanent. These were regularly estimated by the Treasury Department. The Secretary of the Treasury appeared before the committee and insisted that without this provision the public business can not proceed. He said that it has increased so—and we all know it has increased—that it is impossible for him to conduct the business of the Treasury Department without this addition to his working force.

Mr. LANE. I do not want him to shut up shop, of course.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. He satisfied the committee. He went into more detail than I shall undertake to go into, and satisfied the committee that his contention should be respected.

I will say, however, not only for the benefit of the Senator from Oregon but for the benefit of others, that if the committee has made any mistake in the preparation of this bill it has been in cutting down too deeply and not allowing what the department chiefs insisted on. We have not put in this bill a single item that we were not satisfied was absolutely necessary, and we have omitted a great many items which the Secretaries insisted we ought to have allowed. I am sure this is a just appropriation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk another amendment, which I ask to have read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia suggests an amendment at this point, which will be reported to the Senate.

The SECRETARY. On page 42, line 25, it is proposed to strike out "$2,000" where it first occurs and in lieu thereof to insert "$2,250."

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask the Senator if that was agreed to by the committee?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was. When it was presented to the committee the committee did not at first allow it; but it was so insistently urged that the committee became satisfied that it ought to be allowed, and it was allowed by the full meeting of the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. Of course, it skipped my memory that that was done, but I remember very well that this question was discussed in the subcommittee, and we disagreed to it there.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was turned down at the first committee meeting, but the Secretary afterwards came and was so insistent on it when the second meeting of the committee took up the bill that this amendment was allowed.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 43, line 4, after the words "Surety Bond," to strike out "Division" and insert "Section," and in line 6, after the words "Surety Bond," to strike out "Division" and insert "Section," so as to read:

Division of Appointments: Chief of division, $3,000; assistant chief of division, $2,250; executive clerk, $2,000; clerks—1 of class 4 (2 transferred to Customs Division), 4 of class 3, 4 of class 2 (1 transferred to Customs Division), 2 of class 1 (1 transferred to Customs Division, 2 to Surety Bond Section, and 1 omitted), 2 at $1,000 each (1 transferred to Customs Division and 1 to Surety Bond Section).

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 8, the committee proposes to change the total to read "$27,910" instead of "$27,660."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 43, line 9, before the word "of," to strike out "Division" and insert "Section," and in the same line, after the word "of," where it occurs the second time, to strike out "division" and insert "section," so as to make the clause read:

Section of surety bonds: Chief of section, $2,000 (in lieu of law and bond clerk, transferred from Division of Appointments); clerks—2 of class 1 (transferred from Division of Appointments), 1 at $1,000 (transferred from Division of Appointments); 1 assistant messenger (transferred from office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue); in all, $6,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk another committee amendment which I ask to have read.

The SECRETARY. On page 43, line 17, it is proposed to strike out "$2,000" and to insert in lieu thereof "$2,500."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. And in line 19 it is proposed to change the total to read "$30,260."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, just a moment. I should like to ask the Senator if he has changed all of the assistant chiefs of divisions to $2,500 all through the bill? Have you made them all $2,500?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think this is the only one. I do not recall any others than this one.

Mr. SMOOT. You will next time, then.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, on page 44, in line 8, the committee offers an amendment commencing at the word "and," on line 8, and rejecting the following words:

And $200 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent.

We ask that that amendment may be disagreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment, on page 44, line 8, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 44, line 8, after "$1,800," it is proposed to strike out the words "and $200 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent."

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 44, line 11, after the word "all," to strike out "$27,800" and insert "$27,600."

The amendment was rejected.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 44, line 26, before the words "of class 3," to strike out "three" and insert "four," so as to read:

Division of Printing and Stationery: Chief of division, $2,500; assistant chief of division, $2,000; clerks—4 of class 4, 4 of class 3.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk an amendment which I ask to have read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 45, line 1, it is proposed to strike out "$1,250" and to insert in lieu thereof "$1,400."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. On page 45, line 2, before the word "laborers," it is proposed to strike out "two" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SECRETARY. It is also proposed to amend the total, in line 3, so that it will read "$34,780."

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 45, line 14, before the words "of class two," to strike out "three" and insert "two"; in the same line, after the words "of class one," to strike out "one at $1,000"; and in line 15, after the words "in all," to strike out "$21,790" and insert "$21,390," so as to make the clause read:

Office of disbursing clerk: Disbursing clerk, $3,000; deputy disbursing clerk, $2,750; clerks—3 of class 4, 2 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 2 of class 1, 1 at $1,000; messenger; in all, $21,390.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 46, after line 23, to insert:

For law books, to be expended under the direction of the Comptroller of the Treasury, $500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 48, after line 5, to insert:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Interior Department; for the purchase, exchange, or rental of the necessary mechanical devices, and for the purchase of such supplies, including tabulating cards printed in the course of manufacture, and the making of such repairs as may be necessary to their maintenance and operation, $14,000: Provided, That the Secretary of the Treasury may, during the fiscal year 1915, in his discretion, diminish the number of positions in the grades below that of clerk at $1,200 per annum in the Office of the Auditor for the Interior Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriation for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay the compensation, as fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such additional number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Interior Department.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to know whence these employees are obtained. Are they detailed from other departments, or from other bureaus of this department? I do not quite understand this provision. Why is a new provision necessary in regard to it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is in connection with the introduction of tabulating machines and the use of tabulating machines. The inauguration of that work in the departments is a very expensive matter.

Mr. BURTON. Are these tabulating machines employed now for the first time?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Some have been employed, but the use of the machines is increasing, and this provision seems to be absolutely necessary for that service. When they are fully inaugurated and at work, it will operate as a great saving to the Government; but the initial cost is very heavy.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand that those who are detailed to perform this service are clerks or subordinates already in the department?

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, they may be in this department or they may be transferred temporarily from other departments to do this particular work.

Mr. BURTON. They do not go outside of the civil-service list to get them?

Mr. SMOOT. I asked that same question, and I was assured that they did not go out of the civil service.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, no; they are civil-service appointees. There is no doubt about that.

Mr. SMOOT. I think myself the proviso of this amendment is not a very good way to legislate, but the object of the amendment is a worthy one, and I think it will accomplish a saving not only in this department but in all the other departments, if carried out. It was for that reason that I did not object to the proviso. If, however, such a proviso were carried through all the departments of the Government, I think it would be a very dangerous way of granting power to the heads of departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 49, line 22, after "$191,130," to insert: "Provided, That not exceeding $24,840 may be used for the payment of compensation to said employees absent on leave."

So as to make the clause read:

For compensation, to be fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate by the use of mechanical devices the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service, $191,130: Provided, That not exceeding $24,840 may be used for the payment of compensation to said employees absent on leave.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, at the top of page 50, to insert:

The Secretary of the Treasury may, during the fiscal year 1915, diminish, from time to time, as vacancies occur by death, resignation, or otherwise, the number of positions of the several grades below the grade of chief of division in the office of the Auditor for the Post Office Department and use the unexpended balances of the appropriations for the positions so diminished as a fund to pay the compensation, as fixed by the Secretary of the Treasury, of such number of employees as may be necessary to tabulate, by the use of mechanical devices, the accounts and vouchers of the Postal Service.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I simply wish to say in connection with this amendment that this being a new departure in the different departments, I am not going to object this year to this kind of legislation; but I will state again that it is very unwise legislation, taken as a general thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 52, line 24, after "$1,800," to strike out "clerk, $900; in all, $2,700" and insert "clerk, $1,400; two clerks, at $900 each; in all, $5,000," so as to make the clause read:

Office of the assistant treasurer at San Francisco: Clerk, $1,800; clerk, $1,400; two clerks, at $900 each; in all, $5,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 52, line 26, after the word "subtreasuries," to strike out "$86,450" and insert "$88,750"; so as to make the clause read:

The total from subtreasuries, $88,750.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, it seems to me that all these appropriations for the maintenance and upkeep of subtreasuries ought to be wholly unnecessary under the new system of banking and currency that has been adopted. Under that system the regional banks are to be made the depositories of the public funds, and the disbursements of the Government are to be made by checks upon these banks. Therefore the occasion that has heretofore existed for maintaining subtreasuries in the different parts of the country has ceased to exist, and provision ought to be made for their discontinuance under this new banking system, it seems to me. After we have changed our banking system, to keep them up as we have kept them up in the past is wholly unnecessary.

The new system contemplates that the revenues of the Government shall be paid into the regional banks, and that the disbursements shall be made by checks of the Government upon these banks. The purpose is that the money may be constantly in circulation, instead of, as heretofore, having the public moneys frequently tied up in the subtreasuries of the Government, causing, at times, a money stringency. I remember that during Cleveland's first administration there were between two and three hundred million dollars tied up in the subtreasuries of the Government, out of circulation.

In view of the fact that we have established these regional banks, and disbursements are to be made through them by checks upon them, it seems to me there is no occasion for perpetuating and continuing the subtreasury system.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that it is necessary at this time to continue them, because the new system will not be in operation by the 1st of July of this year.

Mr. NELSON. That may be so.

Mr. SMOOT. If it is in operation by the end of the year, we will say, or whenever it is, and there is no necessity for these subtreasury places, then, of course, the money will be paid out as the Senator states; but we do not know how soon it will be in operation, and they certainly will have to be provided for until that time arrives.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I have called attention to this matter because it should be kept in mind when the next appropriation bill is prepared. I think perhaps our new system will not be entirely in operation by the end of the present fiscal year, and perhaps for the present it is necessary to maintain these offices; but after we have established the new system there is no occasion for maintaining these subtreasuries as they have been maintained heretofore.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator is right in the statement that it is the hope that these moneys of the United States will be deposited in the Federal reserve banks; but I will remind the Senator of the fact that there is no requirement in the act that they shall be so deposited, and for that reason we have got to trust to what the policy of the administration will be with respect to that. It is our hope that they will be so deposited, and there was a provision in one of the preliminary drafts of the bill to the effect that the new organization should become the fiscal agent of the United States Government; but that is not in the bill as it passed. It is left discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury as to where and when and to what extent he will deposit money in these banks. For that reason it seems to me we have to provide for the ordinary expenditures as heretofore, and rely upon the Treasury Department to cut them down when these moneys are deposited in the Federal reserve banks.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator from Colorado is partially correct, but not entirely so. When the currency bill came from the House it contained a provision, as passed by the House, requiring all public moneys to be deposited in these banks, and checks to be drawn upon the banks. But that was afterwards changed by the Senate committee, much against the wishes of many of the members of that committee, and we are now at the mercy of the Secretary of the Treasury. He can still, under this new system, as he sees fit, perpetuate the subtreasury system by refusing to deposit the money in these regional banks.

I sincerely hope that he will abandon that system and that he will have all the Government revenues deposited in these banks, and that the Government disbursements will be made by checks upon those banks. In that way, and in that way only, can you keep the currency of the country in active use and circulation and prevent the tying up of funds as we have had in years gone by.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator, perhaps we have that in our hands, because if we do not next year appropriate for the office of the Assistant Treasurer then, of course, it will force the deposit into the regional banks.

Mr. NELSON. The Senator is entirely correct. If by the time the next appropriation bill is passed no provision is made for the continuance of these subtreasuries the Secretary will have to deposit in the regional banks.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, it seems to me that this is a very singular time to increase the appropriation for these subtreasuries. A year or two ago some pressure was brought to bear upon me for obtaining increased salaries and I believe also clerical service for the subtreasury at Cincinnati, but upon the adoption of the Federal reserve act I discouraged any attempt of that kind. The passage of the recent law is futile unless the subtreasuries are to be relieved of very much of the work that they now perform.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I merely want to correct the Senator from Ohio. We have not increased the appropriation for the subtreasuries. This is simply transferring some people from San Francisco to Washington.

Mr. BURTON. Does the Senator say the appropriation for the office of the assistant treasurer at San Francisco, Cal.—"clerk, $1,400; 2 clerks, at $900 each; in all, $5,000"—is not an addition?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator will turn to page 68 he will see that the reductions correspond there, and we have not increased the appropriation at all for the subtreasury.

Mr. BURTON. Do I understand it is an increase in the total expense of the whole subtreasury system?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senate committee has not increased a dollar the appropriation for subtreasuries from the bill as it passed the House. This is a mere transfer of the force from San Francisco, and it is no increase whatever.

Mr. BURTON. Here is the House provision: "Clerk, $1,800; clerk, $900; in all, $2,700." As the committee reports the bill it reads, "Clerk, $1,400; 2 clerks, at $900 each; in all, $5,000."

Mr. SHAFROTH. If the Senator will turn to page 68, he will find, in line 25, "1, $1,400; 1, $900" stricken out.

Mr. BURTON. In the San Francisco Subtreasury?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; in the office of the assistant treasurer at San Francisco.

Mr. BURTON. The San Francisco Subtreasury?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is a transfer, and there is not an increase made in the appropriation for the Subtreasury.

Mr. BURTON. In an appropriation bill to place in different parts of the bill the provision for the same office is, to say the least, confusing. As it reads here, this is clearly an increase in the appropriation for the Subtreasury at San Francisco.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Perhaps it might have been arranged more systematically, but if the Senator will examine it he will find that there is no increase whatever.

Mr. BURTON. Then I understand in another portion of the bill there is a decrease which meets this increase.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Exactly.

Mr. SMOOT. I will simply say to the Senator from Ohio that the Treasurer appeared before the committee and he wanted the two clerks from the office of the assistant treasurer at San Francisco transferred here. That is found on page 52 of the bill. He claimed that that could be done here and the appropriation ought to be made direct.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly the bill could be made very much clearer by having a provision in one place for one office so that we can understand it.

I do not understand, Mr. President, that the subtreasuries are to be entirely abandoned, but their work and their responsibility will be diminished if the Federal reserve system is the success we expect it to be, and if the money of the country is to be kept in circulation as has been promised.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, I desire simply to say one word more. I wish to call the attention of the Committee on Appropriations to the fact that it appears in the bill that the total cost of the subtreasury system is $88,750, and this amount can be entirely saved if the Secretary of the Treasury will avail himself of the new currency system. We can get rid of all these subtreasuries and do all the Government business, and do it much better and more effectively through the new currency system.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 53, line 25, after the words "Treasurer of the United States" to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$10,000", so as to make the clause read:

For purchase of labor-saving machines and tabulating equipment, including exchange, repairs, miscellaneous expenses of installation, cards and filing devices, and for rental of tabulating and card-sorting machines, for use in the office of the Treasurer of the United States, $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On page 54 there are three amendments, one including a total, which the committee ask may be disagreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 54, line 2, after "$4,000" to strike out "assistant register, $2,500," and in line 9, after the words "in all," to strike out the total, "$30,700, and insert "$28,200," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Register of the Treasury: Register, $4,000; chief of division, $2,000; clerks—2 of class 4 (1 transferred to Treasurer's office), 2 of class 3, 2 of class 2, 3 of class 1 (2 transferred to Treasurer's office), 3 at $1,000 each (1 transferred to Treasurer's office), 5 at $900 each (10 transferred to Treasurer's office and 3 to Loans and Currency Division); messenger; 1 laborer (1 transferred to Loans and Currency Division); in all, $28,200.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask the Senate to disagree to the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 54, after line 9, to insert:

The office of Assistant Register of the Treasury is hereby abolished.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SMOOT. May I call the Senator's attention to just one thing in relation to the assistant register? Does the Senator believe that we ought to pay him more than the chief of that division? We pay the chief of the division $2,000 and the assistant register $2,500.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We agreed on that in the committee, and I hope the Senator will not go into a discussion now against the action of the committee. There was no such action against it in the committee.

Mr. SMOOT. I am perfectly aware the majority of the committee agreed to it, and I have not stated otherwise.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator himself, I understood, agreed to it. He made no objection to it.

Mr. SMOOT. I objected to it at the time.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not recall that.

Mr. SMOOT. I did and I want to say to the Senator that I do not believe, owing to the amount of work in that office, I will not say the lack of work, the assistant register ought to be paid more than the chief of that great division receives. I am perfectly willing——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I understand that they are inaugurating changes there which will put more work on the Assistant Treasurer. The Assistant Treasurer, it seems to me, ought to receive more than the chief clerk.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, we might just as well have five wheels to a wagon as to have the position, anyway. There is not any question about it.

Mr. OVERMAN. Then let us cut it out.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to give notice to the Senator right now, that if I am here next year when the appropriation bill carries this amount I am going to do all I can to see that it is cut out.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. We will reach that next year, and then we will take it up. I hope we will not discuss now what we are going to do next year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Let me suggest to the chairman of the committee, would it not be well to add to line 11, on page 54, so as to make it read:

The office of Assistant Register of the Treasury is abolished after the term of the present occupant.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That would be strange legislation. We should wait until the time comes to abolish it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I would move the amendment because of the fact that we did abolish the office of assistant register in the committee and then we took it back.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is true, but I think the committee might well afford to stand by its final action on the matter. I am very anxious to get along with the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why would it not be well to put it in, then, for the term of the fiscal year?

Mr. OVERMAN. There will be another bill next year.

Mr. SHAFROTH. But let it end with the expiration of the fiscal year.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I send to the desk another amendment which I offer on behalf of the committee. I am going to say what I said to the committee. I think this is right or I would not be willing to put it in. The man is a good old ex-Confederate soldier, but I would not give him the office if I did not think it right. I do not like to turn that old fellow out. He has just been appointed. He is very poor, and he is able to do the work, and I want him to have that salary.

Mr. SMOOT. I do not want the Senator to impute any motive in the matter of reducing this office because it is filled by an ex-Confederate soldier.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I did not have a single thought of that in my mind; but in passing I will say the motion to retain the office was made by a good Union soldier, the Senator from Wyoming [Mr. WARREN].

Mr. SMOOT. I am not discussing the question as to what was the action of the committee. That is not it. I say now if the President of the United States was a Republican and he undertook to fill this office to-day, I would vote against it, and I say now that there is not any more use for the office than there is for a fifth wheel to a wagon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 54, after line 21, the committee proposes to add the following paragraph:

To pay to Thomas P. Kane the difference between the compensation allowed by law for the Comptroller of the Currency and the compensation allowed by law for the Deputy Comptroller of the Currency for services as Acting Comptroller of the Currency from April 28, 1913, when the office of the Comptroller of the Currency was vacated, and continuing as long as the duties and responsibilities of said office of the Comptroller of the Currency shall devolve upon said Thomas P. Kane as Acting Comptroller of the Currency, such an amount as may be necessary, to be paid from the $5,000 appropriated for salary of the Comptroller of the Currency by the act of August 23, 1912 (37 Stat. L., 377), for such part of such services as may be rendered during the fiscal year ended June 30, 1913; and such amount as may be necessary to be paid from the $5,000 appropriated for salary of the Comptroller of the Currency by the act of March 4, 1913 (Stat. L, p. 756), for such part of such services as may be rendered during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. I am going to ask the Senator to allow that amendment to be passed over at this time. I do not want to call a quorum, but before the amendment is adopted I want a vote of the Senate upon it, and I want a quorum here so that I can explain it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Let it be passed over for the present.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The Secretary continued the reading of the bill.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 55, line 8, after the word "national," to strike out "$4,800" and insert "$8,000," so as to make the clause read:

For expenses of special examinations of national banks and bank plates, of keeping macerator in Treasury Building in repair, and for other incidental expenses attending the working of the macerator, and for procuring information relative to banks other than national, $8,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 10, after the word "Commissioner," to strike out "$6,000" and insert "$6,500," and in line 19, after the words "in all," to strike out "$359,270" and insert "$359,770," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Commissioner of Internal Revenue: Commissioner, $6,500; deputy commissioners—1 $4,000, 1 $3,600; chemists—chief $3,000, 1 $2,500; assistant chemists—2 at $1,800 each, 1 $1,600, 1 $1,400; heads of divisions—4 at $2,500 each, 5 at $2,250 each; superintendent of stamp vault, $2,000; private secretary, $1,800; clerks—3 at $2,000 each, 31 of class 4, 27 of class 3, 41 of class 2, 40 of class 1, 32 at $1,000 each, 42 at $900 each; 4 messengers; 20 assistant messengers (1 transferred to surety-bond section); 16 laborers; in all, $359,770.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 55, line 25, after "$4,000," to strike out "and $500 additional while the office is held by the present incumbent," so as to read:

Office of Life-Saving Service: General Superintendent, $4,000.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I ask that the amendment be disagreed to.

The amendment was rejected.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 4, in the items for the office of Life-Saving Service, after the words "civil engineer," to strike out "$1,800" and insert "$2,250."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 56, line 7, in the total, to strike out "$48,120" and insert "$48,070."

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I move to change the total so as to make the amount $48,570.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 57, line 12, after the words "in all," to strike out "$16,370" and insert "$16,120," so as to make the clause read:

Secret Service Division: Chief, $4,000; assistant chief, who shall discharge the duties of chief clerk, $3,000; clerks—1 of class 4; 1 of class 3; 2 of class 2; 1 of class 1; 1, $1,000; assistant messenger; in all $16,120.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 14, after "$5,000," to insert "examiner, $3,000." so as to read:

Office of Director of the Mint: Director, $5,000; examiner, $3,000; computer and adjuster of accounts, $2,500; assayer, $2,200; clerks—2 of class 4; 2 of class 3; 1 of class 1; private secretary, $1,400; messenger; assistant in laboratory, $1,200; assistant messenger; skilled laborer, $720; in all, $22,580.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to inquire whether that is a new office or not?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is not.

Mr. BURTON. Why was it omitted from the House bill, then?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It was not in the House bill, but it is in the estimates. I do not think it is a new office.

Mr. SMOOT. I think the Senator is wrong. I think it is a new office; that is, as I understand it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is in the current law, I am sure. The House just omitted to appropriate for it.

Mr. SMOOT. I may be mistaken, but I thought it was a new office.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I find it in the current law.

Mr. BURTON. Then I understand it is an existing office.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I think it is; and it was not appropriated for through some accident in the House.

Mr. BURTON. The House omitted to appropriate for it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is simply to provide for an office already created—office of Director of the Mint. In the last bill, director, $5,000, and an examiner, $3,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 19, to change the total from $22,580 to $25,580.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 57, line 21, after the words "assay offices," to strike out "$10,000" and insert "$30,000," so as to make the clause read:

For freight on bullion and coin, by registered mail or otherwise, between mints and assay offices, $30,000.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask why there is so very large an addition as to require the increased appropriation. Is the appropriation made by the House, only a third of that named here, insufficient, or has something developed since the bill passed the House?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is for the transportation of bullion.

Mr. BURTON. I am aware of that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The assurance was made to us that it was absolutely impossible to perform the service with less than $30,000.

Mr. OVERMAN. There is always a fight with the House of Representatives about abolishing the mints. The Senate will not stand for it. The House cut down the appropriation and the Senate committee restored it. That is all there is of it.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Another thing, Mr. President, is that this is an amount that is to be expended for a specific purpose, and if it is not necessary to use it it will go back into the Treasury.

Mr. BURTON. That is true, more or less, of all appropriations.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, of course the original appropriation of $10,000 was made upon the basis that all of the assay offices were going to be abolished; but the Senate has restored the assay offices, and having restored them we must provide the money for the transportation of the bullion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 58, line 9, after the words "chief clerk," to strike out "$2,000" and insert "$2,250"; in line 13, before the words "of class one," to strike out "seven" and insert "eight"; in line 14, after the word "messengers," to insert "telephone operator, $720"; and, in line 15, after the words "in all," to strike out "$49,780" and insert "$51,950," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Surgeon General of Public Health Service: Surgeon General, $6,000; chief clerk, $2,250; private secretary to the Surgeon General, $1,800; assistant editor, $1,800; clerks—3 of class 4, 3 of class 3, 7 of class 2 (1 of whom shall be translator), 8 of class 1, 3 at $1,000 each, 3 at $900 each; messenger; 3 assistant messengers; telephone operator, $720; 2 laborers, at $540 each; in all, $51,950.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, in the item of appropriation for the purchase of stationery for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices, on page 59, line 6, after "$1,000," to strike out "operating supplies for public buildings, $3,500"; and, in line 7, after the words "public buildings," to strike out "$2,500" and insert "$6,000," so as to make the clause read:

Life-Saving Service, $1,000; general expenses of public buildings, $6,000; collecting the revenue from customs, $37,000; miscellaneous expenses of collecting internal revenue, $14,000; expenses of collecting the income tax, $10,000; and said sums so deducted shall be credited to and constitute, together with the first-named sum of $50,000, the total appropriation for stationery for the Treasury Department and its several bureaus and offices for the fiscal year 1915.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 59, line 21, after the word "clippings," to insert "financial journals," so as to make the clause read:

For newspaper clippings, financial journals, law books, city directories, and other books of reference relating to the business of the department, $1,000.

The amendment was agreed to

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I submit the amendment which I send to the Secretary's desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment submitted by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 59, after line 25, it is proposed to insert the following:

For rent of building, $11,350.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I thought we had agreed to put that item in under the appropriation for rent of the Department of Labor.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. This is for rent for the purposes of the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. This is for extra rent that we have to pay on account of the removal of a portion of the employees of the Department of Labor?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do not think it relates to that.

Mr. SMOOT. I shall not object. I know there is an item of eleven thousand and some odd dollars for rent, for which we must provide.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It is for the Treasury Department, and it seemed to be absolutely necessary. There were three items in the estimate. If I am not mistaken—such a long time has elapsed since the committee had the matter before it that I distrust myself a little—it included a stable, it included the storage of the photograhic apparatus and other material.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, if it is for the Treasury Department, that sum of $11,350 is not correct, because we did supply the Treasury Department with money with which to pay rent for a stable, and we cut the amount down, as I think, to $4,700.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The Senator from Utah was absent for some part of the time from the committee meetings. The committee considered the matter at one of its meetings, when this entire sum was allowed. We became thoroughly satisfied that the whole amount was necessary. The Secretary of the Treasury, or one of his assistants, appeared before the committee and made it very clear to us that it was absolutely necessary; otherwise, he said, he would have to throw this property of the Government into the street, as there would be no possible way for him to take care of it. Here is a letter which, if the Senator desires, I shall read.

Mr. SMOOT. The Senator had better read the letter, for I thought there was any amount of room for the purpose in the building in which the Bureau of Engraving and Printing was formerly located.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. On the 18th of May this letter was sent:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
Washington, May 18, 1914.

Hon. THOMAS S. MARTIN,
Chairman Committee on Appropriations, United States Senate.

SIR: I want to urge upon you the importance of securing, by means of amendment on the floor of the Senate, the sum of $11,350 for rent for the Treasury Department for the fiscal year 1915. Unless this appropriation can be secured the department will be obliged to ask for a deficiency covering the same.

This amount is needed to cover the rent for the Treasury stables; the Cox Building, which includes the photograph gallery for use in connection with public-building work; and the files building, at 920 E Street NW.

The rent appropriation for the current fiscal year is $47,000; the amount asked for now, $11,350, is absolutely necessary, and the department can not possibly get along without it.

Attached hereto is a memorandum from the chief clerk of the department setting forth in detail the amount of space required, etc.

Respectfully,

BYRON R. NEWTON,
Assistant Secretary.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from Minnesota?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I do.

Mr. NELSON. I should be glad if the chairman of the Committee on Appropriations would inform me where these buildings are located which are to be rented. What buildings are they for which we are to pay a rental of $11,350?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I will see if I can get at my memoranda. I do not carry in my memory where all these buildings are located.

Mr. NELSON. It is not the old car barn over here on Capitol Hill, is it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Oh, no; not at all.

Mr. NELSON. Or the old Globe Building?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Here is the statement in regard to the matter:

	Floor space.	Yearly rental.
	Sq. feet.
Cox Building, New York Avenue NW., between Seventeenth and Eighteenth Streets (first, second, and third floors occupied by files of the Auditor for the War Department; fourth floor by photograph gallery, Office of the Supervising Architect)	13,591	$2,150
Merchants Transfer & Storage Building, E Street NW., between Ninth and Tenth Streets (third, fourth, and back part of fifth floors rented; used for files). Light, janitor and elevator service included	26,736	8,000
Treasury Department stables, 400 Nineteenth Street NW	9,646	1,200

The Senator will observe that the items as to yearly rental make an aggregate of $11,350, the amount named in the amendment.

Mr. NELSON. Will the Senator from Virginia be kind enough to have that statement put into the RECORD?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Having read the statement, it will, of course, appear in the RECORD. I also send to the desk, to be inserted in the RECORD, certain memoranda on the same subject.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, permission to do so will be granted.

The matter referred to is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
OFFICE OF CHIEF CLERK AND SUPERINTENDENT,
Washington, May 18, 1914.

The Senate Appropriations Committee failed to include in the legislative bill any provision for rent for the Treasury Department. We are renting at present the following:

Building.	Square feet.	Cubic feet.
Treasury stables	9,646
Cox Building (files and photograph gallery)	10,003	113,639
920 E Street	26,736	267,360

Total, 26,739 square feet, or 380,999 cubic feet, exclusive of the Treasury stables.

Vacant file space at old Bureau Building after moving the auditors and general supply committee into same:

	Square feet.	Cubic feet.
Subbasement	12,035	84,245
Attic	8,756	35,024

Total, 20,791 square feet, or 119,269 cubic feet.

It is contemplated to move into this vacant space in the old Bureau Building 59,060 cubic feet of files belonging to the Auditor for the State and Other Departments, which will leave a balance of space of 60,209 cubic feet which would be required by the various auditors to take care of their increase in files for the next year. The Supervising Architect recommended that no files be placed in the attic on account of danger from the weight.

In view of the foregoing, I earnestly recommend that this data be placed before Senator MARTIN, and that he be asked to amend the legislative bill by including on the floor of the Senate an item for $11,350 for rent for Treasury offices. Unless this is done we shall be obliged to go to Congress and ask for a deficiency in this amount.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator from Virginia that after looking over the communication from the Treasury Department I withdraw my objection to the amendment inserting $11,350. I have not a copy of the hearings before me, but, as I remember, the committee had agreed upon $4,700 as the proper rental for the stable and one of the other buildings there which is absolutely necessary, and agreed that we would direct the Secretary to use the old building formerly occupied by the Bureau of Engraving and Printing.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That was found to be entirely impracticable at another meeting of the committee. I think the Senator is mistaken in one thing. I believe the agreement was only for $1,200 instead of $4,700, but at a second hearing of the matter the amount was fixed as set out in the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the amendment is agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 60, line 8, after the word "said," to strike out "buildings" and insert "building," so as to make the clause read:

In addition to the offices of the four auditors of the Treasury required to be removed to the old building of the Bureau of Engraving and Printing, the General Supply Committee and offices of the Treasury now occupying rented quarters, and such other offices or parts of offices of the Treasury Department as the Secretary of the Treasury may determine, shall be removed thereto; and the Bureau of Engraving and Printing shall entirely vacate all of said building on or before June 1, 1914.

Mr. SMOOT. I think, owing to the adoption of the previous amendment, the word should be "buildings" instead of "building," because the change from two buildings to a single building was by reason of the fact that we cut down the rent.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; it should be "buildings."

Mr. SMOOT. Then we shall have to disagree to the committee amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I offer the amendment, which I send to the desk, to come in at the top of page 60.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment proposed by the Senator from Virginia will be stated.

The SECRETARY. At the top of page 60 it is proposed to insert the following paragraph:

For investigation and experimentation and to secure better methods of administration, with a view to increased efficiency or to greater economy in the expenditure of public money, including necessary traveling expenses, in connection with special work, or obtaining of better administrative methods in any branch of the service within or under the Treasury Department, including the temporary employment of agents, stenographers, accountants, or other expert services, either within or without the District of Columbia, $20,000.

Mr. SMOOT. I will ask that that amendment be passed over.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am perfectly willing to have it passed over, if the Senator insists upon it, but I thought the question had been thrashed over so often that it was thoroughly understood. It is really a contingent fund for the Treasury Department.

Mr. SMOOT. I thought it had been thrashed over so often that it would never show its face in the Senate again. I thought the committee had disagreed to it.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. If the Senator does not attend the meetings of the committee he must blame himself, and not me.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, the Senator ought not to say that.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am only saying that the amendment was before the committee, and if the Senator does not know it I do not know where he was.

Mr. SMOOT. The only time the Appropriations Committee has held a meeting at which I was not present was when I went to Kentucky to attend the funeral of the late Senator Bradley, and I do not know whether or not the committee held any meetings during that time. There has never been a meeting of the Appropriations Committee since I have been a member of it when I have not been present, with the exception of the instance I have mentioned.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Except that sometimes the Senator would say, "I will have to be excused, as I am compelled to go somewhere else." That amendment was adopted at a meeting of the committee after a thorough investigation.

Mr. SMOOT. I ask that it go over.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be passed over.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 61, line 16, before the word "necessary," to strike out "absolutely," so as to read:

And for sales at public auction in Washington, D. C., of condemned property belonging to the Treasury Department, payment of auctioneer fees, and purchase of other necessary articles, $13,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the subhead "Collecting internal revenue," on page 64, line 6, after the words "internal-revenue offices," to strike out "$2,150,000" and insert "$2,190,000," so as to make the clause read:

For salaries and expenses of collectors of internal revenue, deputy collectors, surveyors, clerks, messengers, and janitors in internal-revenue offices, $2,190,000: Provided, That no part of this amount be used in defraying the expenses of any officer, designated above, subpœnaed by the United States court to attend any trial before a United States court or preliminary examination before any United States commissioner, which expenses shall be paid from the appropriation for "Fees of witnesses, United States courts."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 64, after line 12, to insert:

On and after October 1, 1914, the whole number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and the whole number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 64.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. President, I should like to know what the object of that provision is.

Mr. WARREN. The amendment reinstates one of the three collection districts which were discontinued. It has been found that one of them was exceedingly important, and this provision is to reestablish it.

Mr. BURTON. Then there were 64.

Mr. WARREN. There were 66, but 3 were discontinued by act of Congress. It was found, however, in view of the increasing business, that there should be more districts, especially one more district in the State of Pennsylvania.

Mr. BURTON. Then, this is an increase of the present number?

Mr. WARREN. It increases the present number, but it will still be a decrease in the number prior to the number, say, four years ago.

Mr. SMOOT. Mr. President, I want to state——

Mr. BURTON. Just a moment. It seems to me, Mr. President, this is a very singular way of expressing that fact. This amendment proposes an increase in the number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue. Now, let us read it:

On and after October 1, 1914, the whole number of collection districts for the collection of internal revenue and the whole number of collectors of internal revenue shall not exceed 64.

The natural inference from that language would be that there was a decrease. If you are reestablishing one or two districts or collectors, why not say so in plain language, so that anyone can understand it?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There is no doubt about the fact whatever. The amendment simply employs the language that has heretofore been used in creating collection districts, and makes an increase of one district in Pennsylvania, where the district as at present formed comprises territory not contiguous, which is exceedingly disadvantageous to the business, and it is much opposed by the people there.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, you are increasing the number of districts from 63 to 64.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Yes; an increase of one district.

Mr. BURTON. And you are adopting a very peculiar form of expression. Instead of saying "one additional internal-revenue collection district, with one additional collector of internal revenue, shall be created, making the number 64," this, to say the least, very ambiguous, roundabout expression is adopted of saying that "the number shall not exceed 64."

Mr. WARREN. That follows the language that was used in the legislation diminishing the number.

Mr. BURTON. Very naturally it would be used where the purpose was to diminish the number.

Mr. WARREN. It was used in the original legislation and also in the legislation diminishing the number of the districts.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be stated.

The SECRETARY. On page 65, line 1, before the word "including," it is proposed to insert the following:

Which act is hereby amended to authorize two chiefs of division at $3,500 and $2,500 per annum, respectively, in lieu of two chiefs of division at $2,500 each.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to ask whether those subordinate officials come under the civil service?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am sure that they do, but this position does not involve an appointment; it is merely an increase of salary. That is all the amendment provides for.

Mr. BURTON. There is no increase in officers——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Not at all.

Mr. BURTON. But an increase of one man's salary?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. There are now two at $2,500, and the amendment proposes to increase the salary of one to $3,500, and to leave the other at $2,500. The collection of the income tax is an exceedingly complicated and difficult matter.

Mr. BURTON. They are existing officers whose salaries are raised?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. The salary of one of them is raised and the other remains where it is.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee what was the estimate of the department for the enforcement of the income-tax law?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I am very glad the question has been asked. The estimate was $1,500,000. The House appropriated a million dollars, and the result will be a deficiency. It is absolutely impossible for the department to get along with that amount. I talked with the Secretary to-day over the telephone. He was very much disturbed about the matter, and I told him that later on it could be taken up more deliberately than it could be now.

Mr. THOMAS. My reason for asking the question is that a similar statement was made to me by the commissioner, who said that the amount now carried by the bill is not enough for the proper enforcement of the income-tax law.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. It can not be done on the amount appropriated. The amount will have to be made a million and a half dollars.

Mr. SMOOT. Or more.

Mr. THOMAS. I move as an amendment that the figures "$1,000,000," at the end of line 5, on page 65, be stricken out and that "$1,250,000" be inserted.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I suggest to the Senator to make it $1,500,000. Nothing less than that is going to suffice. Otherwise we shall have to provide for it in the deficiency bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Except by unanimous consent, the amendment is not now in order.

Mr. SMOOT. I want to say to the Senator from Colorado that, in my opinion, $500,000 additional will not be enough.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. That is my opinion.

Mr. SMOOT. If I thought that the amount suggested by the Senator from Colorado would be sufficient, I would gladly vote for it.

Mr. THOMAS. I have no desire whatever to place the amount at too small a figure, but it occurs to me that that sum might be acceptable in this bill.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I hope the Senate by unanimous consent will make the amount $1,500,000. There is no use of making it less than that.

Mr. THOMAS. Very well; I will modify the amendment so as to insert "$1,500,000" in lieu of "$1,000,000."

Mr. SUTHERLAND. I make the point of order that the amendment is not now in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair so rules.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Very well; it can be provided for in the deficiency bill.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, under the subhead "Independent Treasury," on page 68, line 25, after "$1,500," to strike out "1, $1,400; 1, $900"; and in line 26, after the words "in all," to strike out "$27,020" and insert "$24,720," so as to make the clause read:

Office of Assistant Treasurer at San Francisco: Assistant treasurer, $4,500; cashier, who also acts as vault clerk, $3,000; bookkeeper, $2,000; paying teller, $2,400; receiving teller, $2,000; clerks—1, $2,000; 2, at $1,800 each; 1, $1,500; messenger, $840; 4 watchmen, at $720 each; in all, $24,720.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, under the head of "Mints and assay offices," on page 69, line 9, after the words "private secretary," to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,400"; and in line 10, after the words "in all," to strike out "$47,200" and insert "$47,400"; so as to make the clause read:

Mint at Denver, Colo.: Superintendent, $4,500; assayer, $3,000; superintendent melting and refining department, $3,000; superintendent coining department, $2,500; chief clerk, $2,500; cashier, $2,500; deposit weigh clerk, $2,000; bookkeeper, $2,000; assistant assayer, $2,200; assayer's assistant, $2,000; assistant cashier, $1,800; clerks—2, at $2,000 each; 2, at $1,800 each; 4, at $1,600 each; 2, at $1,400 each; 1, $1,200; private secretary, $1,400; in all, $47,400.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 69, line 16, after the word "coin," to strike out "$35,000" and insert "$40,000," so as to make the clause read:

For incidental and contingent expenses, including new machinery and repairs, wastage in melting and refining department and coining department, and loss on sale of sweeps arising from the treatment of bullion and the manufacture of coin, $40,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 71, line 23, after "$1,700," to strike out "one $1,600" and insert "two at $1,600 each"; and in line 24, after the words "in all," to strike out "$11,450" and insert "$13,050"; so as to make the clause read:

Assay office at Seattle, Wash.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,750; assistant assayer, $2,000; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $2,000; clerks—1, $1,700; 2, at $1,600 each; 1, $1,400; in all, $13,050.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, line 1, after the word "employees," to strike out "$15,000" and insert "$17,000," so as to make the clause read:

For wages of workmen and other employees, $17,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 4, to insert:

Mint at Carson, Nev.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; chief clerk, $1,200; in all, $4,700.

For wages of workmen and other employees, $2,500.

For incidental and contingent expenses, $2,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President, I should like to inquire of the chairman of the committee, not only in regard to this item, but in regard to those referring to Salt Lake City; Helena, Mont.; Deadwood, S. Dak.; and Boise, Idaho. Were these mints and assay offices stricken out a year or two ago?

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. They were not stricken out, but——

Mr. WARREN. The House struck them out, and the Senate put them back. The conference committee agreed on a reduction of some and doing away with one, and made its report to the Senate. The Senate sent the matter back to conference, and there was a very prolonged struggle when they were reinstated here. This year they were all estimated for.

Mr. NORRIS. Was any change made in the law?

Mr. WARREN. No.

Mr. NORRIS. Was there not some change in the law by which the President was authorized to reduce the number of these mints and assay offices?

Mr. WARREN. Not at all. It all stands as it did formerly. I think the Senator is thinking about revenue offices.

Mr. SMOOT. I will say to the Senator that a year ago there was a change in some of the salaries of the employees—that is, in the amounts. That is all the change that ever was made.

Mr. NORRIS. Why were these mints and assay offices omitted from the House bill? Why were not they provided for?

Mr. WARREN. It was because the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations, and later the Appropriations Committee itself, undertook to take that way of avoiding what I venture to think was their plain duty of carrying out the law and providing appropriations accordingly. The laws have provided that these various institutions be established; but the House committee did not report an appropriation for their maintenance, and the bill came to us with them left out. We reinstated them, and made appropriations for them under the law, as we felt it our duty to do. If these assay offices are to be abandoned, it should be by law, and not by failure to provide under existing law.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, I will state to the Senator that there has been a controversy between the House and the Senate upon whether or not these assay offices should continue to exist. The controversy has existed for 20 years. It was in existence when I was in the House 18 years ago, and at every session there has been a fight upon the matter. I should like to state to the Senator why, in my judgment, these appropriations should remain.

These assay offices serve a great and a good purpose to the Government, and it seems to me the Government is damaging itself when it attempts to destroy them. The purpose that they serve is in supplying the Government with gold. We get gold at a certain price—$20.67 an ounce. We do not pay any more for it. If England raises its rate of discount, this Government still gets its gold at $20.67 an ounce. It can not get the gold in any other way than through its mints and through its assay offices. The miners deposit gold there. They have it refined there. They sell it to the Government. They do not have it coined into absolute dollars there. The result is that no matter what crisis is upon the Government, even in 1893, as much as the outflow of gold was from this country, it did not pay 1 per cent or one-tenth of 1 per cent premium upon gold.

These assay offices serve that purpose. They produce and give to the Government money at a certain fixed price. No corner, nor anything in the way of an attempt to increase the price of gold, nor the existence of a premium for exportation can change or does change the amount which the Government pays. That is a valuable service to the Government, and on that account, it seems to me, these assay offices ought to continue to exist.

I will say to the Senator that in my city—the city of Denver—we have a mint, and if these assay offices were destroyed more money would come to the mint at Denver; but it seems to me that the assay offices ought to be scattered. The Government ought to be able to take in the gold at various points and not require the miner to pay an additional amount of expressage in order to send the gold to the Denver mint or to the Philadelphia mint. The Government is getting this gold at a fixed price, exactly what it can transfer it for, and under no circumstances does it ever have to pay a premium for it. For that reason, it seems to me, these assay offices are of invaluable service to the Government.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I should like to say to the Senator from Nebraska, in addition to what has been so well said by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], that these assay offices have been distributed all through the mining sections. They constitute a very great encouragement to the prospector, to the man who goes out into the mountains and discovers these mines containing the precious metal. They are a convenience to those men. In my judgment, it would be just as lacking in sense for the Government of the United States to abolish these assay offices as it would be for it to abolish a post office here and there because it does not happen to take in as much in the way of revenue as it pays out in the way of expense.

It is quite true with reference to all these assay offices that the expense of maintaining them is greater than their income, in one sense; but a vast quantity of gold is handled through them. Anywhere from a million to two or three million dollars per annum is brought to each of the various assay offices. As I say, it is a great convenience to the prospector and the miner to be able to do that. Otherwise he would have to take his little accumulation of gold dust, if he is a placer miner, or the bar of gold that has come from the mill, and send it to some remote point. It is a convenience in the same sense that a post office is a convenience.

Mr. NELSON. Mr. President, will the Senator yield to me?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I will yield to the Senator.

Mr. NELSON. As I understand, these assay offices are public market places, where the miner brings his crude ore and gets pay for it?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; not the ore. He brings the metal.

Mr. NELSON. The crude metal, I mean.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. And the crude gold, before it is refined.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NELSON. He sells it there; the Government refines it, assays it, ascertains how much gold there is, and pays him a fixed rate?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. NELSON. It is a public market place for the miner?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes. Now, let me say another thing to the Senator. If it had not been for these assay offices, particularly those near the Canadian border, a vast quantity of gold that came from the mines of the United States would have gone into British Columbia, because the people of British Columbia are alive to this situation just as we have been, and they have established assay offices along the Canadian border. If the miner in the near vicinity of the border were compelled to send his gold to Philadelphia or to Denver or to San Francisco, instead of doing that he would send it over to the nearest assay office in British Columbia. So this has been the means of keeping in the United States a vast deal of gold.

There is another thing to be said about it. These assay offices were established a great many years ago, and they were maintained, some of them, 15, 20, or 25 years ago, at a time when vastly less gold was brought to each of them than there is to-day. It was considered good policy in that day. If it was good policy then, with one-fourth the quantity of gold going through each of them that goes through them now, it certainly has not ceased to be good policy when three or four times, and in some cases ten times, as much is brought to the same offices now. It is not a large expenditure in the aggregate. There are perhaps 8 or 10 of the offices altogether, and the aggregate expense of maintaining them all is probably not $50,000.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BRADY rose.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator, if he desires to interrupt now.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, the statements made by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] and the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] are along the same line of thought that I would have expressed; but I wish to say further with reference to the assay office at Boise, Idaho, that office has been established for over 45 years. It was established simply for the benefit of the small miner.

There are men who are bringing gold dust to the Boise assay office who have been going out to the hills, bringing it in, getting their small allowance for it, going back and working again and discovering more mines, for years and years. It is just simply a market for the product of their toil.

A great deal of the expense that is charged up to the assay office should be charged up to the mint, because they charge the assay office with the freight on the gold from the assay office to the mint; and in abandoning these assay offices, if you will notice, they only abandon the offices in the West, and they appropriate $50,000 for an assay office at New York. They have lately, I understand, made a rule that they will not accept shipments of less than $500; and the miners have to club together in order to get shipments enough to justify them in sending them to the mint.

The abandonment of these offices will certainly work a very great hardship on the miners of the West. I know, from my knowledge of the sense of fairness of the Senator from Nebraska, that if he understood the conditions as we in the West understand them he would not only not object to this appropriation but he would use his best efforts to see that these small miners are permitted to have a market for their gold as they produce it without having to ship it to Denver or New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Mr. President of course I am not posted like the Senators are who have just been talking about these assay offices. In a general way only I knew that there was some sort of a controversy; and as I understood it, and as I still understand it, although I may be wrong, a great many of these assay offices are kept up, at an expense to the Government, where they do not do enough business to pay the expense of operating the offices. As I understand, that is true of several of them, at least.

I will ask the Senator from Idaho what the facts are in regard to Boise, in his State. Does it cost the Government more to keep up the office at Boise than the returns from the office yield?

Mr. BRADY. As a matter of bookkeeping, it does cost a small amount more than the actual receipts to maintain these offices—not only one, but all of them—but they require the assay office to pay the freight or express on the gold to the mint, while, as a matter of right, it should be charged to the mint.

Mr. NORRIS. Yes.

Mr. BRADY. If they did not do that, the result would be different, and the assay offices of the West would pay expenses.

Mr. NORRIS. Where do they send the gold from Boise?

Mr. BRADY. They send it to Denver, San Francisco, and New York. If they would charge that expense to the mint, where it should be charged, instead of charging it to the assay office, it would show a profit.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose the assay office at Boise sends its gold to the mint at Denver, does it not?

Mr. BRADY. Yes; most of it to Denver.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator from Idaho agree with the Senator from Utah that these assay offices are public market places where the miners can bring in their gold and have it assayed?

Mr. BRADY. Yes; there is no question about it.

Mr. NORRIS. And save the expense of shipping it?

Mr. BRADY. The expense of shipping is charged to the assay office, while we claim it should be charged to the mint, but it also saves time.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, will the Senator tell us why there should be an assay office at New York? Does anybody carry gold there?

Mr. BRADY. They are trying to compel them to do it, and they will do it if you abandon these assay offices. There are large shipments that should go to New York, but the local assay offices are necessary for the encouragement of the small miner.

Mr. NORRIS. We are appropriating here $51,000 for an assay office in New York.

Mr. BRADY. That is true, but if you abandon the assay offices in the West we will have to send all of our gold to New York, Denver, and the other mints, and it will put the small miner out of business.

Mr. NORRIS. The matter I wanted to bring particularly to the attention of the Senator was that if these assay offices are public market places, like post offices, where miners in the vicinity digging gold can bring it in, why is there any necessity for having one in New York City?

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Nebraska yield to the Senator from Colorado?

Mr. NORRIS. Just as soon as I have finished with the Senator from Idaho.

Mr. BRADY. There should be one in New York for large shipments and also for foreign business, but the local miner can not afford to ship to New York. That is one reason why we say assay offices should be maintained in the West, where the gold is produced, rather than to compel the miner to ship the ore from the Western States to New York.

Mr. NORRIS. I am not trying to do away with the assay offices in one locality and keep them in another unless there is reason for doing it. I am trying to get at the facts. The reason given here for retaining these offices is that otherwise miners can not bring in their gold and have it assayed. If that is true, then there is not any necessity for keeping an assay office in a section of the country where there is no gold mined.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President——

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has already inquired of the Senator from Nebraska whether he would yield to the Senator from Colorado, and the Senator from Nebraska has declined to yield at this time.

Mr. BRADY. I think probably it is necessary to have an assay office at New York, for the reason that some mines ship their gold to New York because it is a larger and a greater market; but, on the other hand, there is absolutely——

Mr. NORRIS. Where do they get the gold that they assay in New York? Where does it come from?

Mr. BRADY. From all over the United States and abroad.

Mr. THOMAS. Mr. President, if the Senator will permit me, I can answer that question.

Mr. NORRIS. I can not yield to two Senators at once. I will yield to the Senator from Colorado as soon as the Senator from Idaho gets through.

I did not hear the answer the Senator from Idaho made to my question.

Mr. BRADY. I say, there is a necessity for an assay office at New York, because there are people from all parts of the mining States who will choose to ship their gold to some of the large centers. In other words, New York is our greatest gold market. The Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] or the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] will explain more fully why that is done, because they are engaged more closely in connection with the mining business; but New York has a large assay office. Gold is shipped there from all parts of the world as well as from the mining States; but at the same time the small miner, who only produces a small amount of gold, takes his gold to the local assay office and receives the cash for it at once. This is a great advantage to the miner and prospector, for they can not afford to wait for returns from New York or Denver.

Mr. NORRIS. Then, as I understand, the assay offices in the West are particularly beneficial to the small miner, while the large assay offices, like that in New York City, are utilized to accommodate the large miner?

Mr. BRADY. That is quite true. There is a large amount assayed in the western offices, and also large shipments made to New York and Denver. The Senator from Utah can give you a report showing more in detail relative to that, and I will ask him to do so. The reason why we want the assay offices maintained in the West, however, as they have been, is because they are already established. It is just as the Senator from Utah says about the post office. They have been there for years. The Government owns the land on which the assay offices are located. The miners of Idaho send their gold to the assay office at Boise City; the men near the assay office in Montana send theirs to that office; the men near the Salt Lake City assay office send their gold to that office; and in that way it gives a local market and encourages the mining business just exactly the same as we are encouraging agriculture; and there can be no good reason given why the western assay offices should be abandoned. The West produces the gold of this country, and the miner and prospector should have a home market for his gold, and should not have to wait for returns from Denver or New York.

Mr. NORRIS. Evidently that could not be wholly true or there would not be anybody sending any gold to the New York assay office.

Mr. BRADY. The Senator from Utah——

Mr. NORRIS. I promised first to yield to the Senator from Colorado, and I now yield to him.

Mr. THOMAS. The Senator from Nebraska asked the Senator from Idaho a question as to why it is necessary that the Government should maintain an assay office at New York, if I properly understood his question, because of the reasons which were given by the Senator from Idaho for the maintenance of these assay offices. The assay office in New York is a very large institution, and it is used by the Government perhaps as much for refining purposes as for assay purposes. The Senator probably knows that gold which is purchased by the Government at these assay offices and from the mines and the banks is not pure. It is almost always mixed with silver and frequently contains other metals which must be separated and for which allowance is made in the purchase price paid to the miner or to the owner. That work is done very largely at the assay office in New York, which is the oldest Government assay office in the country and now has assumed very large proportions.

Of course some of the refining is done at the mints, but a great deal of it is done in the city of New York. There also tests are made which are designed as a sort of check for the tests which are made at the points of purchase. Its functions, in other words, are possibly the same but very much larger than the assay offices which are the subject matter of this amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I should like to supplement that——

Mr. NORRIS. Let me get through with the Senator's colleague first. I will be glad to yield later on.

Mr. SHAFROTH. All right.

Mr. NORRIS. I wish to ask the Senator from Colorado, who evidently is very well posted on this question, whether the operations carried on at an assay office complete the transaction or whether there must be an assay office and also a mint. The assay office does not coin the gold, I understand.

Mr. THOMAS. No; the assay office is a sort of annex to the mint.

Mr. NORRIS. After the gold is assayed and its value determined, it is sent to the mint, I understand, from the assay office.

Mr. THOMAS. Yes; although some of the mints, I think, are equipped with refining facilities as well.

Mr. NORRIS. I notice that in some of the places where they have assay offices they do not have mints. Now, I want to ask the Senator how the assay office in New York is kept busy.

Mr. THOMAS. It is kept busy in refining and determining the aliquot constituents of the metals which are sent there for that purpose. If the Senator has a gold mine and obtains from the ores a bar of gold, that bar will contain inevitably some silver, doubtless some lead, and probably some copper, or some one or more of these additional metals.

As I understand it, the great part of the Government's purchases of bullion is taken to New York and there the different elements that enter into the bar are separated. Of course, it also carries on a Government assay business, and I think at present it is very largely an annex of the Philadelphia Mint for those purposes. The Government also purchases a great deal of its gold bullion at that mint, which is sent there by banks. For example, the First National Bank of Denver may purchase from the Independence mine at Cripple Creek. It is sold to the bank instead of the mint, as is sometimes the case. That bank will in all probability send that consignment of gold to its correspondent in New York, New York being the great financial center of the country, and in that way it will reach the assay office there.

Mr. NORRIS. In that transaction the gold shipped to New York would not be in the form of coin?

Mr. THOMAS. No; it would be gold bullion.

Mr. NORRIS. Why would the banks in Denver prefer to send the gold in that shape to New York, rather than to take it to the mint in Denver?

Mr. THOMAS. Gold bars are used now perhaps for the purpose of settling exchanges very much more than gold coin. The use in that way is becoming more and more common.

Mr. NORRIS. This would be in the shape of gold bars.

Mr. THOMAS. In the shape of gold bars; and the amount of gold in them would be the result of the official test of the assay office in New York, and could be thus used and would be used in determining exchanges, as is very frequently done, instead of using the coined metal.

Mr. NORRIS. Would the bank in Denver send direct to the assay office in New York?

Mr. THOMAS. It would probably send to its own correspondent.

Mr. NORRIS. And then its correspondent would take it to the assay office?

Mr. THOMAS. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. That would not be gold of the same grade as gold that would be entitled to coinage? There would be impurities in it?

Mr. THOMAS. In all probability there would not be. Generally speaking, the amount of alloy in gold bullion which is thus sold is less than the amount that is in the coined metal.

Mr. NORRIS. If that is one of the reasons for keeping up the assay office at New York, is the Government justified in maintaining an assay office in New York and doing this work for the purpose of assisting in financial transactions as in the case of a man who sells gold bars to a bank in Denver?

Mr. THOMAS. That is a proposition I would not attempt to discuss just now. In fact, I do not know that I would be competent to discuss it in all its phases, but I am satisfied if the Government were reduced to the necessity of choosing between assay offices it would select the one in New York in preference to all the others.

Mr. NORRIS. I will ask the Senator before he takes his seat, for the purpose of trying to get at the facts, what proportion of gold in the western assay offices is brought to the office in person by the miner?

Mr. THOMAS. Brought to New York?

Mr. NORRIS. No; not to New York. I do not suppose anyone will contend that the miner carries the gold to New York.

Mr. THOMAS. I do not know as to that. I do not think that is done, although probably it is.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Idaho to say, and I am not sure but the Senator from Utah said, that one of the reasons for retaining these western offices is to make a sort of public market place where the miner can carry his gold.

Mr. THOMAS. I think that is correct, but the Senator asked me about the proportion. I think the proportion of gold that reaches the assay office in New York is very much more than the proportion of gold that is sold to these assay offices, and that is why I answered as I did.

Mr. NORRIS. I was asking the Senator about the proportion of gold that is assayed in any western assay office with which he is familiar.

Mr. THOMAS. As to that the Senator from Utah and the Senator from Idaho can answer better than I, because none of the assay offices mentioned in this amendment are situated in the State of Colorado. We have a mint in the city of Denver that is a clearing house for that section of country.

Mr. NORRIS. The mint answers the purpose both of a mint and an assay office, does it not?

Mr. THOMAS. That mint does. We have had no Government assay office in Colorado since we have had a mint.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield now to the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND].

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The situation in the mining States, where these assay offices are located, is this: Some of the gold is in placer form. When that gold is picked up it is almost pure. It comes in the form sometimes of small nuggets, sometimes in very small grains like sand, but it is practically pure gold. There is some little foreign material in it. Gold of this character comes in small quantities. A prospector will get a little accumulation of it, $200 worth, perhaps, or less, and he takes it to an assay office.

Then another kind of gold is produced by what is called the cyanide process; that is, the gold occurs in certain forms where the rock is free, a term used by miners indicating that the gold is readily separated, not carrying base metals with it.

We have had in my own State a district where the gold was all separated by the cyanide process, and the product ran up to a million dollars a year at one time in that district, perhaps more. That gold comes in a reasonably pure state.

The greater portion of gold, however, is found associated with other metals. We find in our mines containing lead that there will be associated with the lead silver, gold, or copper, or two of these metals, or all three of them. Those ores are reduced and the whole metallic content is run in the form of a matte. You get a great pig of lead and call it "lead matte" because the lead predominates. If copper predominates it is called "copper matte." Associated with the copper or in the copper matte is not only copper but some gold. We have in the West no refining works where the gold is separated from that matte.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator is that a part of the work of an assay office?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; that material does not go to the local assay offices at all. Copper matte is produced in vast quantities. I have forgotten the figures and I would not undertake to give them, but we are producing in my own State a very large quantity of copper. All that copper matte contains some gold. It can not be separated there because we have no refining works, but it is all shipped to the vicinity of New York where the great refining works are. New York in that way becomes a great clearing house, so that the copper matte from Utah, the copper matte from Montana, the copper matte from other States, perhaps from Mexico, is shipped to these refining works.

When gold is separated in the refining works it is still not absolutely pure. It still contains some base material and perhaps some silver and has to be assayed in order to ascertain the gold content. That goes to the assay office in New York—a vast quantity of it—I think very much exceeding that which goes to these local offices.

Mr. NORRIS. I ask the Senator why that goes to New York? Why does it not go to an assay office in the vicinity?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Because so small a portion is gold. There will be a great bar of copper and only an ounce or a few ounces of gold in it, and perhaps a few ounces of silver.

Mr. NORRIS. That has not been refined?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. It has not been refined, and there are no refining works in that vicinity where it can be refined.

Mr. NORRIS. The first thing to do would be to send it to a place where it could be refined.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. To the refining works in New Jersey.

Mr. NORRIS. It would go to the assay office in New York.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Then when refined and the gold separated from the copper the gold is taken to the assay office. That is one way, of course. There can be another way——

Mr. NORRIS. Were the five assay offices that are included in this amendment and not included in the House bill included last year?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; they were excluded from the bill by the House.

Mr. NORRIS. I mean the bill as it finally became the law.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; they are in the law. I have here a copy of the law of last year.

Mr. NORRIS. They are in operation now?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I had the impression that in conference the Senate receded finally.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; they are in the law.

Let me say another thing to the Senator. Each of these assay offices has been created by a general law establishing the office, and the effort is being made not to repeal that law, which would be the direct way of doing it, but to let the law remain upon the books and strangle the offices by refusing appropriations. They have all the machinery there; they have their force of employees at work; and if we are to maintain the law upon the statute books, we ought to appropriate money to carry the law into operation, or if not, to repeal the law.

Mr. NORRIS. I yield to the Senator from Colorado.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. President, the Senator has asked what is the necessity for an assay office at New York City. I will state to him what I understand are the necessities of that office. It arises from the fact that the United States has made gold the money of the United States and it is desirable for the United States to attract gold for the purpose of having a supply of it in the country. Therefore free coinage of gold has existed in the United States and exists in nearly every other country. There is a little inducement made by this opportunity to have gold assayed and the exact number of ounces and the purity of the same stamped on the bar.

New York City is a great import city. It gets shipments of everything from all over the world. There naturally comes there from all over the world some quantity of gold in some form, and the purpose is to get it assayed, that the Government may get hold of it. So the Government can buy it at the rate of $20.67 an ounce, and by reason of that never have to pay a premium on the gold.

New York is also a commercial center, where a great many things in the way of manufacturing gold take place. A great deal of old jewelry is brought in, I understand, for the purpose of being melted into bars—probably both silver and gold.

All that makes New York the one point in the East above all others where it is desirable to have an assay office. It is the gathering together of this metal which all nations are struggling for and want to induce shipments of in a manner that will get to the Government the cheapest and the greatest quantity of gold.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator say that old jewelry and such gold as that is brought to the assay office in New York?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I so understand.

Mr. NORRIS. And then the Government officials melt that up into gold bars?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; into gold bars, stamping on the bar the number of ounces and the purity of the bar, and that acts practically as a circulating medium between the banks.

Mr. NORRIS. So that anyone who wanted to buy it, including the Government, on going to the assay office would know from the stamp of the assay office exactly how much gold was contained in it?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. They would buy that, and it would enter into the transactions of business?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Those bars are very largely owned by banks, and when the shipment is made to Europe the shipment is not in coin, because the abrasion is so great. There is a loss of $256 on every $1,000,000 of coin shipped between the United States and London.

Mr. NORRIS. And they ship these bars?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes, sir.

Mr. NORRIS. I suppose the stamp of the assay office is accepted everywhere in the civilized world?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, yes; there is no doubt of it. The Government stamp imports absolute verity. For that reason New York is the proper place in the eastern part of the country to have an assay office.

Mr. NORRIS. Does the Senator think it is necessary for us to retain all these assay offices and mints?

Mr. SHAFROTH. I think so.

Mr. NORRIS. Let us take the mint at Carson City, for instance.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is a great production of gold in Nevada. I think Nevada produces now somewhere near $14,000,000 or $15,000,000 of gold a year.

Mr. NORRIS. But there is a large portion of that that is shipped to the New York assay office and does not reach the Carson City Mint.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Most of it, I think, would go to the assay office at Carson City. Some of it drifts.

Mr. NORRIS. If it had to be refined, would it not have to go east, as the Senator from Utah [Mr. SUTHERLAND] has explained, to the refiner before it could reach the assay office?

Mr. SHAFROTH. No; because each one of these assay offices has a refinery.

Mr. NORRIS. In the West?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes.

Mr. NORRIS. I understood the Senator from Utah to say that one of the reasons why we ought to keep up the assay office in New York is because a great deal of gold comes East to be refined and is shipped back to the West.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. The Senator from Colorado does not mean a refinery in which the great bars of lead and copper and gold and silver are separated?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Oh, no; those are smelters. Those smelters produce gold bars, too, but they are not stamped, or their stamp would not be accepted by the banks.

Mr. NORRIS. I understand that; but those gold bars could be shipped to an assay office in the West just as well as to an assay office in the East.

As I understand the argument of the Senator from Utah, it is in favor of the New York assay office; that there is a large amount of gold of such a condition that it is not fit to be taken even to the assay office; that it is shipped to a refinery in New Jersey, and there it is refined and, although not absolutely pure, it is sent to the New York assay office. The Senator from Colorado, it seems to me, if his argument is good, absolutely contradicts that statement. He says that they do not refine that in the West in these various places.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. No; the statement of the Senator from Colorado does not differ from the statement which I have made. The Senator from Colorado was not referring to the refineries to which this copper matte and lead matte can be taken.

Mr. NORRIS. Copper matte and lead matte are just a conglomeration of various metals melted together. Is not that correct?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Precisely.

Mr. NORRIS. They have to be refined.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. For example, in the Utah Copper Co.'s mines, which are among the greatest copper mines in the world, the ores carry less than 2 per cent copper. Those great reduction works handle, I think, now over 6,000 tons a day of the ore containing less than 2 per cent copper. The metallic content of that crude ore is run out through this process into bars. The bars are large, and they contain in the main copper. There will be in two or three hundred pounds of copper matte, as I have said, only a few ounces, perhaps only an ounce of gold. There are no facilities in the West for separating the gold from that kind of material.

Mr. NORRIS. That is the kind that goes to New York?

Mr. SUTHERLAND. That is the kind that goes to the refineries in New Jersey, or wherever they may be located.

Mr. NORRIS. It seems to me, although I know very little about it, that possibly we are maintaining too many assay offices and perhaps too many men. I do not believe there is anything in the argument that the assay offices ought to be retained because they have been in existence 40 years any more than that we should retain a post office that has been in existence for 40 years after it has ceased to be necessary and when it can be abandoned as a practical business proposition. I am not saying that the assay offices ought to be abandoned. I do not know enough about the matter to make that statement, but I do know that a great many men who have studied the question think so, and I think perhaps the House of Representatives as a body believes that. Neither does it appeal to me from what has been developed here that the assay offices ought to be retained simply because they make headquarters where miners can bring their gold and have it assayed. If that is necessary, there ought to be a great many more assay offices. I do not suppose in any of the places where there are assay offices that there are sufficient mines to keep the assay offices going; but, as the Senator from Colorado has said, most of the gold that comes to them has to be shipped in there, anyway. It was only as a matter of economy, I think, that the House has cut out this appropriation, for I understand that the assay offices were put in at various times in the Senate, as I think it is claimed, attached to some appropriation bill.

Mr. WARREN. No, Mr. President, the Senator is mistaken. The assay offices were established by law, and if they are abolished by law then the provision for their maintenance would not appear in the appropriation bill, but the law creating them stands on the statute books.

Mr. NORRIS. I am speaking of the origin of the law. I do not suppose all of them were created in that way.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. They were created by an absolutely separate and distinct law. The law which created the assay office at Salt Lake City I myself introduced many years ago, when it was passed. It is a separate and distinct law upon the statute books and not a provision in an appropriation bill at all.

Mr. NORRIS. That may apply to the Salt Lake City assay office; and I should think Salt Lake City would be a very proper place for an assay office.

Mr. BRADY. Mr. President, I want to say a word relative to the five assay offices for which an appropriation is sought. They are in operation and have been in operation for many years. The Boise office has been in operation since 1869. Last year it handled $1,022,887.29 worth of gold. The fact of the matter is that this simply, as I said before, makes a local market for the gold produced by the miners. The law provides for every one of them. Appropriations have always been made for maintenance and operation, and the House has no right to try to destroy one of our greatest industries by refusing to maintain them; and I know the committee was justified in recommending this amendment, and I hope that it will prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on agreeing to the amendment relating to the mint at Carson City, Nev., on page 72.

The amendment was agreed to.

The reading of the bill was resumed.

The next amendment of the Committee on Appropriations was, on page 72, after line 9, to insert:

Assay office at Boise, Idaho: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,200; in all, $4,700.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $3,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 15, to insert:

Assay office at Deadwood, S. Dak.: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; clerk, $1,200; in all, $4,700.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $3,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, new machinery, etc., $1,500.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 72, after line 22, to insert:

Assay office at Helena, Mont.: Assayer in charge, $2,000; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,400; assistant assayer, $1,500; in all, $4,900.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $3,000.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $2,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment was, on page 73, after line 1, to insert:

Assay office at Salt Lake City, Utah: Assayer in charge, who shall also perform the duties of melter, $2,000; assistant assayer, $1,500; chief clerk, who shall also perform the duties of cashier, $1,200; in all, $4,700.
For wages of workmen and other employees, $2,500.
For incidental and contingent expenses, $2,000.

Mr. SUTHERLAND. Mr. President, I desire to offer an amendment to the amendment. On page 73, line 4, I move to strike out the words "assistant assayer, $1,500"; in line 5, to strike out "$1,200" and insert "$1,600"; and to strike out the total, "$4,700," and insert "$3,600."

I offer that amendment for this reason: The committee amendment provides for three officials—assayer in charge, at a salary of $2,000; assistant assayer, at a salary of $1,500; and a chief clerk, at a salary of $1,200. The fact is that in that office the assayer in charge is himself a practical assayer and a very good one; the chief clerk at that office is also a practical assayer and a very good one; so at that particular office those two men can do the work, and an assistant assayer is not needed. The chief clerk heretofore has been receiving $1,600 per annum. His compensation by the committee amendment is cut to $1,200; so that by striking out the provision with reference to the assistant assayer and putting the salary of the chief clerk back where it was and where it ought to be, at $1,600, there would be a net saving of $1,100.

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. I accept that amendment and shall be very glad to see it adopted.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Utah to the amendment reported by the committee.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. STONE. Mr. President——

Mr. MARTIN of Virginia. Mr. President, I ask unanimous consent that the bill may be temporarily laid aside in order that the Senator from Missouri may make the motion which I know he contemplates making. In doing so, I desire to give notice that to-morrow morning after the conclusion of the morning business I will ask the Senate to take up this bill again, as I am exceedingly anxious to finish it to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Without objection, the bill will be temporarily laid aside.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. STONE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to, and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After 5 minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 35 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 13, 1914, at 11 o'clock a. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 12, 1914.

The House met at 12 o'clock noon.

The House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DIXON.

Rev. John T. Huddle, of St. Paul's Lutheran Church, Washington, D. C., offered the following prayer:

Our Father's God and ours, with reverence we come into Thy conscious presence, believing that Thou art and that Thou dost respond sympathetically to the appeals and aspirations of all those who diligently seek Thee. We rejoice that in Thee the God of love of law centers, and that back of the forces of nature the affairs of nations and the revolutions of generations Thou doth stand, keeping watch over the achievements of men and the changes of time, bending them all toward that far-off divine event toward which the whole creation moves.

We thank Thee for the close and intimate relationship that we sustain to Thee, being made in Thine image, a little lower than the angels, crowned with glory and honor and set over the works of Thy hand. Impress us deeply with the sense of consequent responsibility resting upon us. May we feel the noblesse oblige of exalted leadership, realizing that we came from God and go to God. May we lay aside every weight and give ourselves unreservedly to the tasks of life, inspired by the highest ideals and actuated by the purest motives. May we go forward to the duties of this day in Thy fear and for Thy glory, and as our day may our strength and our wisdom be, and when our work is finished and we are called to stand before Thee to give account of our stewardship, may we hear Thy welcome "Well done," and enter into the joy with which a useful and unselfish life rewards the faithful at evening time. And Thine shall be the praise, through Jesus Christ our Lord. Amen.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE ALSTON G. DAYTON.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of the highest privilege. By virtue of my office as a Member of the House of Representatives, I impeach Alston G. Dayton, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, of high crimes and misdemeanors.

I charge him with having unlawfully conspired with certain corporations and individuals to bring about the removal of John J. Jackson as judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia, in order that he, the said Dayton, might be appointed to fill the vacancy in said office.

I charge him with showing marked favoritism to certain corporations having extensive litigation in his court.

I charge him with having had summoned on grand juries in practically every instance wherein grand juries have been impaneled by him persons connected with certain corporations, to which he has shown marked favoritism during his term of office, and with having summoned to serve on petit juries in his court the agents, servants, and representatives of said corporations.

I charge him with having assisted his son, Arthur Dayton, who is a young attorney practicing in his court, in the preparation of the defense and trial of numerous cases against certain corporations for which the said Arthur Dayton is attorney, which cases were tried before him, the said Alston G. Dayton, and I further charge him with unlawfully using his high office and influence in behalf of said corporations.

I charge him with abusing his power and influence as judge to further the interests of his son, Arthur Dayton, in this, that he, the said Alston G. Dayton, advises litigants in his court to discharge other lawyers representing such litigants, stating to such litigants that their lawyers will not be honest with them relative to their litigation, and that they ought to employ his son, Arthur Dayton, to represent them in such litigation pending in his court and other courts.

I charge him with using the funds of the United States for an improper purpose in this, that the stenographer and janitor employed in his office do the work for both him and the said Arthur Dayton, the Government paying the salaries therefor.

I charge him with having violated the acts of Congress regulating the selection of jurors.

I charge him with having actively engaged in politics and with having used his high office as judge to further the political ambitions and aspirations of his friends.

I charge him with lending his services, as judge, to the coal operators of West Virginia by improperly issuing injunctions to prevent the miners from exercising their just and legal rights under the laws of the State of West Virginia and of the United States, and further charge him with showing hatred and bitterness toward certain miners on trial in his court for alleged violation of injunctions awarded by him; and further charge him with using his office as judge to discourage and prevent said miners from exercising their lawful right to organize and peaceably assemble under the laws of the United States and the State of West Virginia.

I charge him with having wrongfully expressed his own opinions, in charging grand juries in his court, relative to politics and other matters not the subject of investigation before him.

I charge him with having conspired with certain corporations and individuals in the formation of a carbon trust, in flagrant violation of law, the object of which was to control the sale of practically all the carbon black manufactured in the United States, the said Dayton being largely interested in the manufacture of such product.

I charge him with having unlawfully had an order entered staying a certain proceeding, the object of which was the condemnation of a lot in Philippi, W. Va., for a site for a Federal building, in order that he might substitute a different location near his home and upon which he held an option.

I charge him with having publicly denounced the President of the United States from the bench and before a jury.

I charge him with having unlawfully used the funds of the United States Government for his own private use in this, that one Henry Wright, who has for many years been paid a salary by the Government for acting as a messenger for said court, has never performed the duties of his office, but has performed the services of a domestic in the home of said Dayton at Philippi, W. Va.

I charge him with having wrongfully collected from the Government money or funds as expenses not due or allowed to him under the statute which allows him his actual expenses while holding court away from his judicial residence.

I charge him with having wrongfully kept open the books of his court at Philippi, W. Va., while the court was ostensibly in session, but while no business or court matters were being transacted by him, for the sole purpose of enabling his court criers and bailiffs to draw pay.

I charge him with having, in open court and before a jury, accused witnesses of swearing falsely in cases then on trial before him.

I charge him with having directed the marshal of his district to refuse to pay the fees of witnesses whom he had accused of testifying falsely.

I charge him with having refused to enforce certain laws of the United States, stating from the bench that such laws are not right.

I charge him with having openly denounced and criticized from the bench and before a jury the United States Supreme Court for having adopted the rules of procedure now in force.

I charge him with having discharged jurors for rendering verdicts not agreeable to him.

I charge him with having openly stated that he would not permit the United Mine Workers of America to exist within the jurisdiction of his court.

I charge him with having refused to permit certain defendants in a case in his court to have an interpreter, so that they could defend themselves against the charge of violating an injunction.

I charge him with having stated in open court that the United Mine Workers of America are criminal conspirators.

I charge him with being so prejudiced as to unfit him temperamentally to hold a judicial office.

I charge him with being guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

Mr. Speaker, in accordance with the precedents of the House in like cases, I submit the following resolution, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the resolution.

The Clerk read as follows:

House resolution 541.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be directed to inquire and report whether the action of this House is necessary concerning the alleged official misconduct of Alston G. Dayton; whether he has unlawfully conspired with certain corporations and individuals to bring about the removal from office of the late John J. Jackson, judge of the District Court of the United States for the Northern District of West Virginia; whether he has shown marked favoritism to certain corporations having extensive litigation in his court; whether he has had summoned on juries in his court persons connected with certain corporations to which he has shown marked favoritism during his term of office; whether he has assisted his son, Arthur Dayton, in the preparation of the defense and trial of numerous cases against certain corporations for which the said Arthur Dayton is attorney, which cases were tried before him, the said Alston G. Dayton, and whether he has unlawfully used his high office and influence in behalf of said corporations; whether he has abused his power and influence as judge to further the interests of his son, Arthur Dayton; whether he has used the funds of the United States for an improper purpose; whether he has violated the acts of Congress regulating the selection of jurors; whether he has actively engaged in politics and used his high office as judge to further the political ambitions and aspirations of his friends; whether he has lent his services as judge to the coal operators of West Virginia by improperly issuing injunctions; whether he has shown hatred and bitterness toward miners on trial in his court; whether he has used his office as judge to discourage and prevent said miners from exercising their lawful right to organize and peaceably assemble under the laws of the United States and the State of West Virginia; whether he has wrongfully expressed his own opinions in charging grand juries in his court; whether he has conspired with certain corporations and individuals in the formation of a carbon trust in violation of law; whether he has unlawfully had an order entered staying a proceeding the object of which was the condemnation of a lot in Philippi, W. Va., for a site for a Federal building; whether he has publicly denounced the President of the United States from the bench and before a jury; whether he has unlawfully used the funds of the United States Government for his own private use; whether he has wrongfully collected from the Government funds as expenses not due or allowed to him under the statute; whether he has wrongfully kept open the books of his court at Philippi, W. Va.; whether he has, in open court and before a jury, accused witnesses of swearing falsely in cases then on trial before him; whether he has directed the marshal of his district to refuse to pay the fees of witnesses whom he had accused of testifying falsely; whether he has refused to enforce certain laws of the United States; whether he has openly denounced and criticized the United States Supreme Court; whether he has discharged jurors for rendering verdicts not agreeable to him; whether he has openly stated that he would not permit the United Mine Workers of America to exist within the jurisdiction of his court; whether he has refused to permit certain defendants in a case in his court to have an interpreter; whether he has stated in open court that the United Mine Workers of America are criminal conspirators; whether he is so prejudiced as to unfit him temperamentally to hold a judicial office; and whether he has been guilty of various other acts of personal and judicial misconduct for which he should be impeached.

That this committee is hereby authorized and empowered to send for persons and papers, to administer oaths, to employ, if necessary, an additional clerk and stenographer, and to appoint and send a subcommittee whenever and wherever necessary to take testimony for the use of said subcommittee.

That the subcommittee shall have the same power in respect to obtaining testimony as is herein given to the said Committee on the Judiciary; that the Speaker shall have authority to sign and the Clerk to attest subpœnas for any witness or witnesses.

That the expenses incurred in this investigation shall be paid out of the contingent fund of the House.

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on the Judiciary without debate.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Well, I suppose the gentleman desires to move the previous question on his motion to refer?

Mr. NEELY of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I do move the previous question on my motion to refer.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from West Virginia moves the previous question upon his motion to refer this resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The question was taken, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is upon the motion to refer the resolution to the Judiciary Committee.

The question was taken and the motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed, with amendment, bill of the following title, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

H. R. 14385. An act to amend section 5 of "An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal, and the sanitation of the Canal Zone," approved August 24, 1912.

PANAMA CANAL TOLLS.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the bill just returned from the Senate, with an amendment, be laid before the House.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair lays before the House a House bill with Senate amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 5 (calendar day June 11), 1914.

Resolved, That the bill from the House of Representatives (H. R. 14385) entitled "An act to amend section 5 of 'An act to provide for the opening, maintenance, protection, and operation of the Panama Canal and the sanitation of the Canal Zone,' approved August 24, 1912," do pass with the following

AMENDMENT:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the period and quotation marks and insert: ": Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaties, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendment, and I desire to ask gentlemen on the other side if there is any disposition for debate. As far as I am concerned, I am ready for a vote unless other gentlemen wish to speak; if so, I will help as far as I can.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Georgia I recognize the fact that the majority of the House is in favor of passing this bill, although I am not. I have no desire to delay the passage of the bill. I think the will of the majority should be written into the law whether it conforms to my views or not, but I do not think that this resolution should be passed without some debate. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia I do not know I will occupy all that time, but I desire about 20 minutes myself.

Mr. ADAMSON. I had hoped, Mr. Speaker, that we might be able to get through within an hour. Does the gentleman from Illinois desire time?

Mr. MANN. We should like a little debate over here.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much will suit the gentleman?

Mr. MANN. We will take half an hour on this side.

Mr. ADAMSON. That would not include the time of the gentleman from Alabama?

Mr. MANN. No.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman wants 20 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that at the end of an hour and a half the previous question may be considered as ordered.

Mr. MANN. Better fix the control of the time.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I suggest to the gentleman that I have control of 20 minutes and the gentleman from Illinois have control of 30 minutes——

Mr. ADAMSON. That makes 50 minutes. Can not you get along with 45 minutes and let me control 45 minutes?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I see no reason in a matter of this importance why we should not have 50 minutes' debate; if gentlemen desire more time on that side of the question——

Mr. MANN. I will get along with 25 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That is all right.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. That does not include the gentleman from Kansas?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I want all gentlemen to have all the time they want, but I was just trying to find out how much it is.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I may not consume my 20 minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Then, Mr. Speaker, I will ask that there be 45 minutes controlled by myself, 20 minutes to go to the gentleman from Alabama, 5 minutes to the gentleman from Kansas, and 20 minutes to the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked by the gentleman from Georgia for one hour and half of debate, 45 minutes of that time to be controlled by himself, 20 minutes to be controlled by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD], 20 minutes by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], and 5 minutes by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], and at the end of that time the previous question shall be considered as ordered. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. The gentleman would have the right to demand the previous question and somebody might want to offer an amendment. For instance, this is purely technical: The Senate amendment strikes out the period and quotation marks at the end of the bill and inserts an amendment which does not have any quotation marks at the end of it in the copy I have of it, which would leave the amended law with quotation marks at the beginning but not at the end, and that would undoubtedly prove troublesome to the clerks, and the gentleman might wish to correct that.

Mr. ADAMSON. I should think in enrolling the bill that the quotation marks might be disregarded.

Mr. MANN. But the enrolling clerk will not disregard anything of that kind, and can not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request?

Mr. MANN. We might want to offer some real amendments.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will modify the request at the suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois and say that at the end of one hour and a half I may be recognized to move the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the unanimous-consent request as modified by the gentleman from Georgia? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I had intended to reserve enough time to conclude the debate. My own idea is that there is nothing wrong in this amendment, and if it is satisfactory to anyone who has opposed the bill it is to me.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. ADAMSON. With pleasure.

Mr. FITZGERALD. How does it differ from the provision in the motion to recommit which the gentleman voted against when the bill was under consideration?

Mr. ADAMSON. I think it differs substantially. I have not that motion before me now. I did not regard the amendment as at all necessary until charges and countercharges were made that we repudiated entirely, and it seems to me the friends of the bill simply deem it proper to put this in as a refutation of the charges they had made of the motives and intentions of the repealers—those who favored the bill.

I did not intend to make my speech at this time. I was going to yield to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. SIMS] five minutes, if he desired.

Mr. SIMS. Mr. Speaker, I do not desire to discuss this amendment at any great length. It does not seem to me that it changes the object and purpose of the bill, which is to repeal the exemption clause of the canal act relieving coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls for the use of the canal. That purpose is accomplished even with the Senate amendment attached, as not a word is changed in the House bill. Therefore, as the substantive and real purpose of the bill is accomplished, so far as I am concerned, I am satisfied. I hope those gentlemen who have so often alleged that we were surrendering our rights and interests in the canal to English domination will be satisfied with this amendment, that we are not directly or indirectly surrendering any rights that we have to any foreign country, but that the canal in all respects is just as much an American institution, just as much subject to American control, with the passage of this bill as it ever was.

Believing, as I do, that we never had any right, under our treaties, to discriminate in favor of the vessels of American citizens in the coastwise trade, I do not see how we can reserve a right that we never had, that we are surrendering anything that we never had to surrender. I think this bill places us before the world as a great people, who are willing to do right because it is right, and that in construing treaties after they have been made, we will not contend for a construction, after we have received all the substantial benefits arising from a treaty, so as to give it a meaning and effect that if contended for at the time of its negotiation would have prevented its making altogether. I have never believed for a moment, nor do I believe now, that the Hay-Pauncefote treaty would have been agreed to by Great Britain if it had contained a provision such as the Doremus amendment, which we are now repealing, exempting our coastwise vessels from payment of tolls. As far as I am concerned, I am delighted—too delighted to have a quarrel with one who may differ with me. I think it is as much our duty to repeal bad legislation as to enact good legislation. I think that in the repeal of the legislation creating the Commerce Court and that part of the canal act exempting the coastwise, monopoly-protected vessels of citizens of the United States from the payment of just and reasonable tolls for the use of the canal, we are doing a duty that is equally as high and imperative as in the passage of the tariff bill, the currency bill, or any other good bills that we have passed.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I am so exceedingly gratified with the passage of this repeal bill that I do not care to further discuss it, but prefer to vote. [Applause.]

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, viewing this transaction from the beginning to the end, and with my knowledge of his personality and his mental processes, I would not be surprised if, when this measure reaches the White House, President Wilson should veto it. His attitude upon the question from the start has been clear and without compromise. He held when he came before us on March 5 that Congress had done a grievous wrong, and he asked Congress in so many words to confess by passing a law repealing the former act that Congress had done a sinful thing. He asked Congress to confess, repent, and bring forth fruits meet for repentance. In answer to the President's demand, a majority of the House passed an act which repealed forthwith and in an entirely straightforward manner the former Doremus toll exemption law. That was what the President asked. He asked nothing more and nothing less. He asked that exactly. That the House did. The bill went to the Senate, and after long debate there has been added to it a compromising amendment. The addition of that amendment to the bill in the Senate robbed the measure of the very virtue which the President sought from Congress. For he asked Congress to grant him toll exemption repeal "in ungrudging measure." This amendment is not in ungrudging measure, for we will hear, are already hearing, from both sides of this contention different interpretations of this amendment.

Now, this is an international question and compromise should not enter if gentlemen take the President's view. The President held that the original Doremus Act was in violation of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. There was but one thing, in his view, for Congress to do, and that was to repeal that act without any "ifs" or "ands" or "buts" about it. There can not be, with satisfaction to the President, dubiety here. But the Senate has attempted to add a doubt, by tacking to the bill an amendment which will be read both ways. It does not grant what the President asked. He declared that Congress should reverse its action "without raising the question whether we were right or wrong." The Senate does raise the question and muddles it. Therefore I would not be surprised if the country is treated to the spectacle of the President, who took the trouble to come to Congress personally to make a direct appeal to his party in control of the House—I would not be surprised, I repeat, if the country is treated to the spectacle of the President indignantly rejecting the amended act that will be sent to him.

I believe that the main necessity for the passage of the act as the President gave it to us has passed away. Whatever those "matters of greater delicacy or nearer consequence" were, we never found out. Whatever they were, they are no longer in this equation, so far as anyone knows.

I have never been for this act. I have been against it, as gentlemen know, from the beginning; but if I had been for it from the start, this morning I would be against the Senate amendment. If I were going to stand with the President of the United States for his demand, I would stand with him wholeheartedly or I would not stand with him at all.

I believe that this act will consummate a surrender of American sovereignty over the canal that the Nation will regret for centuries. But there is still another feature to which I desire to allude. This measure will pass here. If it is not vetoed by the President, we are at the end of a long, doleful chapter in this country. Right after the Civil War, after the construction of the transcontinental railroads, the larger railroads practically took possession of a good many States, politically. They dominated the governors, they were privy to legislation, and selfishly privy. They sought successfully to dictate the appointment of a goodly share of the judiciary, and they haunted these halls here in Washington for years, seeking and obtaining special privileges and special advantages against the interests of the people. When as a Nation we attempted to build the great Panama Canal, the chief opponents and antagonists to this great public work were the transcontinental railroads. They fought its construction because they did not want competitive rates over waterways between Atlantic and Pacific points and the lower rates which would follow in the interior of the country. By this act, if it become a law, you give victory to the transcontinental railroads, which have fought the public interests in this matter over a period of 40 years. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK] has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, does the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] wish to use some time?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Yes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield 20 minutes to the gentleman.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Mr. Speaker, I regret exceedingly that it is necessary for me to make a speech on this resolution at this time. I would not do so if I did not feel that the passage of this bill is one of the most unfortunate legislative acts that has ever occurred in the history of our country. [Applause.]

I feel that the future rights, the future interests, and the future prosperity of more than a hundred millions of people are at stake and are being jeopardized by the passage of this resolution.

I am not going to resist the adoption of this amendment, because I regard the amendment as a declaration by the Senate of the United States of the principles that I believe in. But at the same time I recognize the fact that that declaration is not made effective, and it has not been attempted by those who passed it to make it effective, so as to protect the rights of the American people.

A resolution to recommit with instructions to bring in an amendment to this bill was offered in the House at the time of its passage, but that resolution and amendment, although conforming in a large respect to the language used in this amendment, was effective in its results, whereas the present amendment is attached to this bill merely to satisfy the conscience and the fears of certain gentlemen who are not willing to go boldly before the American people and accomplish the result that the membership of this House was willing to accomplish without apology. The amendment offered in the House struck out the second clause of the bill, with what result? The second part of this resolution is the clause that amends the Panama Canal act, wherein that act provides that the President of the United States shall have the power in the future to grant free tolls to American ships in his discretion. The first clause in the act repealed the law giving free tolls to our coastwise ships. The second clause repealed the discretionary power of the President to grant it at any time he wished, and, then, with that repeal an amendment was proposed, declaring our sovereign rights in the canal.

In the first place, we protected and refused to repeal, if that amendment had been adopted, an active power rested in the Chief Executive of the Nation, with the privilege to exercise it at any time he saw fit, with a declaration of right that notwithstanding the fact that we may not charge the tolls at this time, we retain the right and declare the principle that the canal is an American canal over American territory, and that the American Government held and proclaimed the right to exercise complete sovereignty on the Canal Zone.

That was necessary in view of the position that was taken in presenting the resolution to the House. The committee presenting the resolution to the House had declared in their report that they recognized the canal as an international waterway, and that the Government of the United States did not exercise sovereignty over that Canal Zone.

Had the amendment offered in the House been adopted, it would have preserved those rights for the future. This bill not only repeals the free tolls to American shipping to-day that are granted under the law, but takes away from the President the future right to grant these tolls, or to proclaim the right of the United States to grant them in the future if it sees fit. So when the Senate, after two and one-half months' continuous consideration and long debates, sends this bill back to the House without changing the language of the original bill, and makes the declaration "That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain * * * or otherwise to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaties or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same," what does it mean? Is not the original position occupied by the membership of the House that passed the resolution far more honest, far more manly, far more courageous when they refused to adopt a declaration of this kind and stood on the bald proposition of the committee that they did not believe that we had the right to discriminate in favor of our shipping, and that we would not proclaim our right to the sovereignty over the Canal Zone——

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Just in one moment. Rather than the position taken by the Senate, that concedes everything that was in the House bill, cuts off our rights in the Canal Zone without recall, and then, to satisfy their consciences or their fears, puts an apology in the bill as a proviso, throwing it out, possibly, as a sop to some of us who do not believe in the proposition, with the idea that we are sufficiently gullible to be attracted by a negative declaration of this kind?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman from Alabama yield to the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I do.

Mr. MADDEN. The gentleman stated, if I heard him aright a moment ago, that the House, in the bill when it passed the House, refused to enact such a declaration as the Senate has enacted. Was there any such declaration before the House, or was there before the House simply a stump speech contained in the motion to recommit?

Mr. UNDERWOOD. Oh, no. The gentleman should read the RECORD.

Mr. MADDEN. I have looked into the RECORD, and I was here.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The motion to recommit the bill with instructions was offered, and the House voted on that motion to recommit. Of course, the gentleman may say that that proposition was not before the House, but the House had the opportunity to recommit by a vote on the question.

I do not propose to vote against this amendment. The declaration in this amendment is what I contended for when the bill was before the House. The declaration in this amendment, if it is correct in principle, should make the Congress pause and hesitate before it surrenders, by the repeal of the free-tolls provision of the Panama Canal act, the right of the people of the United States to exercise sovereignty on the Canal Zone. Of course, so far as I am concerned, I believe in a discrimination in favor of American ships to build up our merchant marine, but I regard that as much the less important of the questions involved here.

I said in the beginning, and I say now, that this question is of such momentous importance to the American people that it should never have been legislated on directly by the Congress. The rights of two nations are involved. The rights of our people against the peoples of the world are involved. It is not only a question of developing our own shipping, a question of discriminating by a few dollars of canal tolls in favor of our shipping, but the question presents itself to this country as to whether or not the concession that we are making in this bill may in the future embarrass us as to our rights in time of war. That is the serious question. Great Britain proposed to arbitrate the questions existing between the two countries. Although I am not in favor of the repeal, I recognize that the question is not a matter to be determined by war, but is a question that the diplomats of the two countries must reach an agreement about, either directly or through arbitration; and if we were going to make this change, if it was necessary to make this change, there was nothing that stood in the way of the Government of our country accepting a proposition to arbitrate; and if we had accepted arbitration instead of surrender—an un-American surrender at that—and the arbitrators had said that we had no right to remit tolls in going through this canal, then in that same diplomatic understanding and contract, or in that same arbitration, we could have had the rights of our warships established for all time to come, so that those questions might not arise to embarrass our country in the future, possibly in times of great stress and great peril to our country, as it is left in the enactment of this bill, without determination, without diplomatic understanding between the two countries involved in the Hay-Pauncefote treaty or the other nations of the world.

Therefore I regard the passage of this act as a matter of unwisdom on the part of the two Houses, as a dangerous surrender of American rights, as a proposition that ought never to be considered in these Houses, and that should be sent to the court of arbitration to-day. But recognizing the fact that I do not voice the sentiments of a majority of this House, and believing, as I always do, that the will of the majority should be written on the statute books, I do not propose to attempt to delay the passage of the act, nor shall I vote against this amendment that, as I said a while ago, makes a declaration of principle similar to the contentions that I made when the bill was before the House, but yet makes the declaration of principle in a negative way, so that it could not be effective in the future—could not be of benefit to us in a court of arbitration in the future—because our act in surrendering our rights will be the point that is weighed in the future in determining the interpretation of this act, and not the accompanying declaration as to why we passed the act. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] desire me to yield him time?

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Yes; I should like five minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Minnesota five minutes.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, I can vote for this amendment without hesitation and without stuttering. When the original measure was before the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce two years ago, some of us then stated that we did not desire to indorse this important matter, so with such a provision inserted in the measure for the repeal of free tolls, we will be very glad to support it. We did not desire that the United States should be precluded in any way or at any time from asserting any right which it may have under both of these treaties, where the welfare of our people in the future might be in question. We offered to do the same thing this time when the present bill was under consideration by the committee. That offer was refused. So that the matter comes before this House now practically in the same situation in which we have proposed it should come whenever the question has been presented to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. We did not desire to preclude or prejudge this question as to the rights of the United States under these treaties. My own views are clear and I have expressed them at length before this House. But I realize the great differences of opinion and the eminent men who differ with my judgment. So I am willing to leave the matter open, confident that my views as to the international, legal, and economic differences will be increasingly satisfactory to our people. We all realized that it was too important to be decided now for all future time, to settle or attempt to foreclose this question. It ought not to be done. We should not presume with a matter of such importance. The original bill did not do it. The amendment adopted by the Senate does not change the situation at all, but leaves the whole question wide open for future discussion and conclusions. The Senate amendment simply provides that nothing in this bill shall be construed to do either of two things: First, to settle or determine the right of the United States under these treaties to discriminate in favor of the vessels of its own citizens in the use of the canal; secondly, that nothing in this act shall be construed to limit or affect the sovereignty of the United States as acquired in the treaties in the use of the canal. Those are exactly the two propositions which I have outlined to the House twice before on bills of this kind. For my part, believe that the United States has a clear right to classify under the provisions of both of those treaties. We do classify vessels under the act as it stands, but the classification must be fair, just, natural, and reasonable. The treaties clearly state, to my mind, such an exemption as was contained in the act two years ago is not a fair classification, and was one we agreed should not be made. We can and probably will classify in the future, but that classification must not violate the express provisions of two international agreements which we have made, as has been so extensively debated in the last three months. I believe that the classification in the bill did violate the provisions of both of the treaties which concerned the canal, and if any nation attempts a similar course of action against us under a treaty with similar terms, we would bitterly and strongly resent it.

Again, those who believe in the passage of this act believe that the bill itself, as it passed the House and as it now stands, does not interfere in any way with the sovereign rights of the United States in the use, occupation, and control of the Panama Canal.

I wish to express my emphatic difference of opinion with the gentleman from Alabama in his statement—or almost offer—to arbitrate the use of that canal so far as our public and war vessels are concerned. I do not believe the United States ought ever to arbitrate the right to use its own territory or property wherever it has any sovereign interest, even though it be limited for a specific purpose as it is concerning this canal. We ought never to arbitrate the right to use our own domain for our own sovereign purposes. [Applause.] I believe that the bill as it left the House, and the bill as it now stands, gives the United States the right of perfect sovereignty, of perfect control, of perfect protection over the Panama Canal in war and peace for all purposes of constructive use and control and protection of the canal for such purposes. We can pass any sort of public vessels we see fit at any time and anywhere we see fit to do it without let or hindrance of anybody, and I am not willing, now or at any time in the future, to arbitrate that question. [Applause.] But I am willing to arbitrate the question under controversy as to whether it is our duty to grant to British and Panaman private vessels the same right and treatment which we do to our own private vessels of the same class. That is the question which can and may be arbitrated.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Just one minute more.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman one more minute.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. The sole question for us to consider is, Is it best now to repeal that law creating a worse classification, clearly violating international and economic rights, with this waiver of any intention to affect all rights as to sovereignty and future action as to treatment of our vessels under the treaties? Its only effect, as I take it, as it stands before this House for present action, is to state that it is not wise to classify or determine at this time or have no intention now to finally construe our treaties as to what ought to be done in the future. My own judgment is clear, but I am willing to debate at some more auspicious time as to the proper course of action. For that reason I shall vote to concur in the amendment of the Senate. [Applause.]

Mr. TAGGART. Mr. Speaker, I said in my remarks on the tolls bill, when it was first presented to the House, that the serious question was not a question of revenue, or expediency, or an economic question. The form in which the bill was presented by the committee was such that it involved a construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, which, in a measure, surrendered a share of the sovereignty of the Panama Canal to a foreign power. I could not vote for that, and I did not vote for it. With this amendment, however, it is converted solely into an economic question, and I stand with the President of the United States on any and all economic questions. It is right to charge everybody the same price for exactly the same use of the same property. There is no disputing the justice of that phase of it. [Applause.] The President, in his message, did not ask Congress to surrender any right of the United States to the Panama Canal. If the amendment that has been adopted by the Senate had been incorporated in the bill that was brought before the House there would have been no difficulty about the repeal of the tolls exemption. Simple repeal, without any qualification, would be such a solemn construction of the treaty by the Congress as would confirm the claim of the British Government to have a share in dictating the use that the United States should make of the canal with respect to ships owned by citizens of the United States. When it was first brought before the House a motion was made to recommit the bill, with directions to the committee to add an amendment that would include substantially the language contained in the amendment adopted by the Senate. I voted to order the committee to incorporate such an amendment in the bill. The House failed so to instruct the committee and the bill went to the Senate without any qualification. This is what caused the unprecedented debate in the Senate. The amendment as adopted by the Senate is as follows:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain, ratified February 21, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama, ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise, to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls or passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaty, or otherwise, with the respect to the sovereignty over or the ownership, control, and management of said canal, and the regulation of the conditions or charges of traffic through the same.

The collection of tolls from coastwise vessels is really a comparatively small matter. The amount realized will not be great. I am wholly unable to agree with those who consider exemption from tolls as a subsidy to the owners of vessels. Congress has sole power to regulate commerce among the States; it can authorize the Interstate Commerce Commission to fix the rates charged for coastwise trade by the owners of American vessels, and in doing so the commission can and will take into consideration the cost of passing through the canal or the exemption from cost of passing through the canal. The benefit would really be derived by the people of the two coasts. The people in the middle portion of the United States have no interest in this matter at all, except the securing of whatever revenue may be derived from the tolls. Whether there are tolls or no tolls, it will not affect railroad freight rates that are fixed by the regulations of the Interstate Commerce Commission.

No one now seriously claims that the exemption law passed in 1912 violated the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. That position has been abandoned by the ablest men in the House and Senate. A moment's reflection would convince anyone who has read the Constitution that we could not by treaty delegate to any power any share of the right to regulate commerce among the States. Congress has that exclusive power of regulation, and when it is exercised by Congress even a State of the Union has no power over the subject whatsoever. A foreign nation claimed a right that a State of the Union could not assert, and no one in this Government can have authority to bargain away the right vested in Congress to regulate interstate commerce. When the treaty was made we did not have the sovereignty of the soil on which the canal is constructed. The treaty reads as if we were going to build a canal on territory not controlled by the United States. When we secured the territory the treaty had a new meaning, and that meaning is that the United States has quite as complete power over its domestic affairs in the Canal Zone as it has anywhere else under its jurisdiction.

I am glad to be able to agree with the majority of the Democrats in the House. Their judgment and the judgment of the President on all domestic and economic questions is sufficient for me, and it gives me great pleasure to know that we have not only provided the revenue that may be derived from charging tolls in the Panama Canal, but that we have jealously guarded the dignity and sovereignty of the United States by agreeing to the amendment that was adopted in the Senate. The language of this amendment is distinct and clear, and leaves no doubt in the mind of anyone that by changing the law with respect to the collection of tolls in the Panama Canal we have not surrendered any right or claim of right on the part of the United States.

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from South Dakota [Mr. DILLON].

Mr. DILLON. Mr. Speaker, in speaking upon this bill when it was pending in the House, I said:

If the advocates of the measure succeed in passing this bill, it will for all time foreclose the valuable rights we have in this great waterway. As an economic proposition, I would support this measure, and see no reason why the vessels engaged in coastwise trade should not pay just tolls for passing through the canal. But I am not willing to interpret this treaty in favor of the English contention, and thus for all time deprive the American people of making such regulations as they see fit for their vessels engaged in coastwise trade.

I was then, and am now, opposed to free tolls. I was then, and am now, opposed to the English interpretation of the treaty. The Senate amendment will preserve our sovereign rights in the great waterway. It gives us freedom for future action and it will leave open the interpretation of the treaty.

I stand for the rights of the American people in the $400,000,000 canal and against the surrender of our rights in our own property. I shall vote to require the coastwise vessels to pay their share of the expenses in maintaining the waterway. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. GORMAN].

Mr. GORMAN. Mr. Speaker, when the bill to repeal the toll-exemption clause on the Panama Canal act was before the House in March an amendment was offered which, if adopted, would accomplish all that the Senate amendment accomplishes, but it would do so in clear, ringing, unequivocal terms. I voted for the amendment which was offered in the House, and on that amendment being rejected I voted against the bill. I believed then, as I believe now, that the exemption of ships engaged in the coastwise trade from payment of toll is an economic error.

The cost of maintaining the canal will in all probability far exceed the revenue derived therefrom for many years to come, and whatever deficiency accrues each year must be made up by the American people. For the purpose of making the burden of maintaining the canal as light as possible on the people of the United States every ship except the ships of war of the United States should pay toll for the use of the Panama Canal.

The repeal of the exemption was urged by the President and recommended by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce for the principal reason that the exemption of American coastwise ships from payment of toll was a clear violation of our treaty with Great Britain. I can not subscribe to this view. As I read the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, in the light of the history of the negotiations which preceded it, the conclusion has forced itself upon me that we have the right under that treaty to grant exemption from toll or to grant a preferential toll to the ships of commerce of the United States in passing through the Panama Canal.

The right to do this is one of the attributes of sovereignty. Our rights in the Panama Canal Zone are sovereign. Administrations which preceded the present one took the position that exemption of American shipping from payment of tolls was not a violation of the treaty, and in diplomatic negotiations with the British Government that attitude was maintained and a willingness to submit the question to arbitration was expressed.

Great Britain has the same right to interpret the treaty that our Government has; and when those interpretations do not agree, a submission of the disputed points to arbitration is the logical thing to do.

As I view it, if our treaty with Great Britain obligates us to charge tolls for American ships, the integrity of our sovereignty over the Panama Canal is to that extent impaired. If the repeal of the exemption clause as it passed the House was enacted into law without amendment, it would very properly be held to be an interpretation of the treaty by the American Government in harmony with the British view. The amendment adopted in the Senate negatives that view of our legislative act and preserves the question of the interpretation of the treaty for future diplomatic negotiation or arbitration.

While I believe a wise economic policy at this time requires that all American ships passing through the canal should pay tolls, there may come a time when this will not be so. Heretofore we have been exporters of raw materials, and our raw material is being carried in foreign ships to foreign shores, and there it is being manufactured into finished products and brought back in the same foreign ships and sold to American consumers or exchanged for more of the raw material from our mines, quarries, fields, and forests.

But the time is not far distant when we will cease to be the purveyors of raw materials. We must enter the domain of manufacture not only to supply our own needs, but we must enter the markets of the world with the finished products of American labor. Japan is now our vigorous commercial rival on the Pacific, and when China has thoroughly aroused from her sleep of centuries and enters vigorously, as she shortly will, into competition with Europe and America for her full share of world commerce, the question whether we can as a matter of sovereign right exempt our ships from payment of toll unhampered by treaty obligation will become a very important one. We must eventually build up an American merchant marine. The need for it is becoming more apparent every day. The time may come when American manufacturers and American shipowners will demand, and the American Government realize, an economic necessity for the exemption of American commerce from toll charges in passing through the canal.

World competition will, in my judgment, necessitate such a policy. The repeal act as it passed the House would preclude the adoption of such a policy at any time in the future. It would have the effect of foreclosing against ourselves the right to claim exemption to American shipping from toll charges, because such a policy would be in violation of our treaty obligations.

The amendment adopted in the Senate leaves the question of treaty interpretation open for future negotiations and preserves the right to assert at any time in the future what I conceive to be the American view of the treaty. For these reasons I shall cheerfully support the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the gentleman from Georgia that he ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have the privilege of extending remarks in the RECORD on this bill.

Mr. ADAMSON. I am perfectly willing to do that, and I ask unanimous consent that all gentlemen have leave to extend remarks on this subject for five legislative days.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Unanimous consent is asked that all Members be given leave to print remarks on this subject for five legislative days. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. ADAMSON. Will the gentleman from Illinois proceed now to use some of his time?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER].

Mr. GARDNER. Mr. Speaker, if the Lord Almighty could have foreseen all the talk that is being expended on this tolls question, He would have provided the canal himself when He made the world. The gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. STEVENS] says that he can vote for the amendment without stuttering. I should think any man, woman, or child in the United States could vote for it without stuttering, but I do not see how anybody could vote for it without smiling. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says that it is a sop to Cerberus. Yes, it is a sop to Cerberus, but a counterfeit sop, for it means nothing whatever. It declares that we do not abandon any right which we do not abandon, that we hold on to everything which we hold on to. Everybody can agree to that—that we are not to be considered as having abandoned any right. Whether we adopt this amendment or not does not in the least affect our right at some future time to exempt coastwise vessels from the payment of tolls. If we have the right to discriminate now, this amendment does not add to it. If we have not the right to discriminate now, this amendment does not give it. I quite agree that this bill is not to be construed as abandoning something, but it is to be construed as repealing a law which violated a contract which we had made with Great Britain and which we were in honor bound to carry out. I admire the President of the United States for his courage in disregarding his party platform when his party platform indorsed a violation of our obligation. We made the bargain for better or for worse and we ought to stick to it. That is all there is in the question.

What ails us? Are we afraid that some demagogue will go out in the country and say that we are bought up by the railroads? Or that we are toadying to Great Britain? Is that what we are afraid of? Is that what sets our knees trembling, that we throw this sop to Cerberus? Why, anyone who knows anything about the question knows that any demagogue who says we are flunkys or are bought is a muckraker, and that any demagogue who believes it is a fit tenant for a lunatic asylum.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield to the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. HUGHES].

Mr. HUGHES of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, when this bill was being voted on, March 31, I was paired with the gentleman from Alabama, Mr. TAYLOR. There has been some criticism of my vote of "present" on that occasion, and I want at this time to explain that vote. I voted "no" on the first roll call, and my attention was called to my pair. I was unable to locate the gentleman, although I endeavored to do so by wire, so as to arrange with him to let me vote "no," and I had to recognize the pair under the rules and change my vote to "present." The RECORD did not show my first vote. It just shows that I voted "present." I was opposed to the bill all the time, and will vote against it, even with the Senate amendment now in it. [Applause.]

Mr. BURKE of South Dakota. Mr. Speaker, when the original canal act was considered in the House, in May, 1912, I was absent from Washington, detained on account of illness. If I had been present at the time the provision for free tolls, known as the Doremus amendment, was voted upon, I would have voted against it. One of the reasons that would have directed my action in so voting is because I am not in favor of allowing coastwise ships or any other ships to pass through the canal free. It has cost the United States nearly $400,000,000 to construct it, and it will cost a large sum annually to fortify, maintain, and operate it, and whoever uses the canal, built at the expense of all the people of this country, should be compelled to pay tolls. No commerce, whether coastwise or otherwise, ought to be exempted, in my opinion.

When the bill for the repeal of the free-tolls provision of the canal act was considered in the present Congress I regretted that the majority saw fit to adopt an ironclad and drastic rule so that no amendment could be offered to it, because I could not bring myself to vote for it in the form in which it was presented, for the reason that I did not wish to subscribe to the conclusion of the President, who declared in his message that he considered the free-tolls provision of the canal act in plain contravention of the treaty with Great Britain. If he had based his reasons for the repeal upon the other statement of his message, that he considered the exemption of coastwise shipping from the payment of tolls "a mistaken economic policy," I would have gladly voted for it without any amendment. It not being possible, by reason of the rule adopted, to even offer an amendment, I was compelled to vote against the passage of the bill, and I would do so again under the same circumstances. I did vote for the motion that was offered to recommit the bill with instructions to add the following amendment:

Strike out all of section 2 and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"SEC. 2. And Congress hereby declares that in its judgment the United States, which at enormous cost has built and fortified and owns the canal without any expectation of pecuniary profit to itself from its ownership, and which has the duty and expense of protecting the canal with its troops and warships and by proper sanitation, may, as the owner and defender of the canal and by virtue of its rights of sovereignty, rightfully provide preferential tolls or no tolls for its own war vessels and for vessels of commerce belonging to it or its citizens flying its flag, so long as the conditions and charges of traffic established by it for vessels of foreign nations are just and equitable, and may rightfully in time of war, as well as in time of peace, maintain its Army and Navy in the Canal Zone, including all necessary warlike materials, both for defense and offense, and may rightfully provide preferential tolls or no tolls for the vessels of the Republic of Panama, from which Republic the right to construct the canal was obtained, and as authorized in the act of June 28, 1902, providing for the construction of the canal."

If the motion to recommit had prevailed and the amendment had been incorporated in the bill, I would have voted for its passage. Now that the measure has been returned to the House with an amendment which, in effect, declares that the passage of the act will not be considered as precluding the United States from exercising absolute sovereignty over the canal and doing anything that it may wish to do with relation to allowing its own ships or the ships of its citizens to pass through it without the payment of any tolls, if it so desires, I am going to vote for the motion to concur made by the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON].

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to yield to the gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. DUPRÉ].

Mr. DUPRÉ. Mr. Speaker, I am in accord with the statement made by the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD]. I agree thoroughly with the characterization that he has made of the amendment, but I disagree with him as to the course that ought to be pursued. The logic of his argument drives me to a different conclusion. I shall vote not to concur in the Senate amendment. [Applause.]

Mr. MANN. I yield four minutes to the gentleman from Wyoming [Mr. MONDELL].

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, from the standpoint of economic policy I have not been in favor of exempting American ships passing through the Panama Canal from the payment of tolls, and had the matter of repeal been presented to us simply as an economic proposition I should have voted for it. But the President of the United States, in demanding the repeal of the exemption clause, asked us to do it on the ground that it was in conflict with our treaty rights; that whether it was or not we should surrender without question; and that we should do it in an ungrudging measure in support of a foreign policy that no one clearly understands and no one attempts to defend.

The Democratic side of the House has been coerced, contrary to the will and view of a majority of the Members, who voted as the President desired them to do. In the Senate the provision now before us was adopted. It is not a compromise; it is a straddle, intentionally ambiguous, apparently intentionally so framed that any interpretation may be given to it that suits the time, the occasion, or the person interpreting the provision. If it had been a clear, ringing statement that we maintained our sovereignty and rights in the canal and that we repealed the free-tolls provision on economic grounds, then it could have received the support ungrudgingly of all of us who are against free tolls as a matter of policy.

As it is, the bill is better with this provision than as it passed the House, for at least it does pretend to preserve and reserve the question as to whether or not we may have the right to make and provide for preferential tolls. With this amendment, however, the act viewed in the light of the President's demand for repeal is a cowardly surrender of American rights. We have in this measure another illustration of how the Democratic majority bends to the arrogant and imperious will of the occupant of the White House, and how legislation in this Congress is not passed on the judgment of the majority in either branch, but under the mandate of the unbending will of the Executive. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield seven and a half minutes to the gentleman from New Jersey [Mr. BAKER].

Mr. BAKER. Mr. Speaker, does anybody here believe that the United States acquired any rights on the subject of free tolls by the passage of the act of 1912? If we did not acquire any rights by the passage of that act, then we waive or lose none by repealing the act. We are menaced here with the lurid statement that Great Britain is dictating to us our domestic policies. Most of us are skeptical as to that, for England is reputed to have gone out of the dictating business in American affairs 100 years ago come January next [applause], for reasons well emphasized on the marshes below the good city of New Orleans at a concert directed by that masterful patriot, Andrew Jackson, and those reasons have been growing stronger with the progress of events ever since that impressive day.

There is another good reason why England does not seek to dictate to her American cousins, and that reason is because she is extremely wise, so wise that she desires to be in good accord with the most potential and resourceful nation of modern times. [Applause.] England knows that the Americans can not be compelled to do anything, not even to drink tea, subject to a stamp tax. England has as good a right to interpret her conventions with us as we have to interpret our conventions with her, and if we can not agree upon our mutual conventions, either has the right to demand arbitration of the points upon which we differ. No sovereign people is under obligations to abide by the action of another sovereign people that it believes is acting in bad faith any more than a private individual is bound to stand by a contract in which the other party to that contract has committed a breach of the contract. This is a plain question with us. It is not a matter of foreign dictation. It is a matter of our rights as a business people, as between us and the Government of the United States. I hold, as I believe most here do, that this free-toll act is the hair of the same dog that bit us in the protective prohibitive tariff fad. It is sprung from the same bacillus, cultivated and fulminated in the same way, and as an economic measure it is the worst rot that ever infested our fiscal conceptions, and an outrage upon the rights of the men who earn their bread in the sweat of their face, and a reflection upon their intelligence to put up such a discriminating proposition as the free-tolls act. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield five minutes to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT].

Mr. LENROOT. Mr. Speaker, the adoption of this amendment will leave the construction of the Hay-Pauncefote treaty exactly where it was before the Panama Canal act was passed. It leaves the Congress of the United States absolutely free in the future to pass a bill exempting coastwise traffic from tolls if it may then see fit. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] has stated that while this amendment declares a principle it accomplishes nothing. Mr. Speaker, with this great difference of opinion that prevails with reference to the construction of the treaty, why should the Congress of the United States be compelled in the passage of this act to construe this treaty and forever bind the United States? A great many Members in both Houses favor the passage of this bill on economic grounds. Others favor it upon their construction of the treaty. Why should not those two groups join, and why should they bind the Government in the future with reference to its construction? But the gentleman from Alabama says that notwithstanding the adoption of this amendment the bill does involve a surrender of our rights, and he says that is because section 2 still remains in the bill, which gave the President discretion to impose tolls or not, as he saw fit. Mr. Speaker, the right of the United States with reference to the construction of this treaty, with reference to tolls through the canal, with this amendment adopted, will unquestionably still remain with Congress to deal with as it sees fit. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says it has taken away the discretionary power of the President of the United States to exempt our coastwise traffic from tolls. I am willing to admit that in one sense of the word the gentleman from Alabama is right, but in these Democratic days it has not even done that.

Instead of the President of the United States issuing an order and filing it with the proper department exempting these vessels from tolls, if he desires to do so, he will simply have to give an order to the Congress of the United States to exempt them, and it will exempt them if he orders it done. But while it may be true that taking away the power of the President with respect to this question takes away the power of Congress now, it will not always be so, Mr. Speaker, for the time will again come when the Congress of the United States will be independent of the Executive of the United States; and when that time comes this reservation may be of value, and I am glad of the opportunity of voting for this amendment, which will leave this question open, although I strongly believe that this exemption is a violation of the treaty. I believe it would be wise to leave that question open for the future, when the people of the United States have had time and opportunity to calmly and soberly reflect on this proposition, not swayed by passion and prejudice, as they have been during the past six months, and a future Congress of the United States will then be in much better position to render that deliberate judgment that will be based upon the actual merits of the case, and settle the question for all time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I yield three minutes to the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY].

Mr. HUMPHREY of Washington. Mr. Speaker, since this bill was before us for consideration we have been informed by the chairman of the Senate Committee on Foreign Affairs that no nation is protesting or has protested against the present law—the protests come alone from home—and as the transcontinental railroads are the only interests in this country that will be benefited by the repeal of this law, I do not think the people of the country will have great difficulty in finding the influence that persuaded the President to repudiate his platform and to change the position that he took when a candidate. I shall vote for this amendment because it contains some glimmer of patriotism. I shall vote for it because while it shows that Congress does the bidding of the President, yet it is not done ungrudgingly. I shall vote for it because it shows that this Congress still has some sense of shame in making this surrender. I shall vote for it because it will leave the matter open for future consideration as a political issue; because it will leave to the people the question of the future control of the canal. And on the 4th day of March, 1917, I predict that a Republican President will call a special session and that a Republican Congress will immediately proceed to wipe this un-American monstrosity from the statute books. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I yield two minutes to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. HULINGS].

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker, I regard this amendment as side-stepping the real question at issue—a mere excuse, a mere shield, by which men who feel obliged to obey the Executive mandate, and yet who feel in their hearts that the demand is a trespass upon the rights of America, seek in this amendment a shield and an excuse. I am opposed to this entire proposition. I believe it is a good time for Americans to stand up [applause], and, for my part, I should prefer to see the American Congress abrogate the Hay-Pauncefote treaty entirely, and that America should stand upon her rights as the builder and owner of the Panama Canal, giving notice to all the world that as sovereign she has the right to do with the canal as she pleases, and that, out of generosity and as a matter of grace, she would give the use of that canal to the vessels of any nation at peace with the United States on fair and equitable terms, so that in time of war she would control the great strategic position which the canal would be, and in time of peace it would aid her in building up her merchant marine by remission of tolls or otherwise, as she royally pleased. That is what that canal was built for. Except for those reasons, the canal never would have been built.

Whatever we may think of subsidies, England has no right to object to the remission of tolls by the United States so long as England subsidizes her ships. The great weight of the argument in the great debate for the last three months clearly shows that the exemption of tolls is no violation of the treaty; but, in order that the whole world might understand just where we are, I would abrogate that treaty, which was made under conditions not now existing and conditions to which the treaty does not equitably or rationally apply.

England gave up nothing in that treaty. All that England really sought for was that the United States, in building the canal and making the regulations for its use, should let all other countries use the canal on fair and equitable terms.

The plea that the remission of tolls is a subsidy to the shipping monopoly is the sheerest nonsense. In the first place, there is no shipping monopoly, for no person violating the antitrust law can send a ship through the canal, and no railroad-owned ship can pass through; and, in the second place, if the remission of tolls is a subsidy and, as such, such a frightful breach of Democratic traditions as to give the Democrats abdominal spasms, then every appropriation for the improvement of rivers and harbors is also a subsidy to the shipping interests; and what is the 5 per cent rebate on duties on goods imported in American ships which all the Democrats in the House voted into the recently-enacted tariff bill?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Does the gentleman from Illinois wish to use some time?

Mr. MANN. I yield three minutes to the gentleman from California [Mr. KAHN].

Mr. KAHN. Mr. Speaker, I believe that this amendment is but the throwing of another apple of discord into the Panama Canal act. It is evident, after listening to the brief discussion thereon this morning on this floor, and after reading the debates thereon in the Senate, that there is a wide difference of opinion as to what the amendment really means or does. If at the time the Hay-Pauncefote treaty was ratified it could have been realized that there would have been so much difficulty about its exact construction, there is no doubt in my mind but that the Senate at that time would have made its language so clear and unequivocable that there could have been no question as to our right to exempt American vessels from the payment of tolls. To some minds there is a question as to our rights under that treaty as it stands. I prefer to resolve the doubt in favor of my own country. Mr. Speaker, it seems we have come upon a time in the history of our country when a weak and pliant Legislature is willing to carry out the behest of the Chief Executive, right or wrong. That, to my mind, is a serious condition of affairs. In the annals of nations we find that such a condition is destructive of republican government. No country can continue free where the legislature abdicates its authority and power and yields it to the head of the nation, right or wrong.

Mr. Speaker, history is repeating itself. The story of the digging of the Panama Canal and the incidents connected with its completion and opening to the commerce of the world are entirely on a parallel with the history of the digging and the incidents connected with the completion and opening of the Suez Canal. England did not put forth an iota of effort to complete the Suez Canal. On the contrary, she put every possible obstacle in the way of De Lesseps and his company so as to hinder and delay the work. Through her diplomats at Constantinople she succeeded in having the concession to the French company denied for a number of years. She induced the Viceroy of Egypt to withdraw the labor he had agreed to furnish the company. Subsequently Egypt had to pay the price in the shape of damages awarded to the canal company in the amount of about $16,000,000. From the first, however, England has been the principal beneficiary of the construction of the Suez Canal. A few years after its completion she acquired, by purchase, the stock of the Khedive, Ismail Pasha, and has dominated it ever since.

She did not exert an iota of effort or contribute a single dollar for the construction of the Panama Canal, and yet to-day she is demanding equal rights with us in that great waterway. Egypt contributed over $50,000,000 for the construction of the Suez Canal. Egypt alone of all nations to-day receives practically no benefit from the construction of that great waterway. English diplomacy was largely responsible for this great cost to the Government of Egypt. English diplomacy has reaped the reward for the people of Great Britain of that expenditure by Egypt of over $50,000,000; and now, in 1914, through English diplomacy, the United States, after the expenditure of practically $400,000,000 for the construction of the Panama Canal, is to receive no benefit whatever for her own vessels engaged in coastwise trade or in any other trade. Thus, on the two occasions of the changing of the world's routes of commerce by reason of the construction of great artificial waterways, England, without taking a single chance, without a particle of effort or exertion on the part of her people in that construction, has reaped the largest rewards through the efforts and exertions of other nations. No wonder her diplomats are jubilant. No wonder her newspapers rejoice.

The people of the United States when given an opportunity to express their views upon this question will do so in such emphatic terms that the Democratic majority of this House will thoroughly realize the blunder they have committed in standing for this un-American repeal, right or wrong.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Eighteen minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. How much has the other side?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Seven minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have one other speaker beside myself. I yield to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS] seven and one-half minutes.

Mr. GLASS. Mr. Speaker, it would be manifestly impossible to discuss the issues involved in this proposition in the limited time assigned me by the chairman of the committee.

Mr. ADAMSON. I will give the gentleman the other half minute and make it eight minutes.

Mr. GLASS. I scarcely will require that much time, Mr. Speaker, for I simply want to ask permission to extend my remarks, if it is not already granted. I want to do that in order that I may put upon the record the resentment which I individually experience at the outrageous assaults that have been made upon the President of the United States by Members on the other side of the House, and in order that I may express the indignation which some of us feel against the leaders of this side of the House who have repeatedly aspersed their own colleagues because the latter would not follow them into the camp of the Republican Party in advocacy of a distinctive Republican doctrine. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I desire to make it plainly known that I stand with the President of the United States in his opinion that the act sought to be repealed is a violation of our treaty obligations; that I stand with the President of the United States in his contention that it is an economic wrong to exempt these vessels; that I stand with the President of the United States, and with the Democratic Party from its very foundation, in opposition to governmental subsidies and to special privileges of all descriptions. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Moreover, I want to take this momentary opportunity to say briefly, but pointedly, to those leaders of the Democratic Party who feel that a solemn obligation rests upon them to contend against the President and their party in this matter that they should carry their opposition into the next elections, and I venture particularly to say to the distinguished leader from Alabama, who has not contented himself with opposing his party upon this floor, but has gone into hostile newspapers and aspersed his party colleagues, that if he will come to my district in Virginia I will cheerfully engage him upon the hustings and make it clear that I am not among those who have apologies to make for their attitude upon this question. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I invite him there to propagate and defend this totally vicious Republican dogma of ship subsidy and special privilege to a favored monopoly. [Applause on the Democratic side.]

Mr. Speaker, I think you will search the political records of this country without avail; you will pursue the beaten tracks of political procedure in vain to find such a spectacle as we have recently witnessed here on this canal-tolls issue—the leaders of the Democratic majority deserting their party and standing shoulder to shoulder with Republican leaders against a Democratic President. And yet, in the face of that spectacle, such was the instinctive patriotism and tested fidelity of the Democratic rank and file that, without visible leadership here, they marched to the firing line and whipped the whole outfit, including the leaders on both sides.

All of this talk of the gentleman from Nebraska about the President of the United States vetoing this bill amounts to nothing; the gentleman knows the President will do nothing of the kind.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman ought not to refer to me as from Nebraska. Nebraska is a great State, but I am from Kansas.

Mr. GLASS. Well, I will apologize for the inadvertence.

Mr. MURDOCK. I want to say further to the gentleman from Virginia that he does not know what the President is going to do, and he will be in an awful fix if the President vetoes this bill.

Mr. GLASS. Yes; I do know what the President is going to do, because I have perception enough to understand that this Senate amendment does not conflict in any respect with the President's message to Congress or with the attitude of the President on the question of repeal.

Mr. MURDOCK. Is this amendment what the gentleman would call "ungrudging measure"?

Mr. GLASS. Oh, no; the proceeding on this bill has not been "ungrudging" either in this Chamber or the other. It has been contumacious in both. And I want to say right here that I think the next campaign in this country ought to be a propaganda to compel the Senate of the United States to legislate and to abandon its incorrigible habit of talking so much. [Applause.] This Senate amendment, Mr. Speaker, after seven weeks of polemics, does not amount to a thrip. It might as well have been adopted instantly. My understanding is that, while the President sees no use of it, he acquiesces in it. There is nothing in the Senate amendment that controverts the position first distinctly assumed by the President, nor that in any way takes issue with the original action of the House.

The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. UNDERWOOD] says the Senate amendment declares a principle. What principle does it declare? I fail to find that it declares anything, affirmatively or negatively, except that which everyone is willing to assert, and that is that if we have any rights under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty to exempt coastwise vessels, or to make any other discrimination, we do not intend that this repealing act shall be interpreted as surrendering those rights.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman wants to be fair, and the gentleman has made a very plain statement; but he forgets that the President said we ought to reverse our action without raising the question whether we were right or wrong.

Mr. GLASS. And I agree with the President that we ought to reverse our action, whether it was right or wrong, when all the nations of the earth think we were wrong.

Mr. MURDOCK. And you have tied a string to it as big as a ship's cable.

Mr. GLASS. I did not vote for exemption in the first place, and I am voting to repeal exemption now. I think it is the familiar Republican dogma of special privilege. And when you ask me if I repudiate the Democratic platform on this particular question, I say yes; I repudiate the Democratic platform and I reprobate the men who silently put that Republican heresy in a Democratic platform. [Applause.] I stand to that other declaration in the same platform which pronounces against this sneaking departure from the party faith.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. GLASS. Yes.

Mr. RAGSDALE. Does the gentleman include in his repudiation the Secretary of State, who wrote the platform?

Mr. GLASS. I repudiate the political attitude of anybody who deliberately subscribes to this heresy. But the Secretary of State did not write it, and has not subscribed to it, unless he has changed his opinion since night before last. Yes; I repudiate the men who silently put this "joker" in the Democratic platform at Baltimore. I think they ought to be subjected to the plain censure of the American people for writing into a Democratic platform a heresy that is an affront to the traditional and immemorial declarations of party faith, and that is at variance with another declaration of the very same platform on the very same subject. [Applause.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I shall not undertake to answer in behalf of those Democrats who have been so roundly denounced by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GLASS], whom we all know, whether in caucus or the House, has for his principal asset bitter resentment and indignation, never speaking calmly on any subject, but always dealing in bitter denunciation of somebody, somewhere, and the nearer the person is the better it suits him.

Mr. Speaker, the canal-toll bill passed the House and it has passed the Senate. There is no vote now to be had in the House on the bill. That has gone beyond the point where either House can change it; but the Senate has proposed an amendment to be added to the bill, and that we are called upon to vote for or against. I shall vote for the Senate amendment. We have had a long debate upon this subject in the House and the Senate—I think that, in my experience, the greatest debate on any subject which has attracted the attention of either House of Congress. The debate in the main centered around one proposition, and that was whether, under the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, we were permitted in honor to discriminate in favor of our own vessels passing through the canal in the payment of tolls. The economic side of the question was slightly discussed, but has not had any great effect. It was not that to which the President attracted our attention. The mere moral side of the question was not much discussed. In the main, the discussion has been as to the construction of the treaty.

Now, treaties, like laws, are construed by acts, and the passage of the toll-exemption bill by itself was in itself a construction of the treaty adverse to the claims of those of us who believed that the treaty did not require equal treatment. The Senate amendment, if agreed to by the House, makes the whole fight a draw. It is not decisive either one way or the other. It leaves the question open for future determination. It declares that the passage of the bill shall not be construed as a construction of the treaty; that we do not by repealing the exemption of tolls construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty, but we merely announce our present economic policy. The treaty, therefore, under this amendment remains open for construction. It is for that reason I shall vote for the amendment. I am a Republican, but I honor both Democrats and Progressives as well as Republicans who have taken the American side of this issue, and I should prefer Democratic success or Progressive success in favor of the American principle rather than Republican success opposed to it [applause], because, while I am a Republican, I am, before being a partisan, an American through and through.

This issue will be carried to the polls in your districts and mine. There is no escape from the proposition that the people are called upon to construe the Hay-Pauncefote treaty. It is up to the people now to determine whether they will so construe this treaty that the rights of America for ages to come, for generations yet unborn, shall be preserved to them and to us, or whether we surrender our rights at the request of a foreign power. I believe that not only the material interests of the United States are involved but that in the end the very integrity of our Government is linked with this proposition, and unless we declare through the votes which the people will cast at the polls in favor of a construction of the treaty which allows the United States to govern the canal as her own, our children's children, if not our children and ourselves, will bitterly suffer the effects of our action to-day.

I vote for the amendment, leaving it to the American people to determine whether the Panama Canal belongs to the United States, which supports it, or to England, which uses it. [Applause.]

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if I can have for a moment the attention of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], I want to say that I realize that it is improper to have more than one speech in conclusion, but the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] requests me to yield to him a minute. Is there any objection to my doing so? If not, I yield one minute to the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON].

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Alabama [Mr. BLACKMON] is recognized for one minute.

Mr. BLACKMON. Mr. Speaker, I have been with the chairman of the committee, Judge ADAMSON, of Georgia, on the matter of charging tolls on all ships that pass through the canal. I voted with him two years ago, and I still believe that he is right; and I agree with the President in the position he has taken, and expect to go with them to a finish. But it strikes me as entirely improper for certain Democrats to criticize the leadership of this House. The recognized leaders of this House pointed the way to success for the Democratic Party. These leaders honestly differ with the President on the question of repeal of free tolls. I resent any suggestion that the great Democratic leader in the House, from whatever source the criticism comes, is prompted by any improper motive. When anyone attempts to reflect, by insinuation or otherwise, against our present leader, it is clear that they have not at heart the interests of the Democratic Party or the great principles for which the party stands. By his wise and conservative counsel we have remained united and have enacted constructive legislation that will ultimately redound to the interest of the great masses of the people. The name of the great leader of the Democratic hosts will be loved and cherished when those who now criticize him, or attempt to do so, will long be forgotten.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, how much time have I remaining?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman has nine minutes.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, I feel so good on the consummation of this righteous effort to correct a great iniquity that it is not in my heart to speak long or to indulge in any abuse or acrimonious remarks about anybody, especially since, from the remarks of gentlemen, it appears that their votes are going to be wiser than their reasons.

There appears to be such approximate unanimity as to the vote that I do not feel disposed to answer or resent all the different carping criticisms that have been indulged in against different people or to attempt to refute all the erroneous statements that have been made as an excuse for argument. I do not even intend to reply to the repeated insinuations of gentlemen that Members are driven by Executive orders. I do not intend to quit the righteous course because there came into power a President with patriotism and sense enough to understand that a subsidy was wrong, that violation of a treaty is wrong, and that the Government is entitled to collect the revenues to defray the expenses of operating the canal, instead of giving them to special interests and taxing the people to recoup the Treasury. [Applause.]

I would not even abandon the position on account of the accession to our ranks of the distinguished gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY]. He has come over, and says he is going to vote with me for this amendment, notwithstanding the erroneous statements and the erroneous remarks that he makes.

Now, the truth about this situation is this: The amendment leaves the case exactly where your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce found it and left it two years ago when they reported a bill for the operation of the canal. [Applause.] That committee had sense enough to know that special exemption was a violation of the treaty. That committee had sense enough to know that it was wrong to take half the revenues of that canal and give it to the shipping interest, which has lobbied with the country and with Congress ever since the canal started. That committee did not consider the political prospects which the gentlemen have carped about in their dying agonies. That committee had faith to believe that the people were for honesty and equality, and gentlemen who now console themselves in their dying agonies by making promises about the people rebuking the President and Congress for acting honestly guess without their host. Eighty-five per cent of the American people are with us on honesty and equality against the robbery of the Treasury for the enrichment of a special few, and the gentlemen will see it if ever the issue is made. [Applause.]

As I understand, this amendment was not a tub thrown to the whale. If it was, it was successful. It caught the gentleman from Washington [Mr. HUMPHREY] and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN]. [Laughter.] But, Mr. Chairman, I do not even admit that it was a sop to the consciences of men who did not have sense enough to understand the situation exactly and yet wanted to vote against a subsidy. I will tell you what it was. The country and the halls of Congress have resounded and the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD has been filled with false statements. This amendment at the proper time came along and refuted and denounced every one of them. The truth is there never was a question of sovereignty involved. The right to make a treaty is a sovereign attribute. The Government that can not make a treaty is not sovereign, and the Government that will not observe a treaty does not deserve to be sovereign, and it will not long remain so. [Applause.]

The opposition to the robbing of the Treasury and of the many for the few certainly is no justification to anybody for opposing this resolution or opposing the bill, nor will the people ever defeat any party for such action. Never was the question of sovereignty involved. Never did our committee propose to give away any right. Never was the question of the Government passing its own property and its battleships through the canal involved, and nobody outside of an insane asylum believed any such thing. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Speaker, our committee, utterly setting aside the treaty question, reported a bill for the Government of the Canal Zone just as though there never had been a treaty. We pleaded for the opportunity to open the canal and see if it would pay expenses. We pleaded with these special interests to keep their hands off the throat of the enterprise, to see if it would pay expenses or not, so that in after years, if we saw a mint there, with money overflowing to give away, Congress could decide whether they were the most meritorious beneficiaries or not; and if we wanted to go into the business of "graft" and found a treaty in the way, then diplomacy could open the way to commit an iniquity. But I would not vote for this "graft," if it was in the treaty. I would have advocated arbitration or denunciation or abrogation, or some other kind of "gation," to get rid of the evil thing. That would be as bad as that bastard crack in the plank, put in the Democratic platform by men who got on the platform committee for that purpose, in order to snake the House bill through the Senate.

The amendment adopted by the Senate is acceptable to me, and should be acceptable to all advocates of uniform tolls. It may not have been necessary, because nothing that we could add to or omit from the bill could enlarge or diminish the rights of the parties under the treaties; but to my mind it is exceedingly appropriate that the statement contained in the amendment should be made and promulgated in connection with the repeal bill itself. It is nothing but the truth, proclaimed by us many times, fully set out in the report of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce in 1912, when that committee reported advocating uniform tolls. Substantially the same declaration has been made by us on the floor of the House and elsewhere.

The amendment wasn't made by the advocates of exemption. All of their propositions were voted down by overwhelming majorities, and were generally of a character, if adopted, to emasculate the repeal bill and increase the difficulties of the situation by provisions more unsatisfactory than that placed in the act by the Doremus amendment.

The amendment adopted by the Senate was designed not to affect our relations with other nations of the world, but to refute unwarranted accusations which had been made in both Houses of Congress and through the press of the country, unjustly and untruthfully charging that the advocates of the repeal exemption were yielding up something to other nations—"relinquishing sovereignty," "waiving rights" of the country—when the very opposite was true. The advocates of the repeal were taking care of the interests of the Treasury and of the people against the avaricious demands of special interest. The question of "sovereignty" was not involved and could not be. Sovereignty is intact and unquestioned. Complying with a contract does not derogate from sovereignty; refusing to rob the people to subsidize a special interest does not derogate from sovereignty; refusing to give the people's money to a shipping interest is no waiver of right nor relinquishment of power and prerogative as against foreign nations. No foreign nation would or could, by treaty or otherwise, compel us as a sovereign nation to rob the many to enrich the few.

The power to make treaties is an ancient and traditional element of sovereignty; without it sovereignty can not exist. The sacred observance of treaties and compliance therewith are essential to the maintenance of a nation's honor among the people of the world, and if disregarded would ultimately destroy sovereignty.

No friend of the Treasury and the people supporting our demand for uniform tolls has ever attempted to construe any treaty nor surrender nor waive any right of the United States. There has never been any question of sovereignty involved; there has never been any proposition to surrender anything to any other country nor to waive any right of this Government. All those things are mare's-nests, hobgoblins, and bugaboos conjured up and injected into the discussion by the advocates of special interest in the hope of befuddling the popular mind, confusing the subject, and securing a construction of the treaty going to the other extreme.

Having without interruption maintained an active and potential lobby from the beginning of canal legislation, the claimants of exemption demanded that legislation to open the canal must at the same time provide for exemption. They saw the necessity of securing the exemption before the people could become acquainted with the subject and discover the injustice of the subsidy. They freely admitted that, unless exemption was secured them, they could never secure it; they also realized the importance of "position" as constituting "nine points in law," and fully realized the advantage of a legalized status which they could claim as a vested right and object to reversal. They knew how hard it would be to repeal the exemption if once enacted, and their obstinate resistance to the repeal has verified their opinions in the matter. When the canal bill was being considered two years ago those demanding exemption protested that we should not construe the treaty in favor of uniformity, but they not only insisted on a construction of the treaty favoring their contention, but also demanded that we legislate the graft into the pockets of the special interest. Having secured the exemption, the beneficiaries have resorted to every known means and invented some new ones in their desperate efforts to defeat the will and interest of the people and further besmirch the honor and glory of our country by preventing the repeal of this iniquitous subsidy.

When the Senate committee considered the repeal bill the supporters of the measure designed a simple answer to the false charges, declaring that no rights were waived on the floor of the Senate. Another supporter of the measure, the Senator from Nebraska [Mr. NORRIS], went further, and offered an amendment denying the further charges that sovereignty was being sacrificed. But as the contest proceeded, and defeat of the special interest appeared more certain, their advocates, growing more desperate, became fiercer and louder in their denunciation of the people's champion and false accusations as to their motives and intentions. So the chairman of the Senate committee in charge of the bill, after conferring with other supporters of the repeal, including the Senator from Nebraska, prepared and had substituted the following amendment, which was adopted by the Senate:

Provided, That the passage of this act shall not be construed or held as a waiver or relinquishment of any right the United States may have under the treaty with Great Britain ratified the 21st of February, 1902, or the treaty with the Republic of Panama ratified February 26, 1904, or otherwise, to discriminate in favor of its vessels by exempting the vessels of the United States or its citizens from the payment of tolls for passage through said canal, or as in any way waiving, impairing, or affecting any right of the United States under said treaty, or otherwise, with respect to the sovereignty over the ownership, control, or management of said canal, the regulation of the condition or charges of traffic through the same.

That is a complete and full answer to every false charge made, and will give to the country and to the world in substantial reiteration the policy adopted by your Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce two years ago that the imposition and collection of tolls should proceed with a view to preserve fairness and honesty among all the patrons thereof, without regard to race or nationality, and enable the canal management to open and operate the canal successfully without exacting the cost thereof from the people by taxing them to reimburse the Treasury for money that the ships of commerce ought to pay.

It has been intimated that this amendment was in the nature of a "tub thrown to the whale," but the vote cast for the amendment and for the bill failed to substantiate that insinuation. The amendment, as well as the bill, was adopted by the advocates of repeal and opposed by the enemies of the repeal. If it was a "tub thrown to the whale," it proved an abortion, for the whale did not seem to be satisfied with the tub. In so far as the whale was satisfied with the tub he was easily satisfied and must have been joking or trying to fool himself about the cause and extent of his dissatisfaction. Possibly some Senators who did not understand the subject but took their statements on faith from some of their interested friends connected with the shipping business were induced to vote for the repeal by coupling with it this declaration. If such doubting Thomases could take comfort from it and bolster up their judgment and backbone to support the cause of the right I am glad it had that good effect.

In reporting the canal bill to the House March 16, 1912, the following language was used, clear and explicit:

While many members of our committee believe that by the terms of our treaties with Great Britain we are prevented from allowing preferential or free tolls to ships of American registry, either coastwise or foreign, the majority of the committee voting for uniform tolls authorize and request the statement, positive, plain, and unequivocal, that no language of this section was chosen or used for the purpose of foreclosing discussion and differing opinions on that question. They authorize the express affirmation that this provision is adopted for present use, disclaiming all intention to declare in this section any construction of the language of the treaty or to establish any precedent or permanent legislative policy or to bind any future Congress should it be deemed expedient or adjudged competent to adopt a different basis. This statement of the committee may be clearly understood by reference to the original and committee prints of the bill from which the committee adopting this section eliminated all reference to treaties. The language beginning on page 6 with the words "No preference shall be given," etc., which has been criticized as an attempt to construe the treaty and thereby estop us from future consideration of the question, was not quoted from the treaty at all, but was taken from bills introduced by advocates of free or preferential tolls. One containing the same language has been introduced by the leading champion and signer of the minority views. Not deeming it necessary at this time nor for this purpose to make a legislative declaration as to the construction of that part of the treaty the majority of the committee recommend uniform tolls for reasons which they regard as good and sufficient.

On May 21, 1912, it was insisted that because certain language in the bill referred to preference and discrimination as to vessels the bill was attempting to make a construction of the treaty against the United States in favor of other nations. As the committee denied the correctness of that charge and had no such intention in reporting the bill, the chairman offered a committee amendment, striking out the following language objected to:

No preference shall be given nor discrimination shown, directly or indirectly, to the vessels of any nation, its citizens or subjects, other than vessels belonging to the Government of the United States, including those belonging to the Panama Railroad Co., and the Government of the Republic of Panama, observing the rules and regulations of the Panama Canal—and inserting the following language in lieu thereof:

The rate of toll shall be uniform upon all vessels, except the official vessels of the Governments of the United States and the Republic of Panama, but when based on different forms of tonnage for different classes of vessels the rate fixed in each case shall be substantially equivalent to the rate based on any different form of tonnage.

In support of this amendment the chairman of the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce made the following remarks:

Mr. Chairman, in the majority report, while an argument is made for uniformity of tolls, with the exception of the official vessels of the United States and of the Republic of Panama, and while it is stated that the position of the majority of the committee is that the treaties require that sort of treatment and would forbid preferential tolls, it was expressly stated that the committee did not necessarily base its action upon that ground, but upon the ground that we needed the tolls in operating the canal; that we feared there would not be much foreign business during the first year; that the coastwise trade was amply protected from all the balance of the world as to competition; that it did not need the tolls; that there were plenty of them to do the business; and if we wanted to do anyhing for the coastwise trade, we ought to give it to all of them and not to the small percentage going through the Panama Canal.

As we were in perfect good faith, the majority of the committee thought we had stricken from the bill all mention of the treaty. Some of the gentlemen on the floor seemed to complain of that language, and I thought it was only in the interest of truth and justice and due the committee that I state again that it was the position of all the committee except one or two, and that it is offered here by instruction of the committee, in accordance with the majority report, as an amendment that the committee insist on now to open the canal and fix the tolls, with the exception of the ships named, and leave the future of the canal, if success or failure, to indicate or dictate to us if there ought to be any changes made. If it is necessary to negotiate with England about it, or if unnecessary, let the future of the canal determine it. We can not agree with the gentlemen who say, "We will take our position, and if the other nations of the world do not like it, then go to The Hague or some other tribunal to settle the question." That is not the course to pursue. They might say, "Go and litigate the claim of Colombia at The Hague." England might say, "We will just close the Welland Canal." We do not want to construe the treaty. We do not want to precipitate any lawsuits or any trouble, belligerent or otherwise, with any other nation. We have spent $400,000,000 down there, and we have a great enterprise. We want it to succeed. We want gentlemen to unite with us and forego their claims for special interests and let us open that great enterprise and see what its returns will be and what its success will be, and if we find it advisable to change our course we can change the plan.

The object is to strike out the language that the minority report insisted would construe the treaty and foreclose our future rights in the matter. We eschew all reference to the treaty. We do not mention the treaty. We strike out the sentence they objected to, because it was said it resembles something in the treaty. It simply provides for uniform tolls, without mentioning that there is a treaty in the world, because we think that economically we need all the tolls alike from everybody.

Now, if in future years Congress deems that it has the power under the treaty to make special exceptions in favor of particular vessels, and if statesmen here get their consent to shut their eyes to taking money out of the Treasury to give to special interests, and they say it is not a ship subsidy to take from the Treasury that owns it $5,000 every time a ship goes through the canal and give it to the special shipping interests, all of which are either owned or financed by the same small financial coterie, Congress may do it.

We want to free ourselves from the unjust imputation that gentlemen on the other side have cast upon us that we are trying to foreclose the treaty.

When gentlemen say "we" and "our" they get their grammar confused. Congress and the Government may be "we" in the sense that the canal is ours, but if they confuse any little handful of men conducting the greatest and longest and loudest lobby ever seen on earth to get special privileges as "we" they are mistaken, for they do not represent 1 per cent of the American people. There are 90,000,000 American people who represent the Treasury, and these people who want the special privileges want us to divert from the Treasury, on an average, $5,000 a month for a ship during the year. You divert from the Treasury for each ship $60,000 that belongs to your constituents, who are the American people, and give it to a lot of fellows who do not need it, do not care for it, do not care for the flag except when you give them special privilege, who can get along without it, and do not fight one another in the matter of competition.

The amendment was adopted and left the bill without any expression construing or referring to any treaty at all, but merely fixing uniform tolls. The character of the bill was changed a few minutes later by the Doremus amendment providing for exemption of coastwise ships and permitting preference to all ships belonging to citizens of the United States. The passage of this bill corrects that error—the amendment passed by the Senate in nowise nullifies it. If it did I would never feel disposed to agree to it.

Treaty rights can no more be affected by the amendment than could moral status be altered if we should declare "neither do we waive any right we may have to discriminate against the American people and the Treasury by diverting two or three millions of dollars a year of the people's money from the Treasury and giving it to special interest," because such a declaration would be practically meaningless. It would still leave open the question of moral integrity and political economy of whether Representatives are at liberty to vote in the interest of special privilege to give to the Coastwise Ship Trust half of the revenues of the canal and then tax the other 90,000,000 to recoup the robbery of the Treasury.

The Senate amendment declaring we are not waiving nor surrendering any right that we may have under a treaty leaves the question exactly where your committee two years ago first placed it and tried to leave it—that it was still an open question for future construction, and I rejoice in the triumph of the people, which has thus corrected a grievous wrong and provided for the opening of the canal on fair, equal, and honest terms that will enable the canal management to demonstrate its full and glorious success, not only as an engineering feat, but as a demonstration of what American genius can do after other nations have failed as to an enterprise requiring statecraft, engineering and executive ability, as well as financial wisdom and integrity.

When the conference report on the Panama Canal bill was agreed to by the House on August 17, 1912, I said:

Ably, eloquently, honestly, and patriotically he (Senator BURTON) pleaded for the imposition of uniform tolls in the interest of the Treasury, which needs the tolls to operate the canal, in the interest of all the people to whom the income from the canal belongs, and in maintenance of our national honor by inviolable and scrupulous regard for the treaty stipulating universal equality of treatment at the canal. Unfortunately circumstances and events can not obscure or cure the result of this mistake, as in case of our other two errors. The consequences will have to be met by additional legislation when diplomacy shall have pointed the way, which will not be long. Diplomatic and commercial war will soon convert the innocent instruments of our blunder and thwart the designs of the guilty instigators of our mistake. Let us hope that the lesson to be so soon and certainly learned will not prove too costly to our commerce and prosperity nor humiliate our pride nor tarnish our national honor.

The hope I then held out is about to be realized in glorious fruition by the action of Congress this day completed. The only possible objection to the Senate amendment would be that carping critics insinuate that it is in the nature of an excuse or apology to the prejudices of statesmen hesitating on the anxious bench of doubt. No excuse is necessary for doing right; no apology is in order for redressing a wrong. It seems to me that a shout of glorification would have been more consonant with the proprieties of the occasion and the eternal fitness of things than a collateral statement in the nature of an excuse. Lovers of the people, those who glory in the unparalleled success of the canal enterprise and those who are battling for the maintenance of national honor should rather partake of the spirit of Simeon of old, who was so happy after having seen the salvation of the Lord that he was then ready to go. But there is now peace in the family, all have come back to the original proposition of the committee, that we ought not to shackle the canal enterprise with the selfish claims of private interest, that it ought to be permitted to demonstrate the unrivaled success of the grand and glorious undertaking, and we can all glorify together with peans of triumph in the completion and operation of that stupendous creation which will stand as a monument to American skill, brains, and honesty until the stars shall fade, the sun shall die, and this world shall teem no longer with the busy sons of men.

I am ready for a vote.

Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and I move the previous question.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, I offer a preferential motion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I have moved the previous question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] moves the previous question.

The previous question was ordered.

Mr. HULINGS. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER pro tempore. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. HULINGS. I rise to ask for a record vote.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, has the previous question been ordered?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It has.

Mr. FOSTER. Then, I ask, Mr. Speaker, for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those in favor of taking this vote by yeas and nays will rise.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] rose to his feet and offered what he says was a preferential motion. Has he not the right to have that submitted?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair had started to put the vote on the previous question.

Mr. MURDOCK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] had moved the previous question. The Speaker had not stated it when the gentleman from West Virginia offered what he says was a preferential motion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I had moved the previous question, and I was entitled to have that motion put, to cut off all other motions.

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. The motion to concur with an amendment was in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the Chair had not stated the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, the gentleman from West Virginia had a right to present his motion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I say that when I moved the previous question, I was entitled to have my motion put.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The motion to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment is a preferential motion, and the gentleman from Georgia can not cut off a preferential motion simply by moving the previous question.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Moss of West Virginia moves to strike out the Senate amendment and substitute therefor the following:
"But it is hereby affirmatively declared——"

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that that is not a preferential motion.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will finish reading it, and then the Chair will decide that question.

The Clerk read as follows:

Mr. Moss of West Virginia moves to strike out the Senate amendment and substitute therefor the following:
"But it is hereby affirmatively declared that the United States has the right to exempt from payment of tolls for passage through the canal its vessels of every kind and also those of its citizens, and the absolute sovereignty of the United States over that canal is hereby specifically and positively affirmed."

Mr. ADAMSON. The gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss] may prefer that, but I do not think parliamentary law prefers it, and I deny it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is a motion to concur with an amendment, and as such has preference over the motion to concur. There is no question about it. The gentleman's motion is to concur with an amendment, to strike out the Senate amendment, and to insert the amendment as reported.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, that is my motion, to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move the previous question on that.

Mr. STEVENS of Minnesota. Mr. Speaker, does not the RECORD show that unanimous consent was granted by the House that at the end of an hour and a half the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON] should be recognized to move the previous question? If so, should he not be recognized ahead of the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Merely asking for the previous question does not cut off a preferential motion.

Mr. ADAMSON. I move the previous question now.

Mr. MURDOCK. On the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. GARNER. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Texas will state it.

Mr. GARNER. Is the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia and all other motions to the final conclusion?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Yes. That was not the motion, but that is the effect of it.

Mr. ADAMSON. I want to move the previous question on everything.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on ordering the previous question on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from West Virginia [Mr. Moss].

Mr. WINGO. I demand a division on the question.

Mr. ADAMSON. Oh, let it go.

Mr. WINGO. The motion is to concur in the Senate amendment with an amendment.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That motion is not divisible. The previous question has been ordered.

Mr. MANN. It is divisible.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not divisible at this time, the previous question having been ordered on the motion to concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The motion to concur with an amendment is not divisible.

Mr. MANN. The motion to concur with an amendment is divisible.

Mr. WINGO. Certainly, it is divisible. The Chair will remember that this very question arose on the conference report on the tariff bill, on the Senate amendment, and the concurrence therein with the substitute of the Underwood amendment. The very question arose at that time, and the Speaker ruled that the question was divisible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question at that time was a question of receding and concurring.

Mr. WINGO. The parliamentary situation was just the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. This motion is different.

Mr. WINGO. Will the Chair hear me just a moment?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair will hear the gentleman.

Mr. WINGO. I will call the attention of the Chair to the fact that the reason for that rule is that anything that tends to bring the two Houses together takes precedence.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Not at this stage.

Mr. WINGO. Anything that tends to bring the two Houses together takes precedence. That is the basis of the rule. It makes no difference whether it is a motion to recede or whether it is a motion to concur. The basic reason is just the same, and the motion to concur with an amendment is divisible, and the motion to concur then becomes the preferential motion and should be voted on first.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. Until the stage of disagreement is reached the Senate amendment is open to amendment. Instead of offering merely an amendment to the Senate amendment, motions have been put in different forms, but such forms as are recognized in the House procedure—one motion to concur and one to concur with an amendment. The decisions have been uniform that when a motion to concur with an amendment is made, the stage of disagreement not having been reached, it is preferential to the motion to concur, and when the previous question is ordered the motion can not be divided. The House first determines whether it will concur with the amendment. If it declines to concur with the amendment, it then votes on the question whether it will concur in the amendment of the Senate. The stage of disagreement not being reached, there is nothing for the House to recede from, so that it is not a motion to recede and concur, which is divisible.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair holds that nothing is in order except to vote upon the preferential amendment.

Mr. MANN. A parliamentary inquiry then, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MANN. If the Chair holds that way, that is a division of the question. I just understood the Chair to rule that there was no division. Now what is the question?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The decision of the Chair was that this motion is not divisible.

Mr. MANN. Then the question is not on the amendment, but on the motion to concur with an amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to concur in the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MANN. That is not the question, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment, with the amendment of the gentleman from West Virginia.

Mr. MOSS of West Virginia. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. GUERNSEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the amendment reported again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment again, if there be no objection.

The motion of Mr. Moss of West Virginia was again read by the Clerk.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman demands the yeas and nays. All those in favor of taking the question by yeas and nays will rise. Evidently a sufficient number.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the other side.

The House divided; and there were 60 ayes and 84 noes.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 108, nays 174, answered "present" 2, not voting 149, as follows:

Mr. SABATH with Mr. J. R. KNOWLAND.

Mr. CLINE with Mr. SLOAN, ending one week from June 8.

Mr. COOPER with Mr. HOWARD.

On this vote:

Mr. CARLIN (against Moss amendment) with Mr. AVIS (for).

Mr. LEWIS of Pennsylvania (for Moss amendment) with Mr. BARNHART (against).

Mr. KENNEDY of Rhode Island (for Moss amendment) with Mr. KENNEDY of Connecticut (against).

Mr. CAREW (for Moss amendment) with Mr. HAMILL (against).

Mr. CANTRILL (against Moss amendment) with Mr. WILLIS (for).

Mr. GRIEST (for Moss amendment) with Mr. PALMER (against).

Mr. BARCHFELD (for Moss amendment) with Mr. COVINGTON (against).

Mr. GRIFFIN (for Moss amendment) with Mr. HART (against).

Mr. DOOLING (for Moss amendment) with Mr. KINKEAD of New Jersey (against).

Mr. DAVENPORT with Mr. J. M. C. SMITH, commencing morning of June 10, ending when both return. Not to apply to prohibition or rural credits and not to prohibit Mr. SMITH from voting on Dyer contest.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know if the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. DAVENPORT, is recorded?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. He is not recorded.

Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I voted "aye." I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present," as I have a pair with the gentleman.

The name of Mr. J. M. C. SMITH was called, and he answered "Present."

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I desire to have my name recorded.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that I heard my name called as I came into the door.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman was in the Hall then when his name was called?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I do not think the gentleman from Ohio brings himself within the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall listening when his name should have been called?

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I came in at the door, and, as I have stated, I think at that instant I heard my name called. I was inside the door.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Did the gentleman vote?

Mr. BATHRICK. No; I did not; for I was not sure enough.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman can not vote unless he failed to hear his name called when it should have been called.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Illinois can not say that I did not.

Mr. MANN. I do not say anything about it. I take the gentleman's word.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If the gentleman heard his name called and did not vote, he is not entitled to vote now.

Mr. BATHRICK. I was not absolutely certain of it, Mr. Speaker. I came in the door, hurrying over here from the Office Building when the bells were rung.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman knows what the rule is. He is able to state whether or not he was in the Hall, listening, when his name should have been called.

Mr. BATHRICK. I think I was in the Hall, listening.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. It is for the gentleman to state.

Mr. BATHRICK. I think I was in the Hall, Mr. Speaker, and listening, certainly, if I was in the Hall.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And the gentleman failed to hear his name called?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. And he asks to vote under the rule?

Mr. BATHRICK. Yes.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On that statement the gentleman's name can be recorded; otherwise not.

Mr. BATHRICK. Mr. Speaker, I simply state that I think I heard my name called. I am not going to state positively that I did; but as I came in the door I thought I heard my name called. The B's were being called at that time.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman plainly does not come within the rule.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the gentleman brings himself within the rule.

Mr. BATHRICK. Then, Mr. Speaker, I wish to state, since I am deprived of voting on the objection of the gentleman from Illinois, that if I were permitted to vote I would vote "no."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I have no objection to the gentleman voting now.

Mr. BATHRICK. I think the gentleman from Illinois is the one who raised the objection.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that is entirely untrue.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman fails to bring himself within the rule.

The result of the vote was announced, as above recorded.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, if necessary, I again move the previous question on the motion to concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. MANN. Oh, that has been already ordered.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That has been ordered. The question is on the motion of the gentleman from Georgia to concur in the Senate amendments.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Speaker, on that I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 216, nays 71, answered "present" 1, not voting 145, as follows:

Mr. TUTTLE (for Senate amendment) with Mr. PAYNE (against).

Mr. BRODBECK (for motion to concur) with Mr. BARCHFELD (against).

Until further notice:

Mr. MCDERMOTT with Mr. WILLIS.

Mr. ASHBROOK with Mr. PATTON of Pennsylvania.

Mr. THOMAS with Mr. CALDER.
Mr. LIEB with Mr. MCLAUGHLIN.
Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire how the gentleman from Oklahoma, Mr. DAVENPORT, voted?
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman did not vote.
Mr. J. M. C. SMITH. I voted "no," and I wish to withdraw my vote and answer "present." I am paired with that gentleman.
The name of Mr. J. M. C. SMITH was called, and he answered "Present."
Mr. EVANS. Mr. Speaker, I desire to vote "aye."
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman in the Hall when his name was called?
Mr. EVANS. I do not think I was.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair does not think the gentleman is entitled to vote.
Mr. ASHBROOK. Mr. Speaker, I do not think I voted.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Was the gentleman listening when his name was called?
Mr. ASHBROOK. I am not sure I was.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under that statement the gentleman probably would not be entitled to vote.
Mr. ASHBROOK. I would not say I was and I would not say I was not; I think I was.
The result of the vote was announced as above recorded.
On motion of Mr. ADAMSON, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the motion to concur was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Connecticut asks unanimous consent to address the House for five minutes. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker [applause], I will read a sentence from a speech of the ranking member of the minority on the Committee on Appropriations, Mr. GILLETT, of Massachusetts. He said, on June 6, that the presence of a minority, he was willing to admit, had the power to prevent abuses. Having that in my mind on the 10th of June, I rose and addressed the Chair and appealed to the chairman of the committee having the codification bill in charge, and, as reported in the RECORD, I asked the chairman of the committee if he did not think he ought to move to rise, because there was only one member of the minority—Republican Party—present, for the purpose, Mr. Speaker, of having those in the opposition present. It is true there were three members of the Progressive Party present. Well, in the noise and commotion which is generally started when the gentleman from Illinois, the leader of the minority, rises from his seat, he stated, according to the RECORD, that the gentleman from Connecticut knew that the statement he made is not true, and he added that the statement was not true. The statement was true, Mr. Speaker, when made. I have no other stock in trade but the truth. [Applause.] I never make any statement in public that is not the truth. Just previous to that time, the gentleman from Washington having departed, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. GREEN] had taken up his little bundle of papers and pamphlets and departed, and that great judicial Member from Wisconsin, who never rises on the floor of the House but that he is always fair, Mr. ESCH, had also departed, leaving only the leader of the minority. Now, we have in this country great manufacturing interests; we have in this country great financial interests; we have great commercial interests, and the people of the Republican Party, and especially the Members of Congress belonging to that party, claim to represent all those things. I want to call attention to how they attend to their business by leaving this Chamber during legislative proceedings.
The great State of Pennsylvania at that time had not a Republican Member upon this floor, except a Member of the Progressive Party. The great State of Ohio, the greatest manufacturing State, or one of them, in this country, not even had the presence of her college president; not a single member of the minority was present. In all New England not a member of the minority was present. Not one of the Republican Members from the South was present. [Laughter and applause.] Mr. Speaker, I repeat, not a single Republican Member from the Southern States, and there are not many of them; although they claim to be the most patriotic, they claim they get more out of the Treasury than any others—they were absent, too. [Laughter.] The great line on the Pacific coast, from the Arctic circle to the line of Mexico—not one was present, except the Progressive Member from Washington. That shingle shaver [laughter]—that shingle talker, who uses the RECORD more than any other Member in this Congress—abandoned that great interest of the country to the majority. [Applause.] And I appeal——
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The time of the gentleman has expired.
Mr. MOORE. I want the gentleman to finish his appeal.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for two minutes.
Mr. DONOVAN. I suggest the gentleman of the minority have five minutes. He needs that many minutes to explain his leadership and why they left him.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent for two minutes' time. Is there objection?
Mr. DONOVAN. I offered to make it five minutes.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Chair hears none.
Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the statement made by the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] on Wednesday last that there was only one Member of the minority, referring to myself, present at the time, was not true when it was made, and it is no truer to-day when it is reiterated.
In plain sight of the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] and anybody else in the House, there stood right here the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. LENROOT] and the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. CAMPBELL]. Over to the right a number of Republican Members were present. And the two Members, I think, first referred to, at the time were discussing some subject—I do not know what—in private conversation with the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. MURDOCK], in plain sight of anybody who had sense enough to see. I do not know whether the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] gets so that he can not see at that time of the day or not.
Mr. DONOVAN. Will the gentleman allow an interruption?
Mr. MANN. I did not interrupt the gentleman.
The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois refuses to yield.
Mr. DONOVAN. Well, it is wise he did not do it. [Laughter.]
Mr. MANN. I think myself it is wise, because I never heard any wisdom imparted to the House when I did yield to the gentleman, and no one else ever did. The gentleman repeats a slander for the purpose of injuring Members of the House. He himself was hardly present at any time on Wednesday last, but came in to call attention to the absence of other gentlemen, and made a statement absolutely untrue, in fact, and which he must have known was untrue if he ever had had the use of his eyes.
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Speaker——
Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow.
Mr. DONOVAN. I am going to object to that Mr. Speaker. In fact, I do object.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the sundry civil appropriation bill.
The motion was agreed to.
Accordingly the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 17041) making appropriations for the sundry civil expenses of the Government for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1915, and for other purposes, with Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.
The Clerk proceeded to read.
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. Let the Clerk finish the reading of the paragraph.
The Clerk completed the reading of the paragraph, as follows:

UNITED STATES BOARD OF MEDIATION AND CONCILIATION.

For commissioner, $7,500; assistant commissioner, $5,000; for necessary and proper expenses incurred in connection with any arbitration or with the carrying on of the work of mediation and conciliation, including traveling and other necessary expenses of members or employees of boards of arbitration, rent in the District of Columbia, not exceeding $2,280, furniture, office fixtures and supplies, books, salaries, traveling expenses, and other necessary expenses of members or employees of the board of mediation and conciliation, to be approved by the chairman of said board, $37,500; in all, $50,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.
The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut——

Mr. MANN. I moved to strike out the last word, but I am perfectly willing to let the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] have that privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut arose just as the reading of the paragraph was about ended and moved to strike out the last word and the Chair requested that he wait until the reading of the paragraph was concluded.

Mr. MANN. And when the paragraph was completed the gentleman from Connecticut remained on his feet until the Clerk started to read the next paragraph, and I arose and moved to strike out the last word. However, I am perfectly willing to yield to the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. I do not want any favors. I want nothing but the regular procedure.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Connecticut. If he wants to move to strike out the last word, he may do it.

Mr. DONOVAN. In regard to what has taken place, not a single member of the minority has arisen and claimed that he was here——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the discussion is not germane, and I intend to make the same point of order during the rest of the day.

Mr. DONOVAN. I desire to be heard on that point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] will pardon the Chair, it really is not necessary for him to be heard on that point of order. The gentleman knows the rules.

Mr. DONOVAN. The Chair will pardon me, we are not confined to debating the question of striking out the single word.

The CHAIRMAN. That was the motion offered by the gentleman from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. Exactly, but we are not confined to that under the rules. The Chair would not hold that I could not debate the subject matter in regard to an appropriation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I am objecting to such discussion.

Mr. DONOVAN. The Chair will not so hold, I think.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] may proceed in order.

Mr. DONOVAN. Yes, sir; I was about to say, Mr. Chairman, that the statement of the gentleman from Illinois just made is lacking in truth—every word and syllable of it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I make the point of order, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. DONOVAN. Nobody has made any.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] made a point of order. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

Mr. MURDOCK. A parliamentary inquiry, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MURDOCK. When the motion is made to strike out the last word—and it is frequently made in the Committee of the Whole under the five-minute rule—how far afield can a speaker go on that proposition? Must he address himself to the subject matter of the paragraph?

The CHAIRMAN. He must address himself to the subject matter of the amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. As the Chair knows, it would be practically impossible under the practices here to talk to a single word. I would just like to know what the rule is, if the gentleman from New York is going to hold the Committee of the Whole to that proposition.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I intend to insist on gentlemen discussing the particular paragraph under discussion in this bill for the rest of the day.

Mr. MURDOCK. Does the gentleman from New York mean that he is going to exclude a motion to strike out the last word?

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman wishes to discuss the paragraph in which that last word is, I shall not make the point of order.

Mr. MURDOCK. That is what I wanted to get from the Chair.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We have only two hours left to-day to consider this bill, and I want some progress made with it.

Mr. MURDOCK. The Chair refused to say just what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] had moved.

The CHAIRMAN. If the gentleman from Kansas will pardon the Chair, the Chair could not state what the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] had in mind. The Chair could only state what the Chair could hold.

Mr. MURDOCK. I think it fair to have a ruling on that proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. If the point of order is made, the Chair will hold that the gentlemen must confine themselves to the amendment.

Mr. MURDOCK. And not to the paragraph?

Mr. MANN. I move to strike out the last two words. I notice that this paragraph includes traveling and other necessary expenses of members or employees of boards of arbitration and also the necessary expenses of members or employees of the board of mediation and conciliation.

I would like to ask the gentleman how far this language authorizes employments. The language here is "other necessary expenses of members or employees of boards of arbitration" and also "other necessary expenses of members or employees of the board of mediation and conciliation." I noticed in the public press the other day that this board had employed an attorney of very high standing in the United States to give some kind of an opinion, and had received from him a bill for $1,500, I presume for half a day's work, owing to the prominence of the attorney who was employed, and that there had been a dispute in reference to the payment of the bill.

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. Under your ruling the gentleman, the minority leader, is not speaking now to his amendment of striking out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. Certainly I am. The last two words are "thousand dollars," and it is a very important thing to know whether we shall continue the appropriation of the thousands of dollars or whether there is any excuse offered, and I am discussing that very question. Anyone else in the House other than the gentleman from Connecticut would have known enough to know that it requires an explanation. [Laughter.]

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a point of order. The gentleman from Connecticut had nothing to do with striking out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. Then what is the gentleman interfering with it for if he had nothing to do with it?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Illinois—and it is not necessary to state to him——

Mr. MANN. I am following the rule.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman could move to strike out the entire paragraph and then discuss the entire paragraph.

Mr. MANN. I am discussing the question of the expenditure of money, and I move to reduce the amount. I move to reduce the amount in this provision from $50,000 to $50. If one can not discuss the reasons for it, I do not know what one can discuss under such a motion.

It was stated in the press that they could not find any authority for the expenditure of this money except under the title of "necessary expenses." Now, this language is "necessary expenses of members or employees of the board." I would like to know whether the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] thinks that that means that the board itself may use all of this $50,000 in the employment of counsel or expert advice, or something of that sort, from people who are neither members nor employees of the board? Of course, I apprehend that there were political reasons for employing this distinguished lawyer. After a fierce battle at a primary or convention it might have been thought desirable that the present administration should gain the favor of Mr. Alton B. Parker and pay him $1,500 for looking wise. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the pro forma amendment will be withdrawn, and the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

COMMISSION ON INDUSTRIAL RELATIONS.

For continuing the inquiries and investigations authorized by the act of August 23, 1912, entitled "An act to create a Commission on Industrial Relations," and to provide the expenses of such inquiries and investigations as are enumerated in section 2 of said act, $200,000.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] moves to strike out the last two words.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] if he can tell us how long these investigations of this Commission on Industrial Relations are likely to continue?

Mr. BARTLETT. Three years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My recollection is that the chairman of the commission stated that they hoped to be able to complete the investigations within the time originally mentioned when the act creating the commission was under consideration by Congress.

Mr. MANN. This commission is conducting investigations so different from what I was led to anticipate would be the work carried on by them when the present Secretary of Labor had charge of the bill in the House that I thought it was a proper inquiry to make—to know how long the investigations were likely to continue.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, the work of the commission is very comprehensive. The committee went into the matter very fully. I do not believe that I can state within a brief time just what was the extent of the investigations to be made by this commission. It is about as comprehensive as could be devised.

The work was authorized and the commission decided upon a program. They have men expert in various lines relative to the relations between capital and labor. They laid out lines of investigation, four chief lines—division of public agencies, division of private agencies, division of industrial conditions, and the division of legal agencies—and they are inquiring into such subjects as the safety, sanitation, and hygiene of employees, vocational education, cooperative action, collective bargaining, seasonal occupations, and every other subject which is of keen interest to those desiring to improve the conditions of those compelled to live by the sweat of their faces, and involving the relations between employers and employees.

Evidently the commission seems to have a very comprehensive grasp of the work to be done. They have carefully studied the work of the Royal British Commission, which made a somewhat similar investigation a few years ago. The investigation that we make will not only cover these activities in this country but in order to obtain information that will enable the commission to make recommendations that will be of value to Congress they contemplate making certain investigations abroad, so that information of value, wherever it can be ascertained, will be collected, properly collated, systematically arranged, and sent to Congress for its information.

What was contemplated when the commission was created, I do not quite know. The commission began and carefully considered the fields and subjects that it should investigate and decided upon the lines of investigation which they intended to follow; and if they make any sort of an efficient investigation along the lines indicated, they can very easily expend $350,000 to $500,000. Congress overwhelmingly passed the bill creating the commission and seemed to be peculiarly anxious that these investigations should be made, and started the machinery. The only thing left is either to repeal the law creating the commission or to furnish them with the means to conduct the investigations which they desire to make.

Mr. MOORE. Mr .Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from New York yield to the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MOORE. This commission has been meeting recently and taking testimony in the city of New York, has it not?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Well, I do not know. I can not keep track of the movements of the commission.

Mr. BARTLETT. They have sent out circulars, a copy of which the gentleman has probably received.

Mr. MOORE. I know the New York newspapers do not treat the gentleman fairly for his good work in Congress, which I think is a misfortune, but the gentleman ought to keep posted and read the New York newspapers once in a while.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have not time. I am too busy.

Mr. MOORE. I know the gentleman is very much taken up with his volumes and tomes; but when this bill was up it passed with only a few negative votes, and it provides that the commission shall go out in three years. Is that right?

Mr. FITZGERALD. That is my recollection.

Mr. MOORE. The commission has no power to do anything but investigate? It has no power to settle disputes?

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is to obtain information that will enable us to discharge our duty intelligently in the enactment of legislation.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman seemed to be somewhat hesitating in stating what the purposes of the commission were.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I do not hesitate to say that I know what the act provides. I stated that I did not think it would be possible for me to enumerate in a brief time and in a comprehensive manner the various lines of investigation that the commission proposes to make.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman suggested that the commission might have to go to Europe to complete its investigations?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No. I said that the information was that the commission would probably make some investigations in Europe in order to obtain some information that it believed to be desirable on certain lines.

Mr. MOORE. Which lines were not clearly defined.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think they were. I believe they are now investigating the smuggling of Asiatics into the United States.

Mr. MOORE. That is provided for in the law.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The Immigration Bureau had a very large appropriation, in which was merged an appropriation of $500,000 to prevent the smuggling of Asiatics into the United States The commission evidently intend to investigate to ascertain whether the immigration officials are efficient, and how they could improve their service, and what other steps might be taken to accomplish the exclusion of Asiatics. At any rate, the act creating the commission is so broad that they can do a great many things that I did not suppose they could do.

Mr. MOORE. In the matter of the Asiatics, is not this commission really trenching upon the ground already covered by the Immigration Commission, which cost this Government a million dollars?

Mr. FITZGERALD. They say not.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. MOORE. I move to strike out the last two words.

I did not approve of the creation of this commission, and did not vote for the bill at the time it was before the House. I did not vote for it, because I believed that the commission would simply stir up trouble for business men and for workingmen all over the United States. At that time I believed that this commission would tend to create new offices, new expenditures on the part of the Government, and would offend the Democratic policy of economy.

The commission has no power to do anything except to investigate, and one of the things the chairman of the committee says it intends to investigate is that of Asiatic immigration. Now, the question of Asiatic immigration is fairly well understood by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, which has before it, as Congress has, over 40 volumes that were prepared at an expense of over a million dollars, which the people of this country paid, in order that the commission might investigate this very question, and it certainly was investigated.

Mr. Chairman, the bill creating this Commission on Industrial Relations appropriated $100,000 with which it might begin business, and that was after the expenditure of over $1,000,000 by the Immigration Commission to investigate the question of immigration and Asiatic conditions as they would affect this country.

Under section 3 of the act, this commission—may report to the Congress its findings and recommendations, and submit the testimony taken from time to time, and shall make a final report, accompanied by the testimony not previously submitted, not later than three years after the date of the approval of this act, at which time the term of this commission shall expire, unless it shall have previously made final report; and in the latter case the term of the commission shall expire with the making of its final report; and the commission shall make at least one report to the Congress within one year from the time of its appointment, and a second report within two years from the time of its appointment.

Now, it is a temporary body, a sort of floating kidney, to stir up questions as between capital and labor, and to report, and to report, and to report to Congress, so that its reports may be very successfully buried after they reach Congress. It now asks for $100,000 to go on with its investigations and its reports. We have had the forty-odd volumes of the report of the Immigration Commission, and they are hidden in congressional offices, and many of them have gone into the scrap heap. A few of them have gone into libraries, where they may be perused by the specialists on the subject. But we are now to get volumes and volumes of testimony taken, not by a congressional commission but by an independent body created by Congress, all of which must be taken up subsequently and considered by committees of Congress, if it is ever considered at all.

Mr. BARTLETT. And we have 19 volumes and 1 index of a report of the Industrial Commission which reported six or eight years ago, as the gentleman will remember.

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. That was some sort of a commission which went into all these various questions, and gathered up everything and presented it

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. And Congressmen have been trying ever since to digest some of that information, before they got this additional pabulum.

Mr. MOORE. That is true.

Mr. BARTLETT. I voted against this particular proposition.

Mr. MOORE. I believe the gentleman did.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. And I believe the gentleman stood for real economy on his side of the House when he did so.

Mr. BARTLETT. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. But the pabulum that the gentleman refers to is coming to us in these volumes of testimony taken by a number of gentlemen who sit up as judges in New York, in Pittsburgh, in Chicago, in San Francisco, and possibly off yonder in Shanghai; testimony so voluminous that no Member of Congress can possibly read it, and few people on this earth will dare take the time to digest it. Yet we are criticized in this body for extravagance, while we permit these commissions that have no power to act but simply to dig out testimony and dig out more testimony and stir up more trouble, to go on ad libitum at the expense of the people of the United States.

Mr. BARTLETT. The gentleman realizes that the Committee on Appropriations finds itself face to face with the law, and the estimates submitted to it for this purpose.

Mr. MOORE. Yes.

Mr. BARTLETT. And it has either got to appropriate the money to carry out a purpose which Congress has directed shall be carried out or else the Congress ought to repeal the law. If the gentleman wants to strike out this appropriation, I will vote with him.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Does not the gentleman believe that the constant creation of commissions and the continuous series of investigations that are being conducted on this subject and other subjects really interfere with the accomplishment of needed legislation on these subjects simply because the public mind is in a state of more or less uncertainty, created in that way?

Mr. MOORE. I certainly do; and I want to say to those wise old Democrats who still adhere a little bit to their right to legislate that they are gradually, step by step, giving away the power delegated to them by the people and transferring their authority to independent bodies, to whom they give the money merely to make more trouble for Congress and for the people. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the pro forma amendment will be considered as withdrawn and the Clerk will read.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That motion has already been debated, and unless there is to be something germane, I shall have to object.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. Chairman, I am somewhat in sympathy with the statement made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] with reference to the constant irritation which is being created by the program of investigation which seems to be under wa/ in all parts of the country, affecting so many lines of industry and commerce.

This House, early in the year, created committees to investigate labor troubles existing in Colorado and Michigan. We have also been informed through the press that the Department of Labor has recently sent out representatives to the State of Colorado to further investigate conditions there. The legislature has also appointed a committee to investigate the question. Various civil, fraternal, and commercial bodies have also appointed committees of inquiry, and I am credibly informed that this House will soon be asked to consider a resolution, which I will not oppose, creating a commission to be appointed by the President of the United States to further investigate this matter and if possible secure arbitration, a result which has long been desired.

From all of these investigations it is doubtful if we are to secure anything of a definite character that will prove to be remedial and salutary. There will be a mass of material presented to Congress which may or may not contribute to wise and needed legislation. I believe the country is in a mood at this time to expect legislation rather than investigation. There is abundant material available for legislators in all parts of the country. There is little that is new to be said on either side of these industrial problems, but there is an insistent demand from the country generally that legislators should now give their minds to the consideration of legislation that will make such investigations unnecessary.

If we will consider matters of legislation that will in some measure go to the root of these difficulties and make strikes and lockouts, boycotts and blacklists unnecessary and impossible by removing the causes for their existence, this will do more for the country than to provide liberal appropriations to create commissions without power and whose work is often barren of results.

While I am on my feet, I would like to ask permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD by inserting a statement made concerning the Colorado strike situation by ex-Senator Thomas M. Patterson, of our State. It is a lucid, clear, and unprejudiced presentation of this question along the line of definite legislative action. This statement was published in the Rocky Mountain Sentinel of June 6 last, and is as follows:

"QUESTIONS ARISING FROM COAL STRIKE—A JUST SETTLEMENT TO BOTH SIDES OF CONTROVERSY MUST EVENTUALLY COME—SOCIETY HAS CERTAIN RIGHTS THAT MUST BE OBSERVED—BOTH OPERATORS AND MINERS MUST CONSIDER OBLIGATION TO SOCIETY.

[By Thomas M. Patterson.]

"In this contribution I will only consider questions that grow out of the strike and about which a clearer view should be had at the present time.

"With the adjournment of the special legislative session there went glimmering every hope of the strike settlement except through either a mutual agreement between the parties or the utter exhaustion of the one side or the other. The most important measure for which the session was called—except the appropriation to meet the expenses occasioned by the strike—was for the submission of a constitutional amendment that would authorize legislation for a compulsory arbitration law. If such an amendment had been submitted, it would have placed Colorado in the forefront of States that seek to devise rational plans for the settlement of their great, devastating labor struggles, which every year seem more menacing. The only reason given for the failure is that both the operators and the strikers opposed it. I think that is very likely; but I submit that such is not a sufficient reason—for between those two combatants is society—the great body of the public whose wishes and interests lawmakers should have held uppermost in the legislative program. With public interests held paramount by the legislature, the real interests of labor and capital would have been best defended; progress would not have been retarded, nor would the stability of business been seriously disturbed.

"This failure by the legislature is, however, a pointer to the irreconcilable character of the dispute that is now disturbing the State. While a law under such an amendment might not be in time to settle the present strike—and yet it might—it would have been available for those of the future. Nevertheless, both sides opposed it. I can not understand why, except that probably each preferred to take its chances, backed by the power of their organizations, rather than leave the outcome to the calm judgment of the men whom the people would select to act as judges between them.

"But since the legislature refused its help to the public, what may the public expect now that it is thrown upon its own resources?

"When J. D. Rockefeller, jr., refused the rational request of President Wilson for cooperation in bringing about a settlement, and the national executive body of the miners resolved to give all needful help to the strike and declared that on the outcome depended the future of unionism and humanity, the continuation of a titantic, widespread struggle with Colorado to remain the battle ground seemed assured.

"It may be accepted that the National Government will not continue to do for Colorado what the State's plain duty is to do for itself—maintain peace and order within its borders—one day longer than may seem to be absolutely necessary. We must commence to contemplate the withdrawal of Federal soldiers from police duty in Colorado. They were sent in for an emergency and not to go into permanent barracks, and when they shall be withdrawn, what then? With both sides doggedly determined; with both sides believing that the struggle is no longer local, but national; with both sides provided with ample means to carry on the struggle indefinitely, the outlook is dark for the peace and welfare of the State.

"It is not necesary to discuss the merits of the strike, for it has been on now for more than half a year. The operators and miners have each gathered their partisans to their sides, and from the partisan standpoint the claims of each seem quite defensible.

"MINERS WILLING TO ARBITRATE.

"But the attitude of the two sides upon the question of a settlement is quite different. The strikers say we are willing to submit the differences to any reputable and disinterested body of men and abide the result. The operators say there is nothing to arbitrate and we will not negotiate for a settlement with the strike leaders nor submit any question to arbitration.

"The operators are at least consistent. That was the stand they took when the strike was first threatened and it is the stand they take to-day.

"The occurrences immediately before the troops were called out are significant in this connection:

"Three or four days before that occurred Gov. Ammons called upon and urged me to assist him in his efforts to bring about a settlement of the strike. Of course I readily assented.

I spent three days and most of the nights at the statehouse on that mission. Messrs. White, Lawson, Hayes, McClennon, and others of the National and State officials of the miners' union were in attendance practically all of that time. They didn't censure Gov. Ammons's declared purpose to call out the troops if his efforts for settlement failed; they appeared to realize that the strikers had at that time measurably gotten beyond their control, and that he was justified, as the chief executive, in calling out the troops to keep the strikers within the bounds of the law. These leaders were also very desirous of settling the strike, and I am now, as I was then, thoroughly convinced that if the operators would but hold a conference with these leaders the strike would have been settled.

"In our interviews with the strike leaders they frequently made such statements as this: 'If the operators will but grant us an interview, we are convinced this strike will be settled.' But the operators would not confer with them for any purpose whatsoever. Gov. Ammons and I urged the operators to consent to a conference. We told them the strike leaders had declared time and again that if they would but meet them they were certain they could end the trouble. The operators replied that to agree to a conference will be to recognize the union, which they would not do under any circumstances. We insisted that a mere conference could not be construed into a recognition of the union; that to hold a conference did not commit the operators to the acceptance of any single one of the miners' demands, and we believed that a settlement might be reached which would not include the recognition of the union. To this the operators replied that they would not confer with murderers and interlopers. To this we replied that they should not place the heads of the union organizations in the same category with murderers, neither should they regard them as interlopers, for the local unions owed allegiance to the national body, and it was the duty of the national officers to look after the welfare of the local unions; and it should be presumed that in coming to Colorado the national leaders were but doing what they conceived to be their duty to the local unions. But no plea on our part could change the determination of Messrs. Osgood, Brown, Welborn, and Perry, speaking for themselves and the rest of the operators, not to confer with the miners' representatives, whatever might be the outcome. At one time the operators declared if White, Hayes, Lawson, and others should come into the room they would leave it. At that very time White, Lawson, Hayes, and the others were in an adjoining room hoping to be admitted for a conference.

"MILITIA STARTS IN RIGHT.

"Finally, after midnight on Sunday, I think, Gov. Ammons, despairing of any settlement, called in Gen. Chase and signed the orders that placed the militia in the field.

"Just before these orders were signed and before Gen. Chase came in I suggested to Gov. Ammons that every care should be taken to prevent the troops being made partisans to either side; that they should hold the scales in absolute balance as between the operators and the strikers.

"It was in that connection that I suggested to Gov. Ammons that the operators should not be permitted to bring in strike breakers; but that he should instruct Gen. Chase to afford the fullest protection to all miners then at work, and announce that the fullest protection would be given to any of the strikers who wished to return to work; but, so long as the operators refused to confer with the officers of the union, not a strike breaker, as distinguished from miners then at work or that might desire to return to work, should be permitted to man the mines.

"Gov. Ammons approved of this suggestion with enthusiasm, and he so instructed Gen. Chase. He gave out an interview that night for the morning paper in which he affirmed this position. If I could judge from the manner of and statements made at the time by Messrs. White, Hayes, Lawson, and others, representing the miners, if they did not in terms approve the calling of the militia and the above instructions to Gen. Chase, they did not oppose it and were apparently relieved that it had been done.

"It is some satisfaction to know that the President, in his dealing with the strike, substantially affirms the advice I gave Gov. Ammons at the time the troops were called out, and he has even gone further in the interest of peace to maintain the status quo between the combatants.

"NO TROUBLE AT FIRST.

"It will be recalled that when the State troops first entered the strike territory they were received with enthusiasm by the strikers, and so long as the governor required Gen. Chase to observe the above instructions—for some two or three weeks—there was no violence. But with the change—what induced the governor to make the change I do not know—when the troops were used to install strike breakers in the mines, the serious trouble commenced, and they were never abated until the Federal troops took command of the situation.

"I keenly feel the humiliation of the resort to the Federal Government to preserve Colorado's peace. I joined with others in asking for the Federal troops, for without them it would have been impossible, unless, indeed, open war with consequential wholesale slaughter would have done it. But even had the policy of coercion been pursued at that time, such was the state of mind of the combatants and their sympathizers both within and without the State, that a genuine class war extending far beyond Colorado borders would in all likelihood have been the outcome.

"What is said in defense of the stand by the operators under this lamentable condition of things? That they are insisting only upon their legal rights. They insist that employers should enjoy the right to hire and discharge workmen at will, and that whoever wishes to work without belonging to a union should be given and protected in that right.

"I will not take issue with the operators in any of these positions. I have repeatedly said that in refusing to arbitrate and to confer the operators were clearly within their legal rights, and that their insistance that the State should protect them in manning their mines, even though it were with those called strike breakers, was in naked law well founded. But this is only so now, because public opinion on this subject has not yet crystallized into statute law. Whenever it does, and many believe that time is rapidly coming, that naked legal right may pass away.

"COAL OPERATORS SEEM BLIND.

"The coal operators seem quite blind to the march of public sentiment upon the issue of the unionizing of labor, and they appear to be equally blind to the progress that sentiment has made with other great corporations that employ working men en masse. There isn't a railroad in Colorado or in all the West, with one possible exception, that isn't operated throughout with union labor and that doesn't cheerfully confer with officers of these unions when serious differences arise. How is it with other employers who read this article? I venture there is hardly one who does not deal with unions, and in practice at least doesn't accept collective bargaining. The principle of collective bargaining between employers and the representatives of the mass of workmen is now so well established that very few employers any longer refuse to accept it.

"No one will deny that labor unions with all their offenses and mistakes, with all their tyrannies and injustices, have been great civilizing institutions. They have been the principal agencies in increasing wages, shortening hours, and improving the conditions under which labor is done. They have been in many cases merely coercive agencies, while in many others they have quickened the sluggard conscience of society which in turn has influenced the reforms. With all the sad conflicts that have accompanied the efforts of unions to better the conditions of their members, with the killings and arsons and boycotts and proscriptions, the balance of good, of permanent and necessary good, is on the side of the unions and the strikes for which they have been responsible.

"Do not misunderstand me. In no case do I either approve of or seek to condone lawlessness in any form. I hold it to be the duty of Government to suppress it and to afford the fullest protection to person and property. I hold that Gov. Ammons could not have done otherwise than call out the militia when he did, and had he but continued to act as commander in chief of the State's armed forces when in the field, as was his constitutional duty, instead of turning over that vast war power of his office to one who is a soldier only in times of trouble and who apparently knows no agency but that of unregulated force in dealing with strikers, and had he, instead of permitting this commander to flout the writ of habeas corpus, to hold such as he chose to arrest incommunicado for weeks and months, ultimately to turn them loose without a single charge being preferred against them, to disregard the commonest and most cherished rights of citizenship in the matter of personal liberty, ignoring local courts and their officers except as it suited his purpose, I believe all would have been well, and the great body of the violence that has pilloried the State in the face of the civilized world would never have occurred. The strike might not have been settled, for I have no reason to suppose that the operators would have changed their stubborn front even though the strike had been conducted on the lines of a Sunday-school picnic.

"Should not the operators change their attitude in deference to public opinion and the welfare of the State? I admit their legal right to refuse to arbitrate and even to confer, but the miners have the right to strike and to continue to strike as long as they will. Neither side has the right to violate the law, and I hold it to be quite as reprehensible to violate law that provides for protection of workmen, that gives the right to unionize, that provides methods for measuring labor that the workingman may get his full earnings, as it is to injure property and person.

"It has cost the State already three-quarters of a million dollars to protect the property of the operators—and another quarter of a million has been provided in anticipation of need for further protection. It is not unlikely that yet another million will be spent to continue that protection, and even then the end may not be in sight. When the burdened taxpayer recalls that all of this vast expenditure might have been saved had the operators but consented to a conference; if they had but met the chosen representatives of the miners to learn whether an agreement that did not include recognition of the union might be reached; and that peace will immediately follow if they even now consent to arbitration at the hands of big, broad-minded national men to be appointed by the President of the United States with recognition excluded, can the taxpayer be blamed for growing restless and bitter against the side that blocks such settlement? The operators certainly do owe something to the great taxpaying public even though that something carries with it a wound to their pride and a recession from what is to-day a very questionable position, measuring it by obligations to society and the State.

"If this condition is to continue and the General Government refuses longer to perform police duty for the State, what then? The claim is made, and a delegation went to Washington to impress it upon the President, that the State would be involved in civil war should the militia be returned to the strike district, and that State-wide murder, rapine, and arson are certain to follow and be extended into other States should that occur. Frankly, I don't believe it. To be sure, if the militia should be returned, officered in whole, as it was, with former mine guards and members of private detective companies defiling its ranks, with its commander turned loose to use force without regard to law and in utter disregard of the most cherished rights of citizenship, serious trouble would most likely follow and the worst predictions might be verified. But I firmly believe that those interested in the welfare of the guards, as well as in their restoration to an efficient and dependable body of the State's defenders, will see to it that all improper persons are retired from its ranks. If certain officers who have lost public confidence and all former mine guards and employees of private detective agencies shall be excluded from the militia, and if the governor will but instruct the commander that efficiency must be retained and that all civil writs must be respected, and that those who are arrested shall have the right to consult with counsel and be turned over to the civil authorities, with the cause of their arrest, I believe that the State troops would be as efficient as the regular soldiers and as willingly obeyed as they have been in the past.

"STATE MILITIA SHOULD BE PURGED.

"And why should not this be done? The members of the State militia are not mercenary soldiers in any sense. They serve the State as patriots, confronting privations, sickness, and death from sense of duty and love of country. They naturally respect and expect discipline, and have all the fine sense of justice that move young men who thus devote themselves to State and duty. It is the more important that in our grave troubles which require their presence in the field that the high standard of the entire body of the State troops should be maintained. No hired members of detective agencies, nor those who owe their just duty to private employers who at the time are in conflict with their former workmen, are fit members of the State guards in such troubles as are now on. They contaminate the service, they degrade its morals, they naturally run to excesses against which all brave and honorable men revolt. Nor should militia officers whose course has been so questionable that courts-martial must be resorted to to officially determine whether they have been guilty of grave and even of heinous crimes, be continued as members of the body, except it might be in very, very rare and exceptional instances, which it is not now necessary to look for.

"And it should not be forgotten that what is denominated a labor war is not 'war' as between two foreign countries, nor even is it civil war. Those upon both sides in such struggles are usually either American citizens or they intend to become such as soon as the law will permit. They are not arrayed against the Government, nor is it their aim to subvert it. Strikes grow out of economic conditions in which the two sides believe interests are antagonized. The State intervenes only as it becomes necessary to enforce respect for law and the right of person and property.

"I mention this to enforce my claim that in no such conflict, severe as it has been and may yet be if wiser counsels do not prevail, is it necessary to set aside the constitutional safeguards of the citizen, to defy the writ of habeas corpus, and to hold prisoners arrested on mere suspicion or because the military head conceives that it is unwise to allow them to remain at large—incommunicado—denying them the right of counsel and of appeals to courts and the privilege of communicating with friends or family. The commanding officer who, in a State like Colorado, can not enforce the law without violating its most cherished safeguards is unfit to command. That the disregard of the civil rights of men and women and of the law intended to enforce them was the provocation for much of the worst violence that shocked the State, I have not the slightest doubt. To respect these rights might impose greater trouble upon those in authority, but the violence that such trouble would avoid would compensate for it ten times over. The Moyer case, under which all of this is defended, is bad law and bad morals and approaches more nearly to constitutional treason than any other happening in the State that I can now recall.

"ARBITRATION SHOULD BE PROVIDED.

"The only conclusion to which any dispassionate discussion of the question can lead is that our constitution should be so amended as to permit the State of Colorado to provide arbitration and to enforce the decrees. Arbitration may not always result in justice; neither do the judgments of our courts. It is impossible that any human tribunal can be always right; it is the average of results to which the public must look. A State board of arbitration wisely selected would, I am convinced, afford as satisfactory results in labor controversies as do our high courts in other disputes. At least since we must defer to human agencies whatever they may be to settle labor as well as all other serious conflicts, why not commit labor settlements to such a body; this at least until in the process of evolution a wiser plan can be worked out and adopted? Why should not a proper constitutional amendment be initiated and submitted to the State's voters at the coming election?

"I think a very grave injustice has been done the State in the exaggerations that have been indulged in in dealing with the deplorable conflicts of the strike. In the end the truth of it all will become fixed in the public mind. I felt at the time of the Ludlow tragedy that it was impossible that women and children could have been deliberately shot and burned even by the so-called gunmen. What occurred was bad enough, even when put into most favorable light, but our State's humanity has not been blackened with the indelible crime of having willfully shot down and herding women and children into pits, there to be smothered and burnt to death. It is deplorable that men and women should enter upon crusades throughout the rest of the country to fasten such a stain upon the State, though their pretext may be to force an end to the strike and to advance humanity and justice."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Colorado asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. I withdraw my amendment.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. HOLLAND having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. Tulley, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed joint resolution and bill of the following titles, in which the concurrence of the House of Representatives was requested:

S. J. Res. 159. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the transfer of a certain unexpended balance in appropriations for salaries of Capitol police; and

S. 5739. An act to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment bill of the following title:

H. R. 14189. An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River near Kansas City.

SUNDRY CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia, Pa.:
For one high-explosive loading shop and its equipment, $32,000;
For magazine protection, $6,000;
For increasing facilities for fire protection, including the installation of a motor-driven pump and the construction of a building to contain the same, $19,000;
In all, $57,000.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, by adding after the line 17, page, 52, the following as a new paragraph:

"For the purchase or acquirement by condemnation proceedings of about 25 acres of land adjoining the arsenal grounds on the northeast side thereof, $100,000."

Mr. MANN. To that, Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, this is the last piece of land available for the further extension of the Frankford Arsenal at Philadelphia. The total area occupied by the arsenal is about 65 acres. The reservation is bounded on three sides by the Delaware River, the Frankford Creek, and some public streets. It is impossible to extend the arsenal grounds an inch unless we acquire this property, and it may not be available very long. We who have inspected the arsenal know that its needs in the way of new buildings for storage and other purposes are pressing. At the present time the Government is obliged to ship to the Picatinny Arsenal high explosive ammunition at a cost of $18,000 a year, which could be stored at Frankford Arsenal if we only had the room. Eighteen thousand dollars is the interest on $300,000, and this land will cost only $100,000.

Forty years ago a board of ordnance officers recommended the purchase of 75 acres for that purpose. A part of that land has since been taken up by manufacturing establishments, and 25 acres is all that remains. In 18 months Frankford Arsenal by its operations has saved the Government almost $2,000,000. The powder magazines are so close to the workshops that they are a positive menace to the employees of the place. The acquirement of this land would give 600 additional feet along the Delaware River, and is particularly desirable on that account.

Several prices for the land have been mentioned, but I am credibly informed by well-posted real estate men in that locality that we can secure it by condemnation proceedings for less than $100,000. The amount I have placed in the amendment would cover all costs incident to the acquirement of the ground. I hope the committee will accept the amendment in behalf of the most economical workshop that our Government has in this country.

Mr. VARE. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by my colleague, Mr. DONOHOE. The purchase of this additional land was discussed by the Appropriation Committee some little time ago. At that time the chairman of the committee said that there were no requests from the Secretary of War, and that there was no recommendation from Gen. Crozier, the officer in charge. My information since then is that Secretary of War Garrison has recommended and has approved of the purchase of this additional land.

My knowledge of the surroundings are such as to say to this committee that this expenditure of money is justified in every particular. Frankford Arsenal has only 4 acres for 100 employees, as compared with some of the other arsenals where there are 20 or 22 acres for the same number of employees.

As has been stated by my colleague, we are spending $18,000 a year for the purpose of storage and transportation of the high explosives which are manufactured there. If this ground is purchased, it will be in line with a proper extension of this great plant, which is one of the most efficient and economic plants conducted by either private or Government enterprise, and I certainly hope that the chairman of the committee, having in mind the additional information that the Secretary of War has sent letters favoring this proposition, will be willing to accept the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. LOGUE. Mr. Chairman, I just want to add a word to what has been said by my two colleagues, adding this additional thought: There is absolute necessity for an extension of the plant, an extension that has in view the safety of the employees. The very high explosive shops are located now immediately adjacent to large buildings where hundreds of employees are at work, and if we had no other thought in mind excepting that of safety of the employees by having offered to us a piece of ground where the high explosive shops could be placed, that should move us to a favorable consideration of the offer. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. CARR] has also visited this place and is fully familiar with the situation. It is an old governmental industry, if I may so term it, in Philadelphia. It has not received any great consideration in the way of extensions in the past. By reason of the peculiar condition, as has been stated, of the Delaware River being on one side and the Frankford Creek on the other, it makes it decidedly valuable for the establishment at that point of these shops, where they will do no harm to the workmen or to the adjacent property. I think the amendment as worded is proper. My colleague has carefully worded it by placing a limit on the amount of $100,000, providing that that should be expended for the ground, to be acquired either by condemnation proceedings or by purchase. The property is now in the hands of an estate for the benefit of the University of Pennsylvania, and I feel can be acquired, and I think the entire circumstances surrounding the holding of the land makes it possible for us to acquire it at this time, which is now necessary, and it may be impossible to get it in the future.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, I am heartily in favor of the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE], and I wish to state in addition that I have a letter in my hand, dated April 14, 1914, from Secretary of War Garrison, to Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON, chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds of the Senate. That letter is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, April 14, 1914.

Hon. CLAUDE A. SWANSON,
Chairman Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds,
United States Senate, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SENATOR: I return herewith the bill (S. 5055) to provide for the acquirement of about 25 acres of land adjoining the Frankford Arsenal, Philadelphia.

The principal reasons for the purchase of this property by the Govermnent are as follows:

1. To avoid the serious situation which would arise if this property should be purchased by parties who would desire to utilize it for dwellings or factory purposes, since there is no doubt that in case such buildings should be erected upon the property the occupants would object to the experimental firings and other tests involving the use of high explosives which are conducted at the Frankford Arsenal.

2. The utilization of the property for the storage of explosives so as to remove them a safe distance from the present shop buildings.

3. To utilize the property for the construction of certain storehouses and shop buildings which will undoubtedly be necessary in the expansion of the manufacturing plant at the Frankford Arsenal in the future and for which it would be impossible to secure grounds if this piece of property shall irrevocably pass to other uses.

The War Department has in the past submitted estimates for the purchase of this property, but I have not repeated the estimate, not because the purchase would not be advantageous and such as would be made by any efficient corporation in a similar position, but because other needs of the War Department have been so immediately pressing that I have been obliged to let this particular matter rest, although I recognize that in doing so the danger is incurred of the passage of the opportunity to make the purchase advantageously.

I believe that the land is now practically owned by the University of Pennsylvania, having been left to it as a part of an estate. I think a fair price would be somewhere between $140,000 to $150,000, so that the amount carried in the bill—$154,000—should be sufficient to include the cost of condemnation proceedings should such be necessary, as contemplated by the bill.

Sincerely, yours,

LINDLEY M. GARRISON,
Secretary of War.

The Secretary wrote that letter on April 14 and is very much in favor of the the purchase of the ground. I really think we ought to take advantage of the proposition at this time and purchase it.

Mr. CARR. Mr. Chairman, I had occasion to visit Philadelphia some time ago, and while there I went over the arsenal property mentioned in this amendment. I believe that if the Government of the United States is to continue this system of arsenals throughout the country, the acquirement of additional ground is absolutely necessary at this time. It is simply a question of whether we are going to purchase this ground and use it for arsenal purposes, or whether we are going to abandon the ground that we have there now. Some time ago I made some remarks touching the question of ammunition manufactured at these arsenals. We have it on reliable testimony before Congress, or at least before one of the committees, that if the arsenal at Philadelphia were given the contracts that are now turned over to private enterprise the Government would save in one year, by reason of the difference in the cost of the manufacture, approximately $500,000, or an amount sufficient for the purchase of this ground and the erection of the buildings needed at the Frankford Arsenal. This ground will pass out of the present ownership in all probability in a little while. It will be beyond the power of Congress to get hold of it, and it will be but a question of time when the work at this arsenal must of necessity stop. And it does seem to me, as a business proposition, aside from the pressing need of this property, that the Government ought to purchase it at this time, otherwise we will have to stop work at the Frankford Arsenal. That is the proposition and the only thing that I see in it. They have no adequate ground at Frankford for their rifle range, and the construction of new buildings is impossible. If the Government is to continue the policy of manufacturing ammunition and maintaining its arsenals, it becomes necessary that we acquire this ground at once, or that it sell the present site and purchase property elsewhere. I think it is a good proposition from every consideration, and in view of the attitude of the authorities who have examined the question, I think that the Congress would make no mistake in the adoption of this amendment.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word in behalf of this amendment. It is a timely amendment and it is one that ought to be adopted because of the actual necessity that exists at this arsenal. The arsenal is crowded. The workmen there manufacture all of the small-arms ammunition for the Army and Navy of the United States. Shipments of powder have to be made to that yard, and large quantities of it have to be stored there. High explosives are there in great abundance in a very narrow and restricted area. During recent years it has been the tendency of the Government to rather increase the working capacity of other arsenals than the Frankford Arsenal, which is the oldest and perhaps the most economically conducted of them all. I think the figures will bear out that statement. Rock Island, in particular, for which we have every good wish, has been especially favored during recent years, and I think during the last 10 years has attained by way of appropriation probably $975,000 or $1,000,000, as against $375,000 altogether assigned to the Frankford Arsenal. The policy of building up the Rock Island Arsenal is one against which we have no special complaint, nor have we any complaint about the building up of any other arsenal in the country, except that certain lines of small-arms ammunition are in particular made exclusively at the Frankford Arsenal by reason of labor conditions and cost of production, and by reason of the ability of that arsenal to successfully compete with private manufacturers. In the bill passed last year it was noticeable that the Frankford Arsenal did not receive any very great amount of consideration. The appropriation in the sundry civil bill for the Frankford Arsenal last year was $4,000 for the construction of a concrete sewer, and at that time $250,000 was given to the Rock Island Arsenal to increase the capacity of the plant. The total appropriated was $280,500.

Now, in the bill we have before us to which this amendment has been offered the Frankford Arsenal is given a little better consideration than heretofore in that some provision has been made for fire protection and for the erection of an explosive-loading shop, for which the people there have been asking for a long time, and it is absolutely necessary for the preservation and proper protection of life, of which some have been lost during this last year in explosions that occurred at that yard. Now, in this bill the total amount provided for the Frankford Arsenal is $57,000, and the policy of building up Rock Island is continued here in that Rock Island receives $127,322. I do not make these comparisons for the purpose of being invidious at all, because I presume all the Members of the Pennsylvania delegation wish Rock Island well. But we make small-arms ammunition there, and all there is made of it, and we have men packed in the buildings there almost like sardines. They have to make tests there, and they have such a small area in which they do so that much material has to be sent away over to other proving grounds in order that the work may be properly conducted. Now, to take over this piece of ground means that we would have a new testing ground and proper storage places segregated. We need more room for the various elements entering into the manufacturing of small-arms ammunition and the other materials that we make there so economically, and it would be for the protection of the lives of the employees, as well as in the interest of the Government generally, if this amendment should be passed. It has been recommended since 1875, and if favorably considered now would simply be an act of justice to one of the best yards belonging to the Government.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, this item may have been recommended back in 1875, but it has not been formally estimated for by the department since I have been a Member of the House, during the last 16 years, despite the statement of the Secretary of War made in his communication of April 14, 1914, to the chairman of the Committee on Public Buildings and Grounds in the Senate. This item first appeared to my knowledge in 1909 when a bill was introduced to appropriate $180,000 to purchase 35½ acres of upland and 2½ acres of land under water outside of the bulkhead. It was not estimated for, it was not recommended by the department. The following year a bill was introduced to appropriate $175,000 to buy the same land. This year a bill was introduced to appropriate $154,000, and it now appears that 12½ acres of the land have been taken up by some enterprising industrial establishment and that 25½ acres still remain undisposed of. It is suggested that it would be wise for the Government of the United States to acquire this property so that the University of Pennsylvania may rid itself of an unproductive property and permit the Government to attach it to the arsenal.

Mr. DONOHOE. Will the gentleman yield for a question there?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I will yield.

Mr. DONOHOE. The University does not desire to sell this to the Government and has not suggested it at all.

Mr. MADDEN. Does anybody know whether you can buy it for——

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, a point of order. The gentleman from Illinois can not interrupt the gentleman without addressing the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When certain gentlemen from Philadelphia, distinguished citizens, appeared before the committee they stated that they thought that the property was worth from $140,000 to $150,000; but one representative from that State thought it perhaps worth $130,000 to $135,000. The Secretary of War in his letter of April 14, 1914, says, which just shows how much he knows about the value of the land that he is recommending shall be purchased by Congress, "I think a fair price would be somewhere between $140,000 and $150,000; so that the amount carried in the bill, $154,000, should be sufficient to include the cost of condemnation proceedings should such be necessary, as contemplated in the bill." Under date of June 2, 1914, I have a letter from the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] in which he stated that in the previous week he had a talk with the president of the Pennsylvania Co., of Philadelphia, the corporation which is the executor of the estate of Charles Leddig, which estate owns the property, and he agreed to accept $125,000 for the property.

The pending amendment proposes to appropriate $100,000 for the property. Now, in view of this history——

Mr. MADDEN. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a minute—in view of the fact that here has been no anxiety shown on the part of the department to acquire this property, because it has not, at least in the 15 years I have been a Member of the House, made any formal request in the manner required by law to purchase the property, and in view of the fact that the price has steadily been dropping, dropping, dropping, from $180,000 to $100,000, it seems to me that in view of the fact there is no pressing necessity for acquiring the property, if we be a little patient, without very much difficulty we will acquire the property for a sum that perhaps will be commensurate with its value. I now yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MADDEN. I was just going to ask the gentleman a question, which the gentleman has answered, and that is, namely, whether the gentleman objects to the fact that the price keeps on dropping?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not. I believe that with the patience that is sometimes commendable on the part of the Government when property is to be sold to it that if we are patient, in view of what has happened in five years, we may do much better in the very near future.

Mr. MOORE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes.

Mr. MOORE. Has not Gen. Crozier appeared before the committee at some time or other and advocated the increase of the yard area at that station?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; he did not.

Mr. MOORE. His position is well known, and I have had it from him personally on several occasions that he favored——

Mr. FITZGERALD. There is a manner in which officials should make their position known. If it were desirable, if it were deemed important, if it were imperative that the United States acquire this land at this arsenal or land at any other arsenal, it is the duty of the War Department to make that request in a formal estimate, transmit it properly to Congress, and not be going in roundabout ways attempting to obtain it by informal agitation. The real reason suggested for the acquisition of the property is not that there is any danger to employees at Frankford Arsenal because this land has not been acquired; but in the event some foolhardy persons should utilize this land, not for manufacturing purposes, for which it is only suited, but for residential purposes, they might object to the Government conducting its tests on its present range.

Therefore, to eliminate the possibility of objection on the part of those who might utilize this land for residential purposes, it is suggested that we should purchase the land, lying there unused these many years, and for which nobody seems to be able to find any particular use. The continual suggestion is made to sell it to the Government. It already has land adjacent to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from New York has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I ask unanimous consent for two or three minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent for three minutes more. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. DONOHOE. Does the gentleman state that there is available land adjacent to it?

Mr. FITZGERALD. I said the Government land is adjacent to this unused, unoccupied property about which these attempts have been made for many years to sell to the Government.

Mr. DONOHOE. You know that this tract was originally 75 acres, and it is all gone but 25 acres.

Mr. FITZGERALD. My first acquaintance with it showed that it was 35½ acres in 1899. In 40 years about 50 acres have been taken up.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman says they are conducting a dangerous manufacturing work at this place. If that be true the proper and wise thing would not be to continue to enlarge the scope of operations of this character almost in the heart of the peaceful city of Philadelphia to the danger and hazard of the lives of those peaceful and God-fearing people. We have other arsenals so located that they are not near congested districts, and if necessary the desirable thing would be to build them up.

Mr. EDMONDS. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. FITZGERALD. In just a moment. There is no need to enlarge the facilities of the Frankford Arsenal. There are ample facilities to do all of the things for which appropriations are made for the next year, or will be made for the next four or five years, and at the end of the four years the Government will have, by manufacturing at its own plants, acquired the full reserve of ammunition required, and instead of appropriating annually $4,200,000, as we have done for next year, the annual appropriation for such ammunition will not exceed $500,000 a year. The more we enlarge these plants the more idle plants we will have with idle capital invested in them. We have now facilities sufficient to manufacture the ammunition for which the appropriations are made next year, amounting to $4,200,000—$3,000,000 in the Army bill and $1,200,000 in the fortification bill. We need no extension of our facilities. Therefore it would be foolhardy to invest additional money to relieve somebody from the occupation of land for which they have no use and for which the Government will have very little use. I hope the amendment will not prevail.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I ask that the gentleman have two minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York be permitted to proceed for two minutes. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. MOORE. I want the gentleman to state the area of the arsenal at Rock Island.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I think it is fifty-odd acres. I have it here.

Mr. MOORE. Is it not nearer a thousand acres?

Mr. GOOD. It is between 800 and 900 acres.

Mr. MOORE. The gentleman from New York has the Frankford Arsenal figures.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I did not understand the gentleman's question. It is nearly 1,000 acres—about a section and a half, if I recall correctly.

Mr. MOORE. You have plenty of room there for expantion. That is the very point. There is no room for expansion in the present yard at Philadelphia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Why should we buy land when we have unlimited land undeveloped, and where we have a water power which supplies power to us infinitely cheaper than at any other arsenal?

Mr. MOORE. The power at Rock Island costs you more than it does at Philadelphia. You are putting it in the dam and in the building of bridges.

Mr. FITZGERALD. When we purchase power from the local company, we consider it high when we pay a cent and a half a kilowatt hour, and when we develop it, it is so insignificant it is hard to compute.

Mr. MOORE. I think I can state offhand and be fairly accurate at that, that the power at Rock Island costs about $24,500 and at Philadelphia about $24,000.

Mr. FITZGERALD. That depends on the amount of power obtained.

Mr. MOORE. And the cost at Rock Island is due to the fact that every year you make an appropriation of $12,500 for the maintenance of the dam, which we do not have to have at Philadelphia.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We do not have to have it, because we get our power from the water power there.

Mr. MOORE. I know, but you have to pay it, and you pay for it in an appropriation that does not appear as pertaining to power.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman is mistaken. When we figure the cost of power we do not simply look at the appropriations made. We have the computation made by men whose duty it is to keep the cost account.

Mr. DONOHOE. I ask the gentleman's attention for a minute. Does the gentleman know that the manufacturing at Frankford Arsenal has been much more economically conducted than at any other similar Government plant?

Mr. FITZGERALD. No; I do not know that.

Mr. DONOHOE. The War Department says so.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I have never heard it.

Mr. DONOHOE. And I think we ought to extend that plant rather than to send the work to a place where it costs far more to produce. My idea is that we can give this work to the Government shops, and we are working the Frankford Arsenal three shifts a day in time of peace. I do not think that is the proper way to do it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I was in error. We pay 1 cent a kilowatt hour when we have to purchase from the company at Rock Island, and at times when we have a surplus and they run down we sell it to them at the same rate. But we are not generating any power in any steam plant at any place in the Government service. It is 1 cent a kilowatt hour.

Mr. MOORE. I can give the gentleman the figures now. You pay every year $12,500 for the maintenance of the dam at Rock Island to generate power, and you pay about $12,000 for coal. That makes a total of $24,500. At Philadelphia coal costs $24,000, so that we are $500 to the good on a comparison.

Mr. FITZGERALD. If the gentleman will state the amount of power that is used at each plant, it will show that we are obtaining perhaps from four to ten times as much power for an equal expenditure of money at Rock Island as we are obtaining at the Frankford Arsenal, because we have at Rock Island a plant much more extensive than at Frankford, and it meets all of our requirements, lighting all the buildings on this 900-acre tract of land. After obtaining light and power for manufacturing purposes and all other purposes we are able to sell the surplus.

Mr. MADDEN. In one case it costs about $6 a horsepower and in the other case about $30.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. Do we not sell power?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois is not proceeding in order.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman, I decline to be interrupted by the gentleman from Connecticut. I am proceeding in order.

The CHAIRMAN. Yes; the gentleman from Illinois is proceeding in order; but the time of the gentleman from New York [Mr. FITZGERALD] has expired.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I suggest to the gentleman from Illinois to take some time himself.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. MANN. I will ask the gentleman if we do not sell our surplus at Rock Island at fourt-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour?

Mr. DONOVAN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] is out of order. He did not ask for recognition.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Connecticut is mistaken. The gentleman from Illinois asked for recognition and obtained it.

Mr. DONOVAN. It is so seldom that he proceeds in order that I withdraw my point at this time. [Laughter.]

Mr. MANN. I am proceeding in order, and the gentleman from Connecticutt never proceeds in order. I trust that the Chair will protect Members of the House from the nuisance of continuous interruptions by the Member from Connecticut.

Mr. DONOVAN. Now, Mr. Chairman, a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. DONOVAN. The gentleman is not addressing himself to the subject matter. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois was addressing himself to the subject matter. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. MANN. I asked that question of the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The statement of Col. Babbit was that we have arranged with the power company for the sale of power. We are entitled to a certain percentage of the output. We have an arrangement with them by which we buy or sell, selling power to them after the hours during which the plant is in operation. The statement is that we pay 1 cent per kilowatt hour. I am under the impression that we sell for the same, but I am not certain. It may be that we sell for less.

Mr. MANN. My impression is that we pay 1 cent per kilowatt hour when we buy power produced by steam, but that we sell the surplus power for four-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour if produced by water power, which would indicate that we are producing power there very cheaply.

Mr. FITZGERALD. We are indeed producing power there very cheaply. We have great water power there.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. EDMONDS. I would like to say to the gentleman that the Government made a contract with the party that owns the dam at Rock Island. Before the Government took over the property in order to get this power from the party the Government agreed to give one-fourth of the power free. The Government keeps up the repairs of the dam, and keeps everything in order, and give this party one-fourth for nothing.

Mr. MANN. Yes; and we have a lot of surplus power that is not used at all, and in addition to that we produce power there so cheaply that we sell it for four-tenths of a cent per kilowatt hour, which I think is probably as cheap as it is sold anywhere in the world.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Illinois insist upon his point of order?

Mr. MANN. It seems to me that the item is subject to a point of order, being for purchase or condemnation of land; but under the circumstances I shall not insist upon the point of order, and, so far as I am concerned, I will withdraw the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is withdrawn.

Mr. BARTLETT. Mr. Chairman, it ought not to go down that this is subject to a point of order necessarily, because the proposition is to acquire land adjoining that already owned by the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair made no ruling upon it. The Chair merely inquired if the gentleman withdrew his point of order.

Mr. MANN. To acquire by condemnation proceedings is legislation.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I should like to be heard on the point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from New York.

Mr. FITZGERALD. To acquire land by condemnation proceedings is legislation.

Mr. DONOHOE. Then I ask unanimous consent, Mr. Chairman, to amend the amendment by striking out the words "acquirement by condemnation proceedings."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] asks unanimous consent to modify his amendment. The Clerk will report it.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "for acquirement by condemnation proceedings" and add, on line 17, page 52, the following as a new paragraph:
"For the purchase of about 25 acres of land adjoining the arsenal grounds on the northeast side thereof, $100,000."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the amendment being modified as requested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken, and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I demand a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 27, noes 32.

Accordingly the amendment was rejected.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, after line 17, insert the following:
"For one artillery ammunition storehouse, $17,500."

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, this is an item on which there can be no such contention as that which was raised against my first amendment, namely, that the department does not favor it. The department requested this item, put in an estimate for it, and, I understand, it was arbitrarily knocked out by the committee. I trust the committee will reconsider their view of the matter and let this small sum stand. It is very much needed. Some of the members of the committee will bear me out in this.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, estimates were submitted for various public works at different arsenals, and the committee endeavored to recommend such improvements at the various arsenals as would enable the work to be carried on properly and efficiently and provide them with the necessary facilities.

The total improvements requested for the Frankford Arsenal aggregated, I think, $74,000, and the committee recommended items aggregating $57,000 for various facilities, but did not recommend this particular project.

The statement made by Gen. Crozier did not seem to show there was any very great need for this storehouse. They have been manufacturing the artillery ammunition and storing the component parts in various places. The committee believed that in making at this time an appropriation for a high-explosive loading shop and its equipment, which was very important for the safety of the operations of the arsenal—for protection for the magazine, to prevent accidents in case of explosions; for increased facilities for fire protection, including motor-driven pump, costing $19,000—it had been liberal and had given the things that were really essential. The department requests many items year after year. It is absolutely impossible to grant everything that the departments ask, but what has been done in this bill is to select three or four items that seem to be pressing at this time and make provision for them, and defer until some other time those that do not seem to be imperative. I hope the amendment will not be agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman insist on the point of order?

Mr. FITZGERALD. Yes; I insist on it. There is no authority for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman on the point of order.

Mr. FITZGERALD. It is not authorized.

Mr. MANN. It is for a new building.

Mr. DONOHOE. It is in continuation of a public work.

Mr. MANN. The rulings have always been that you could not appropriate for new buildings unless they were previously authorized.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has in mind a ruling made with reference to a building at the Military Academy.

Mr. MANN. That was a different proposition. The rulings have always been the other way.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks, under the precedents, it is subject to the point of order, and the Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, I offer a further amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania offers a further amendment, which the Clerk will report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 52, after line 17, insert the following:
"For extension of metal storehouse, $13,500."

Mr. DONOHOE. Mr. Chairman, this item was also recommended in the estimate submitted by the department, and it certainly is urgently needed at this time.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, the same statement can be made relative to this item as to the other. This is a proposition to extend a storehouse in which scraps are stored. It appeared to the committee that there were ample facilities for the storage of scraps used in the manufacturing processes of the arsenal, and there did not seem to be any particular necessity for the addition to the building.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE].

The committee divided; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DONOHOE) there were—ayes 35, noes 31.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 35, the noes are 31. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The Clerk called the roll, and the following Members failed to answer to their names:

The committee rose; and the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DIXON, having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the sundry civil appropriation bill, and, finding itself without a quorum, had caused the roll to be called, when 220 Members answered to their names, and he presented therewith a list of the absentees.

The committee resumed its session.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to the paragraph.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that there is an amendment pending. I make the point that the proceedings were set aside by the point of no quorum.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, there is no amendment pending. The amendment that had been under consideration was passed by the committee and so announced by the Chair.

Mr. MADDEN. I desire to state, Mr. Chairman, that when the point of no quorum was made, that set aside the action of the committee.

Mr. MOORE. I contend that the point of order was made after the amendment had been considered, voted upon, and passed, and so announced by the Chair. The point of order was made subsequently and can have no effect on the amendment. I had already offered a new amendment and had been recognized by the Chair before the point of order was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will read from the notes of the reporter.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE].

The committee divided, and on a division, demanded by Mr. DONOHOE, there were—ayes 35, noes 31.

The CHAIRMAN. On this question the ayes are 35, the noes 31. The amendment is agreed to.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order that there is no quorum present.

Mr. MOORE. I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] makes the point of order that there is no quorum present. The Chair will count. [After counting.] Eighty-three Members present, not a quorum. The Clerk will call the roll.

The question is whether under those circumstances the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] has been agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I make the point that it has not, and that all action on that amendment was set aside when it was developed that no quorum was present. The mere fact that the challenge of a quorum was made gives evidence of the further fact that those present and making such a challenge believed that the action of the committee was void because of the lack of a quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. It seems from the notes of the reporter, however, that the point was not made until the Chair had not only announced the number of votes but had made the formal official announcement that the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MADDEN. Mr. Chairman, I agree with the Chair to that extent; but no matter what the announcement of the Chair was, it can not be possible that the Chair by a mere announcement can legalize the action of a body not having a sufficient number of Members to transact business.

Mr. MOORE. That comes too late.

Mr. MADDEN. And the point of order of no quorum could not have been made until after the announcement of the vote, because it could not have been ascertained how many Members were present until the Chair made the announcement.

The CHAIRMAN. Of course, the usual custom of the present occupant of the chair and of all occupants of the chair is to pause after announcing the number voting. Whether the Chair did that in this instance the Chair does not now remember. Of course, tellers could have been demanded, and that was the next ordinary step, or the point of order of no quorum could have been made immediately after the announcement of the vote and before the Chair had announced that the amendment had been agreed to.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, if the point of order made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is sustained by the Chair, it would have the effect of invalidating perhaps three-fourths of the business conducted by Congress. It is constant that amendments are considered and passed when no quorum is present and it is evident to the Chair and to everyone that no quorum is present. Thus, by common consent, the business is transacted. This matter now arises by reason of the fact that an amendment was considered when no quorum was present and when, acting in the usual way and by common consent, the vote was taken and revealed that the amendment was agreed to. Upon the announcement of the Chair that the amendment was agreed to some one who was not in favor of the amendment protested against the proceedings, kicked over the bucket, and made the point of no quorum. If that is tolerated in the committee, and is sanctioned now by sustaining the point of order, we could perhaps prevent any business being done in this House under the ordinary method of procedure.

Mr. MADDEN. You could without a quorum.

Mr. MOORE. I contend, Mr. Chairman, that it comes with bad grace to make the point of order of no quorum after an amendment has been considered, debated by all those present, with notice to everyone, and after the result of the vote has been announced by the Chair, particularly when that point of order is made by a Member who has been a party to the discussion and who has been present during the proceedings. If that is sustained, then it will be easily within the power of any Member of this House, at any time, to block the business of the House and stop the work of these great appropriation committees, and put Congress practically at a standstill.

I contend, Mr. Chairman, that this point of order came entirely too late in the first instance, and that the point made by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MADDEN] is now too late, in view of the fact that the Chair, after the announcement that the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DONOHOE] had been agreed to, then recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] to offer another amendment, and that it was after that recognition of another Member upon an entirely different proposition that the point of order of no quorum was made.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will call the attention of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to the fact that he is in error about that. The recollection of the Chair was in accordance with the statement just made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, but the official report, by which, of course, we are all bound, shows that the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] made the point of order immediately before the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE] offered the amendment.

Mr. MOORE. As the Chair read the transcript of the shorthand notes a moment ago, it was clear to me that the gentleman from Pennsylvania rose and offered an amendment, and that immediately after he offered the amendment the gentleman from Illinois made the point of order.

Mr. DONOHOE. The gentleman was on his feet, but had not made the statement.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman is as correct about that as he usually is.

Mr. MOORE. Mr. Chairman, I like to be rebuked by my leader about once every week. I am getting used to it now about twice a week, and some time I suppose I shall be rebuked, like others, about once a day; but I do hope that the time will come when we will find the leader of the minority in accord with the members of his party at times. I have not in any way interrupted the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] to-day unfairly, nor have I raised points of order against him, like the gentleman from Connecticut [Mr. DONOVAN] has.

I have been as kind and gentle and patient as I could be with my leader, and as subservient as a loyal member of the minority ought to be; but I do believe that at times I have a right, when the interests of my constituents are at stake, to question whether or not my leader is right when he attempts to obstruct, perhaps in the interest of an arsenal near his own district, the progress of an arsenal in the vicinity of mine.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit the Chair before he begins?

Mr. MANN. Certainly.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to call attention to the fact that there is a special order for to-day, under which the House is to stand in recess from 5.30 until 8 o'clock, and it lacks only five minutes of that time.

Mr. MANN. I will take up but two minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair at this time will——

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, in order to give the Chair an opportunity to examine the question, I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. MANN. I want to be heard on the point of order; I have the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair was about to say that at 5.30 he will feel it is his duty to declare that the committee should rise and——

Mr. MANN. I hope the Chair will not occupy all the time between now and 5.30. I was about to remark that this is a very hot day, and the heat had evidently affected my friend from Philadelphia, the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MOORE].

Mr. MOORE. But I am sure not so much as it has my leader, the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN].

Mr. MANN. It has caused him to read me a lecture which was not necessary——

Mr. MURDOCK. And unkind.

Mr. MANN. And to attach another one to it, and it seems to me the heat has gone to his head, that is all.

The CHAIRMAN. These things are interesting but they are not enlightening to the Chair at all. The Chair has also felt the heat himself.

Mr. MURDOCK. Another evidence of more trouble in the Republican Party.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York moves that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and Mr. DIXON, the Speaker pro tempore, having resumed the chair, Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 17041, the sundry civil appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. THACHER, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. POWERS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. THOMAS, indefinitely, on account of important business.

To Mr. MORGAN of Louisiana, for 10 days, on account of important business.

To Mr. REED, for two weeks, on account of business.

HOUR OF MEETING TO-MORROW.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourns to-day it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. I want to say there is a conference report that must be acted upon.

Mr. MANN. I am glad of it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects.

SENATE BILL AND JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill and joint resolution were taken from the Speaker's table and referred to their appropriate committees, as indicated below:

S. 5739. An act to present the steam launch Louise, now employed in the construction of the Panama Canal, to the French Government; to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce.

S. J. Res. 159. Joint resolution authorizing and directing the transfer of a certain unexpended balance in appropriations for salaries of Capitol police; to the Committee on Appropriations.

ENROLLED BILLS PRESENTED TO THE PRESIDENT FOR HIS APPROVAL.

Mr. ASHBROOK, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that this day they had presented to the President of the United States, for his approval, the following bills:

H. R. 11040. An act to carry out the findings of the Court of Claims in the case of James Harvey Dennis; and

H. R. 14242. An act to increase the limit of cost for the erection and completion of the United States Federal building at Harrisburg, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS.

Mr. TAVENNER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Philippine independence.

Mr. MANN. I can not hear the gentleman, and unless he speaks louder so that we can hear him, I will object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD on the subject of Philippine independence.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the subject of this bill in reference to taxation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

Mr. MANN. In reference to what?

Mr. BAILEY. Taxation in reference to appropriations.

Mr. MANN. There is no taxation in regard to this bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. The gentleman's request is in reference to these amendments and these particular appropriations.

Mr. MANN. I have no objection to that, but this bill does not carry anything in reference to taxation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, we are appropriating for the fiscal year 1915 on account of wars of the past or those anticipated the staggering sum of $500,000,000. Round figures are employed for the reason that the exact amounts are not yet known and can not be ascertained until all appropriation bills carrying provisions for Army, Navy, pensions, etc., have been finally acted upon, but the ultimate figures are more likely to exceed than to fall below the aggregate named. The economy we promised the people in the Baltimore platform is not being realized, in this respect at least. Our war budget exhausts half or perhaps more than half of all the taxes wrung from the people under the various forms still tolerated.

It has sometimes suggested itself to me what the American taxpayer, who is carrying this tremendous burden, would say were his Federal tax bill handed to him in some such simple form as that setting out his State, county, school, road, city, or municipal taxes. Most people seem to think that Uncle Sam is rich in his own right, and that the sums we appropriate here come from him and not from the pockets of the toilers. This is the evil, or at least one of the evils, of indirect taxation. Practically all the taxes paid for the support of the Federal Government are concealed taxes. They are fiscal sneakers. They slip up on the victim unawares. They rob him while his eyes are shut or when he is looking the other way. He knows he is hard up and in distress; that things are going ill with him; that somehow or other prosperity passes him by, but he rarely if ever connects the circumstances with the concealed tax.

Of course Uncle Sam is poor, as poor as Job's turkey. He has not a dollar that he has not first taken from John Smith or Bill Jones or Hank Brown. Smith and Jones and Brown do not know he has taken it. They are interested only in trying to get the dollar by some hook or crook, thus "putting money into circulation." "Putting money into circulation" is really a great thing. But sometimes it is well to inquire whose money and how it is being put into circulation.

It is not my purpose here to dwell at length on the subject of indirect taxation and the multitude of evils which follow, and necessarily follow, in its train. My design in rising just now is to present a few figures showing how the burden falls in my own district and among my own people. Below I shall present a table based on the census of 1910. In this table the population of my district—the nineteenth of Pennsylvania, including the counties of Bedford, Blair, and Cambria—is shown by minor civil divisions. The total population of the district in 1910 was 313,868, of which 38,879 were in Bedford, 108,858 in Blair, and 166,131 in Cambria. Estimating expenditures for wars, past and anticipated, at the conservative figure of $4.10 a head, men, women, and children—and the per capita is higher than this rather than lower—it is found that the distributive share of Bedford County is $159,403.90; that of Blair, $446,317.80; and that of Cambria, $681,137.10. If a direct tax in an equal amount were levied in these counties a revolution would follow. Any party responsible for such a monstrous burden upon the toilers would be destroyed by the fury of the masses. Yet the burden is borne without a murmur, since the nature of it is not understood.

I want to carry this thing home to my people just as directly as this may be done, and that is the object of the appended table. It tells its own story convincingly in plain figures which will stand the acid test. For instance, take the little hamlet of Newry in Blair County, with a population in 1910 of 380, its proportion of the total burden being $1,558. Or take the little town of New Paris in Bedford County, with a population in 1910 of 194. What is the distributive share of this little cluster of people? Why, Mr. Chairman, it is $795.40. Or take the town of South Fork in my own county of Cambria, with a population of 4,592 in 1910. What does its share total up? I do not know how much South Fork pays in State, county, borough, and school taxes, but I feel reasonably sure that they do not exceed $4.10 per capita, and at this rate South Fork's distributive share of the burden for wars past or anticipated reaches the comfortable aggregate of $18,827.20. My own city of Johnstown, with a population of 55,482 in 1910, faces a little charge on this account of $227,476.20, while Altoona, with a population in 1910 of 52,127, must "come across" with $213,720.70. The cost in detail for the minor civil divisions in the nineteenth district is given in the following table:

RECESS.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Under the special order the House will now stand in recess until 8 o'clock to-night.

Thereupon (at 5 o'clock and 30 minutes p. m.) the House stood in recess until 8 o'clock p. m. to-night.

EVENING SESSION.

The recess having expired, at 8 o'clock p. m. the House was called to order by the Speaker pro tempore, Mr. DIXON.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the special order under which business will be transacted to-night.

The Clerk read as follows:

On motion of Mr. POU, by unanimous consent,

Ordered, That on Friday, June 12, 1914, the House stand in recess from 5.30 o'clock p. m. until 8 o'clock p. m., and from which hour until 11 o'clock p. m. bills on the Private Calendar, beginning with No. 132, and which are not objected to shall be taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I want to make a suggestion to the effect that some of these bills will take quite a while to read, and if there is any gentleman who has determined to object to the consideration of a bill, a great deal of time can be saved if he will be good enough to interpose the objection immediately after the reading of the title. Some of these bills will take 10 minutes to read. If any gentleman intends to object anyhow, it would save a good deal of time and expedite the consideration of this calendar to a very considerable extent if he should pursue that course.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman ask that that question be put?

Mr. POU. I will not ask unanimous consent that that course be pursued, because it might be considered that we were proceeding with undue haste in the consideration of this calendar here, but I merely cast it out as a suggestion that any gentleman can adopt, if he sees fit, in the interest of saving time.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first bill.

JAMES T. M'KENNEY.

The first business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6506) for the relief of James T. McKenney.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

BOLOGNESI, HARTFIELD & CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5859) for the relief of Bolognesi, Hartfield & Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CLAIM OF STATE OF RHODE ISLAND.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4273) referring the claim of the State of Rhode Island to the Court of Claims for adjudication.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that this is not a Private Calendar bill. I do not care whether that is disposed of now or not.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I ask that the full bill be reported. Is it a long one?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. No. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read the bill in full.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The bill is not properly on the Private Calendar, but by unanimous consent it can be considered.

Mr. MANN. I make the point of order. It should go to the Union Calendar.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is sustained.

ELIZABETH BRUCE, DECEASED.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13693) for the relief of the legal representatives and heirs of Elizabeth Bruce, widow of the late John H. Bruce.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to have the bill read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to say that in the urgent deficiency bill, the act of December 22, 1911, there was inserted a limitation providing that claims of this character might be submitted to the War Department on or before December 31, 1912. I wish to ask the gentlemen on the committee whether it was the policy of the committee, on claims of that sort, to pay no attention to this limitation? This bill, I will say to the gentlemen, is for pay and bounty due a soldier of the Twenty-second Regiment Kentucky Infantry. I judge that the man had had a claim for the pay and bounty. It is an old matter. Congress in 1911 reopened these cases and provided that they might be submitted to the War Department before the end of 1912. That was not done in this case. Whether it is the policy of the committee to pay no attention to a limitation of that sort, I do not know. I would like to know, because what is the use of putting in limitations if immediately when they expire the committee reports these bills?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Speaker, I had the writing of the report in the Committee on War Claims, and, if I remember correctly, this is a case where the claim was acknowledged and the necessary blanks sent by mail. The letter was misdirected, or miscarried. The letter with the application blank was not received, which caused the claimant to lose his opportunity. For that reason the claim was considered to be a valid one, and the Committee on War Claims recommended a favorable report on it. There is a report here that explains that in detail. I do not think there is any need of going further into it. It is due entirely to the miscarriage of a letter in the mails just ahead of the time when the claim would have been legally allowed.

Mr. FOSTER. Do I understand an application was filed?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Oh, yes; I think so. It was all in good order.

Mr. FOSTER. I did not understand that that law prohibited the completion of a claim that had been filed.

Mr. MANN. There was no application filed. On the contrary, on November 11, 1912, a letter was addressed to the claimant informing him that if he desired to complete the claim which was filed by his mother he should fill out and send back the blank form and application which were inclosed. This letter never reached the claimant, so that he paid no attention to it. There was a claim first filed by the mother on June 24, 1869, but it was never completed. She had no claim anyhow.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. This claim was presented, and in the committee it was apparently an orphan. It was acted upon strictly upon its merits. I think the bill is entitled to be passed.

Mr. MANN. As the gentleman will see, we reopened these claims and authorized them to be filed in the War Department, putting a limitation upon them.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is this a Bowman Act case? Is this one that would come under the Bowman Act?

Mr. MANN. Oh, no. It was not a Bowman Act case at all. If the man had filed the claim, I think he would have had a claim.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

REFERENCE OF CERTAIN CLAIMS TO THE COURT OF CLAIMS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the resolution (H. Res. 451) referring certain claims to the Court of Claims for finding of facts and conclusions of law under section 151 of the act of March 3, 1911, entitled "An act to codify, revise, and amend the laws relating to the judiciary."

The title of the resolution was read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, this would take considerable time, and I therefore object for the present.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

THOMAS HAYCOCK.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2696) for the relief of Thomas Haycock.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Thomas Haycock the sum of $500, to reimburse him for the said sum paid by him to the Government in excess of the amount of the surety bond signed by him in behalf of the late postmaster at Tropic, Utah.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

MARY WELCH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12623) for the relief of Mary Welch.

The bill was read.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2576) for the relief of John Q. Adams.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the homestead entry of John Q. Adams, made June 23, 1909, for farm unit A on the Bellefourche reclamation project, South Dakota, under the act of June 17, 1902, for lots 1 and 2, section 2, township 9 north, range 4 east, Black Hills meridian, be, and the same is hereby, validated, subject to future compliance with the law.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

BAYARD T. GARRABRANT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9975) for the relief of Bayard T. Garrabrant.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $828.50 to Bayard T. Garrabrant, formerly first lieutenant in Company K, Second Regiment New Jersey Volunteer Infantry, to reimburse him for the same amount expended by him in payment for necessary care, medicines, and nourishment furnished him during his illness of typhoid fever, contracted at Jacksonville, Fla., while on detail duty, by Special Order No. 123, with said regiment in the year 1898, together with interest on said amount from the 1st day of January, 1898.

With committee amendments.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, page 1, line 5, by striking out the figures "$828.50" and inserting in lieu thereof "$403."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "together with interest on said amount from the 1st day of January, 1898."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

TRANQUILINO LUNA.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5991) to authorize the payment of $2,000 to the widow of the late Tranquilino Luna, in full for his contest expenses in the contested-election case of Manzanares against Luna.

The bill was read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. FOSTER. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOSTER] objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

BERNARD CITROEN.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill H. R. 4310, concerning certain moneys collected from Bernard Citroen as customs duties and declared by the United States Supreme Court to have been illegally exacted.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from Illinois withhold his objection for a while?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I suggest, however, that the bill better be read.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will read the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Whereas Bernard Citroen, on the 6th day of April, 1907, deposited with the collector of customs at the port of New York, under protest, the sum of $110,335 to secure a release to him of certain pearls imported by him on June 11, 1906, and on which pearls he already had paid duty to said collector at the rate of 10 per cent ad valorem under a classification made by the said collector of customs, but which classification was subsequently, on or about the 28th day of June, 1906, changed by the said collector and the duty exacted thereon increased from 10 per cent to 60 per cent ad valorem; and

Whereas the Board of General Appraisers at the port of New York did, on the 14th day of June, 1907, sustain the importer's protest and reversed the collector and classified and assessed for duty said pearls at 10 per cent ad valorem instead of 60 per cent, as exacted and obtained from said importer by said collector; and

Whereas the decision of the Board of General Appraisers was, on or about the 13th day of July, 1908, reversed by the United States circuit court in and for the second circuit, but on appeal to the United States circuit court of appeals in and for the second circuit, and on or about the 22d day of January, 1909, the decision of the said Board of General Appraisers was affirmed and the decision of the said circuit court was reversed; and

Whereas the said decision of the said circuit court of appeals in and for the second circuit was affirmed at the October, 1911, term of the Supreme Court of the United States; and

Whereas the said Bernard Citroen had to pay interest on and lost the use of said sum of $110,335 for and during the period it was detained from him, against his protest, by the said collector from the 6th day of April, 1907, to the 6th day of April, 1912: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury pay to Bernard Citroen, or his assigns, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, interest on said sum of $110,335 from the 6th day of April, 1907, to the 6th day of April, 1912, at the rate of 6 per cent per annum; and the payment of said interest shall be, and hereby is, declared to be in full settlement and discharge of all claims of said Bernard Citroen against the United States because of the withholding of said money.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the facts as they are recited in the bill are conceded by the Government. There is no question of fact in the matter. They may be briefly stated, and, lest from the reading of the bill some of the facts may have escaped the observation of the committee, I will allow myself at this moment to state the facts involved briefly.

Citroen is an importer. The firm is made up of citizens of the United States. Before the firm brought the pearls in question into this country they went to the collector of the port of New York and inquired what in the judgment of the collector would be the dutiable rate upon those pearls, or, in other words, under what classification of the then tariff the pearls would be entered. The collector said they were classified at 10 per cent, and upon that statement the price was fixed between the purchaser and the importer. The importer ascertained the price abroad, as stated in the bill—$223,000—and added to that the duty at the rate of 10 per cent, and then added to that his contemplated profit, and probably his insurance, and that, with perhaps some incidental charges, aggregated the purchase price agreed upon between the customer here and the importer. The pearls came in and 10 per cent was paid and accepted by the collector. They were then delivered to the customer by the importer, and the customer, as I understand, wore the pearls for some little time. The customer was then called upon by one of the customs officers, who informed her that he had been directed by the collector to take those pearls to the appraiser's office, inasmuch as it was then claimed by the collector that the pearls should have been classified at the rate of 60 per cent. The additional 50 per cent was demanded from the importer. The importer at first refused to pay that additional 50 per cent. Thereupon the importer was threatened with prosecution. It was claimed by the customs officers that unless additional 50 per cent, amounting to one hundred and ten thousand two hundred and odd dollars, was paid the pearls would be formally seized and prosecution begun in the Federal court.

The attention of the collector of the port was called to the fact that the 10 per cent had been originally fixed by him as the proper rate, and also to the fact that the 10 per cent had been paid and had been accepted. The customs officers would listen to nothing except that they wanted the $110,200 laid down in cash. They refused to accept a bond; they declined to accept any security for the money. Then the importers were compelled to raise the $110,200, and, having raised it at interest, paid it over to the collector under protest. An appeal was then taken by the importer to the Board of General Appraisers and that board reversed the action of the collector and decided in favor of the importer. The Government still insisted that it was right in its demand for the additional 50 per cent, and took an appeal to the circuit court of the United States. The importer then asked to have the $110,200 and odd returned to him upon his giving adequate security. He stood ready to give any kind of security—surety bond, bonds of real-estate owners, bonds of business men, any kind of security—that should have been acceptable to the Government, yet the Treasury Department and the customs officers combined refused to take security and kept that large sum of money locked up in the Treasury. The appeal went on. A single judge sitting in the circuit court differed with the Board of General Appraisers and an appeal was then taken by the importers to the circuit court of appeals, where, after argument, and after considerable delay, that court reversed the action of the single judge and affirmed the judgment of the Board of General Appraisers.

That should have been the end of it for two reasons, first, because the court had unanimously determined that the 50 per cent exaction was unwarranted and unjustified; and, second, because there was ample judicial authority for holding, before ever the circuit court of appeals made the ruling in the Citroen case, that the amount should not have been exacted.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. With pleasure; but I prefer to have the gentleman allow me to complete the statement.

Mr. MANN. I think it is hardly fair to the other bills on the calendar to go very far into it, and I would first like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Certainly.

Mr. MANN. As I understand the bill, it is for the payment of interest at 6 per cent on money which was deposited at the demand of the customs officers under protest, and it was paid under protest. That is the case, is it not?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand this bill is for the payment of damages.

Mr. MANN. For the payment of interest.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes; but I will come to that proposition in a moment. I think I know what is probably in the gentleman's mind.

Mr. MANN. Now, let us see. The Government collects very large sums of money every year, which are paid under protest. This is for the payment of interest on one of those sums. Does the gentleman imagine that, on the Unanimous-Consent Calendar, without an opportunity to consider the question, he can get this House to set the precedent of paying interest on money collected under protest by a collector of customs?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Illinois always reads carefully pretty much every report that comes into the House——

Mr. MANN. I have read this one.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. For which he is entitled to credit. He has undoubtedly seen, in the report of the Committee on Claims, the statement with regard to what Congress has done heretofore in other cases awarding interest.

Mr. MANN. Yes.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Notably in the Pennsylvania case, where the claim had been paid or liquidated in virtue of a bill passed by Congress to pay the principal sum; yet, years afterwards, this House—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] and I voting—voted to pay interest upon the Pennsylvania claim.

Mr. MANN. I never voted for the payment of interest on any of these claims, and am not willing now——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman was in the House at the time.

Mr. MANN. And I am not willing now to set the precedent, when the House has really no opportunity of considering the question. Therefore I am compelled to object.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will let me complete the statement of facts, then the gentleman can object. Why does he cut me off just as I reach stating the reversal in the circuit court of appeals?

Mr. MANN. If the other Members of the House are willing, I am quite content.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman withholds his objection.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman from New York yield?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Yes.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Is it the purpose of the gentleman from Illinois to object to this bill finally?

Mr. MANN. Oh, I think everybody in the House will object to passing a bill of this character by unanimous consent.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Then I appeal to the gentleman from New York, in view of the fact that it is going to be objected to, not to stand in the way of other bills on the calendar.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I do not wish to stand in the way of other bills; but just as I was making a statement which would have taken me less than two and a half minutes to complete, merely to state the action of the Supreme Court of the United States, I was met with this objection. I want to say very frankly to this House that if I am to be cut off from a statement that would not take three minutes, I do not think it will serve the purposes of this House to-night.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, if the gentleman will permit, I have no bill on the calendar and have no interest in the bills——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I understand that.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Except to expediate the general work. Of course, I shall not object to the gentleman concluding his statement.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, after the circuit court of appeals reversed the court below and affirmed the Board of General Appraisers, the Government still insisted upon proceeding and took an appeal to the Supreme Court of the United States. Again the offer of security was made and again refused, and the money was still kept locked up in the Treasury. Then the Supreme Court of the United States, all the judges concurring, the opinion being written by Mr. Justice Hughes, held that the action of the collector was unwarranted; that it was improper to take that $110,200; that there was no warrant in law whatever for that exaction; and that that position was sustained by decisions that had been rendered before the collector demanded this very large sum of money from the importer. Now, the importer had to borrow that money which was thus wrongly exacted. Will the gentleman from Illinois, with his fairness, say that this is not to be likened to a case where the Government enters upon real estate, unwarrantably seizes it, takes possession of it without the slightest right, and damages are asked for the wrongful act of the Government? Will the gentleman say that interest is not to be awarded by way of damages for this very unjust action? The gentleman says we are not prepared to consider the case at this moment. I repeat that there is not a question of fact arising here. The statement which I made of the facts can not be possibly denied. If the gentleman from Illinois will say that the Government does not concede each and every fact recited in the bill, I will withdraw the bill.

Mr. MANN. I notice that there is no report on this bill from the Treasury Department.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The Supreme Court record declares the facts. The opinion of Mr. Justice Hughes states the facts as they are substantially in the bill.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I would like to ask the gentleman if the fact, as originally stated by him as to the declaration of the collector, that 10 per cent was the rate to be imposed on the imports, is conceded by the Treasury officials?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. That is in the record as it comes to the Supreme Court of the United States and as it comes down in its remittitur.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. Then that might differentiate it from the ordinary case of a protest, because the importer was relying on the knowledge of the Government official.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. The gentleman from Rhode Island is correct. Now, I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois whether, in the face of the precedents, of the Pennsylvania case, the case where the Congress directed interest to be paid on a claim that had been paid to the claimant, and on the other case decided by the Comptroller of the Treasury, as stated in the report of the Committee on Claims, which is quite full—I appeal to the gentleman whether he ought now to object, whether he does not think that when the Government blunderbuss was held at the heads of these importers, when they were face to face with threats of prosecution, and through newspaper publications, perhaps, losing standing as business men, when they were compelled to pay this large sum of $110,000, without any law to sustain it, the importers who had to raise this money ought not to be reimbursed for the interest. They had to borrow the money. They certainly did not carry this amount around as loose change in their pockets. Are these men to go without a remedy for the wrong done them? Is that the way the citizens of the United States are to be handled by the Government? Is that the kind of Government we are living under? I hope the gentleman from Illinois will withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the pardon of the House for making a suggestion. We have some bills here, many of us, far down on the calendar. Gentlemen who have their minds made up know whether or not they are going to object to certain bills being considered. I believe it would be nothing but fair and right for a Member to make his objection at once, without argument on the merits of the bill. If they are going to be objected to in the end, object to them in the beginning, so that we can get through and let us see who is going to fall by the wayside.

Mr. MANN. If the gentleman will pardon me, I objected to this bill at first, but the gentleman from New York asked me to reserve my objection, and I shall continue to do that unless some brave man of the House asks for the regular order, which is within the province of any gentleman.

Mr. GARRETT of Texas. The point I am making is that I do not see any great deal of generosity in reserving an objection which you expect to make in the end and killing the time.

Mr. POU. This evening session of the House was agreed to for the purpose of passing bills about which there was no debate and to which there was no objection. There will be opportunity at this session to discuss these matters. The mere fact that a bill is objected to does not mean that it is not going to pass. It merely means that we do not take time to consider it.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. POU. Certainly.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Is it not a fact that throughout this entire Congress no claim bills have had consideration except those not objected to?

Mr. POU. Up to this time that is true, but we are hoping to get time in the future.

LEON GREENBAUM.

The next bill on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10168) for the relief of Leon Greenbaum.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $1,750 to Leon Greenbaum, of New York City, N. Y., to compensate him in full for all claims he may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by him while in the Government employ in the Brooklyn Navy Yard, Brooklyn, N. Y., in April, 1911.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the committee amendment, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the figures 5,000 and insert in lieu thereof the figures 1,750.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, by direction of the committee, I offer this amendment to the amendment, that the figures 1,750 be changed to $2,500. This man lost both legs, and the committee felt that $1,750 was too small an amount.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not insist on that amendment. In the first place, there is no report from the Navy Department on the bill. In the second place, if the man had been entitled to anything under the compensation law he would not have received as much as $1,750.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CYNTHA RAMEY.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14609) for the relief of Cyntha Ramey.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Cyntha Ramey, of Praise, Pike County, Ky., widow of Marion Ramey, who, while in the discharge of his duties as a posseman, having been duly summoned by and acting with J. M. Potter, a deputy United States marshal, was murdered on April 4, 1913, by violators of the United States internal-revenue laws, the sum of $5,000, on account of the murder of her said husband.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert "$1,000."

The question was taken and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ELLA SLONE.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13950) for the relief of Ella Slone.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Ella Slone, of Pikeville, Pike County, Ky., widow of John Slone, who, while in the discharge of his duties as a posseman, having been duly summoned by and acting with J. M. Potter, a deputy United States marshal, was murdered on April 4, 1913, by violators of the United States internal-revenue laws, the sum of $5,000, on account of the murder of her said husband.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 2, line 2, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ARTHUR E. RUMP.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 6609) for the relief of Arthur E. Rump.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That there be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $10,000 to Arthur E. Rump, of St. Louis, Mo., to compensate him in full for all claims he may have against the United States arising out of injuries received by him while in the Government employ in the United States post office at St. Louis, Mo., in May, 1902.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 4, strike out "$10,000" and insert "$2,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

EMILY J. BYRD.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14167) for the relief of Emily J. Byrd.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated, to Emily J. Byrd, of Campton, Wolfe County, Ky., widow of William A. Byrd, the sum of $10,000 on account of the murder of her said husband while in the discharge of his duty as deputy United States marshal for the eastern district of Kentucky.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to have a fuller explanation of the bill than is afforded by the bill itself.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from New York that this bill is one of two or three bills which were introduced to compensate the widows of certain men who were murdered while having been summoned to execute the United States internal-revenue laws. These men were killed——

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. What is the amount to be awarded by this bill?

Mr. POU. One thousand dollars.

Mr. LANGLEY. It is the amount which has been allowed in similar cases by the committee.

Mr. POU. There were three men killed, and we have allowed them $1,000 apiece.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I never can resist my friend LANGLEY.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Page 1, line 7, strike out the figures "$10,000" and insert "$1,000."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MARY ABEL.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5079) for the relief of Mary Abel.

The bill and committee amendment were read in full.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. VOLLMER. Will the gentleman withhold his objection?

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. I will withhold it at the request of the gentleman.

Mr. VOLLMER. At our last night session a bill was passed by this House for the relief of the heirs of the only other party who was killed by the falling of this elevator, Mr O'Toole. This lady, Mary Abel, is the mother and sole heir of the young man who was killed by the falling of the elevator, without any negligence contributing to the injury on his part at all, but it was solely by reason of the defectiveness of this elevator at the Government arsenal, Illinois. Now, the amount has been reduced by the committee from $5,000 to $1,000. This old woman earns her living by manual toil, and I do hope that the gentleman will not insist upon his objection in such a case as this.

Mr. GOLDFOGLE. Mr. Speaker, the difficulty is that this Congress has been proceeding along these lines: If a bill had merit to it and some one saw fit to object to the bill, that was the end of it. So favorites were being played in this House. And I observed, without now criticizing any gentleman in particular, that certain bills were enabled to escape the objection if they came from the other side of the Chamber. Now, I want to be more fair. I want this House to squarely consider claims bills just as well as they consider any other kind of bills. When a party comes forward and has a claim that is favorably reported by the Committee on Claims, who give careful attention to the facts always, then I would have this House consider the bill upon its merits. There is no earthly reason why a bill when it comes from the Committee on Claims with a unanimous report in its favor should, because of caprice on the part of a single Member, be objected to and other bills allowed to slip through. There is injustice somewhere. Now, I think fairness requires that this House shall consider bills upon their merits, that we should vote upon them, and that the majority vote of the House should control. I object to the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from New York objects. The Clerk will report the next bill.

CHARLES L. HILL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7327) for the relief of Charles L. Hill.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to allow Charles L. Hill to enter, under the homestead laws, and subject to the terms, conditions, and limitations of the reclamation act and acts amendatory thereof, lot 1 of section 5, township 22 south, range 1 east, and lots 5, 6, 8, and 9 of section 32, township 21 south, range 1 east, Las Cruces, N. Mex., land district: Provided, That the entry and patent therefor shall expressly reserve to the United States or its successors the right to take or use, without compensation to entryman, patentee, or his assignees, any or all of the said lands which may be actually needed for or in connection with the construction, maintenance, and operation of the Rio Grande reclamation project.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, strike out the words "or its successors."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

NATHANIEL F. CHEAIRS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 8696) for the relief of Nathaniel F. Cheairs.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

Mr. PADGETT. Mr. Speaker, I want to ask the gentleman if I can prevail upon him not to object?

Mr. MANN. Well, this involves a new principle, and I think the House ought to have a chance to consider it.

Mr. PADGETT. It is a very meritorious case.

Mr. MANN. It involves an absolute departure from the previous policy of Congress in reference to such bills.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

FRANCES L. SNELL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15681) for the relief of Frances L. Snell.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

THOMAS R. MASON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 3278) for the relief of Thomas R. Mason.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to pay to Thomas R. Mason, of Dexter, Mo., the sum of $169.45 for services in carrying the mail on route No. 9683, in Kentucky, from January 1, 1861, to June 30, 1861.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 5, strike out the figures "$169.45" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$128.24."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, strike out the words "June 30" and insert in lieu thereof the words "May 31."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

MARY ABEL.

Mr. VOLLMER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to go back to the bill No. 164 on the Private Calendar, which is H. R. 5079, for the relief of Mary Abel. The gentleman from New York [Mr. GOLDFOGLE] has agreed to withdraw his objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Mary Abel, mother of August Abel, who was fatally injured by reason of a defective elevator while engaged in the employment of the United States Government at Rock Island Arsenal, in the State of Illinois, on the 24th day of February, 1912, and died the following day on account of said injury, the sum of $5,000.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill? [After a pause] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 11, strike out the figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out in line 10 the word "twelve" and insert the word "five." It is an error in the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, strike out the word "twelve" and insert in lieu thereof the word "five"

Mr. TAGGART. Then how will it read?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the line as it will read when amended.

The Clerk read as follows:

On the twenty-fourth day of February, nineteen hundred and five.

Mr. MANN. The accident occurred in 1905, and the bill reads as if it occurred in 1912.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read a third time, and passed.

CHARLES C. CROWELL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2590) to reimburse Charles C. Crowell for two months' extra pay in lieu of traveling expenses.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $36, to reimburse Charles C. Crowell, late sergeant, Company B, Thirty-fifth Regiment United States Infantry, for two months' extra pay in lieu of traveling expenses.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

H. R. DRAKE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14925) for the retirement of H. R. Drake.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to promote H. R. Drake, formerly a sergeant in Troop A, Fifth Regiment United States Cavalry, to master signal electrician, and to place him on the retired list of the Army with full pay and allowance of said rank.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

OSCAR FROMMEL & BRO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1625) for the relief of Oscar Frommel & Bro.

The title of the bill was read.

Mr. MANN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN] objects. The Clerk will report the next one.

ATLANTIC CANNING CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5195) for the relief of the Atlantic Canning Co.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the United States Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the Atlantic Canning Co., of Atlantic, Iowa, the sum of $522.90, being the amount paid into the Treasury of the United States from the sale of 498 cases of canned corn sold under the decree of the United States court for the district of Colorado on the 28th day of August, 1912, in the matter of The United States against Five Hundred and Seventeen Cases of Canned Corn, libel No. 5975, which said decree was afterwards, and on the 30th day of October, 1912, by a subsequent decree rendered by said court, vacated and set aside.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word. I notice in the report in this case that the chairman of the Committee on Claims wrote this letter to the Secretary of the Treasury:

MARCH 31, 1914.

The SECRETARY OF THE TREASURY,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Committee on Claims has agreed to a favorable report on H. R. 5195, for the relief of the Atlantic Canning Co., but before placing the same upon the calendar the committee kindly asks your opinion as to the merits of this case.

Yours, very truly,

E. W. POU, Chairman.

Now, I wondered whether it was the habit of the committee, when it was referring a bill to a proper department for a report upon it, to inform the department that they had already, without knowledge, agreed upon a favorable report upon it, but would like to have some communication that they could stick in the record to show that they had had a report from the department. I take it that that is not the usual practice of the committee, however.

Mr. POU. I will say to the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. Speaker, that this was in pursuance of the policy of the committee, to ask for the advice of the department on every bill with which a department is connected. That is the reason.

Mr. MANN. What value is it to refer a bill to a department for a report as to the facts and any recommendation that the department chooses to make when you inform the department, to begin with, that you have already ordered the bill to be favorably reported?

Mr. POU. It would be of no value at all. The only reason why any letter was addressed to the department was that it was believed that some gentleman might desire to know what the attitude of the department was, and we wanted to give them the fullest possible information.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

JOEL J. PARKER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2226) for the relief of Joel J. Parker.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Joel J. Parker, or his legal representatives, the sum of $400, as full compensation for permanent injuries received by the said Parker on the 24th day of July, 1909, at Fort Lawton, Wash., while in the performance of his duties as an employee of the United States transport service.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the third reading of the Senate bill.

The Senate bill was ordered to be read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next one.

JACOB WIRTH.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 2069) for the reimbursement of Jacob Wirth for two horses lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to Jacob Wirth, of Poplar, Mont., the sum of $180, in compensation for two horses lost while hired by the United States Geological Survey.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

M'CLINTIC-MARSHALL CONSTRUCTION CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 5147) to authorize and direct Col. George W. Goethals, governor of the Canal Zone, and formerly chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, to investigate certain claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Col. George W. Goethals, governor of the Canal Zone, and formerly chairman and chief engineer of the Isthmian Canal Commission, is hereby authorized and directed to investigate the claims of the McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., a corporation of the State of Pennsylvania, having its principal office in the city of Pittsburgh, in said State, and to ascertain what amount, if any, is in justice, equity, and fairness due and owing to the said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co. from the Isthmian Canal Commission for work and labor done and materials furnished in connection with the construction and erection of lock gates and appurtenances for the Panama Canal, and in connection with or incidental to the doing of the work and furnishing of the materials provided for in a certain contract between the Isthmian Canal Commission and said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co., dated June 21, 1910, including the extra expense and cost resulting from the work being of an unprecedented nature and performed under conditions not known to either party at the time of the making of the contract and specifications, which caused delays and compelled the work to be done by the contractor under requirements as to character and finish not fairly within the meaning of the specifications, and under necessity for rapid completion without allowance of adequate additional time.

The said Col. George W. Goethals, governor of the Canal Zone, is further authorized and empowered, either personally or through such commission as he may appoint, to investigate such claims and the various items thereof in such manner as to him may seem best, and to adjudicate the same, and either personally or through such commission is hereby empowered to administer oaths and affirmations to witnesses, and to issue subpœnas and to compel the attendance of witnesses. He shall report in detail to the Congress of the United States his finding as to the amount, if any, due under the provisions of this act to the said McClintic-Marshall Construction Co.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I should like to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. EDMONDS] a question. This bill as it stands seems to permit the Government on the one side to grant relief by this language:

Including the extra expense and cost resulting from the work being of an unprecedented nature and performed under conditions not known to either party at the time of the making of the contract and specifications, which caused delays and compelled the work to be done by the contractor under requirements as to character and finish not fairly within the meaning of the specifications, and under necessity for rapid completion without allowance of adequate additional time.

And the bill also authorizes Col. Goethals to adjudicate the case under certain conditions. I should like to ask the gentleman if he is willing to amend the bill so as to cut that out?

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I have three amendments here which are accepted by the committee, and which will cover the point made by the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 8, strike out the words "including the extra expense" and strike out lines 9 to 16, inclusive, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Taking into consideration the claim of the contractors that the work was done under requirements as to character and finish not fairly within the meaning of the specifications."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the second amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 21, strike out the words "and to adjudicate," and in line 22 strike out the words "the same."

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, strike out all after the word "finding," in line 1.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MANN. That word "finding," in line 1, page 3, should be "findings."

Mr EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, I move to change the word "finding," in line 1, page 3, to "findings."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 3, line 1, strike out the word "finding" and insert the word "findings."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

DANIEL HAMPTON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 55) for the relief of Daniel Hampton.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Daniel Hampton, who was a member of Company D, Twenty-fourth Regiment Massachusetts Volunteer Infantry, and of Company G, Twenty-fourth Veteran Reserve Corps, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a member of the last-named organization on the 14th day of August, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

JAMES W. M'GREEVEY.

The next bill in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12909) to correct the military record of James W. McGreevey.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the record of James W. McGreevey, of Company A, Second Regiment United States Veteran Volunteers (Hancock's corps), and to issue to the said James McGreevey or his heirs an honorable discharge from said service as of June 12, 1865, in recognition of his previous faithful service of 13 years in the Marine Corps before the Civil War and of three years and three months in the Volunteer Army of the United States States during the Civil War.

The following committee amendment was read:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, James W. McGreevey, who was a musician in Company A, Second United States Veteran Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a mus'cian of said company and regiment on the 2d day of July, 1865."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LUKE RATTIGAN.

The next bill in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1186) for the relief of Luke Rattigan.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

M. C. BURKE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 57) making an appropriation to M. C. Burke for tax liens held by him on property acquired by the United States.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to M. C. Burke, the sum of $732.51, with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the 17th day of May, 1904, for taxes due and unpaid, for which said M. C. Burke holds tax liens on lots Nos. 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, and 6, in block No. 143, West Superior, fourth division, in the city of Superior, Douglas County, Wis., which said property is now owned by the United States, and upon which said tax liens were outstanding when it acquired the same.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Wisconsin if he is willing to strike out the language in lines 6, 7, and 8, "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the 17th day of May, 1904"?

Mr. LENROOT. Well, rather than not get relief at all, I would; but under the law of Wisconsin this party is entitled to 15 per cent.

Mr. MANN. I am willing he should sue for it.

Mr. LENROOT. But he can not sue for it.

Mr. MANN. No; the Government has the property, and anything it pays is in the nature of a gratuity.

Mr. LENROOT. The man that has this claim did the work of paving in front of this property. It is not the ordinary claim where a man went into it on speculation. He is equitably entitled to interest.

Mr. MANN. I think he is equitably entitled to what he can get under the process of law.

Mr. LENROOT. He was a contractor.

Mr. MANN. But he has his tax claims.

Mr. LENROOT. Yes; but it represents this man's own work. I think the gentleman from Illinois ought to see the distinction. If he was a speculator——

Mr. MANN. If he was a speculator, I would object to the bill. I do not think we ought to pay interest on it.

Mr. LENROOT. I suggest to the gentleman that we give him 4 per cent interest.

Mr. MANN. No; there is no proper claim here for interest.

Mr. LENROOT. Under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I am constrained to accept an amendment striking out the provision for interest.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend, in lines 6, 7, and 8, by striking out the language "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the 17th day of May, 1904."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 6, 7, and 8, strike out the following language: "with interest thereon at the rate of 6 per cent per annum from the 17th day of May, 1904."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN BRODIE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1182) for the relief of John Brodie.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to John Brodie, of San Francisco, Cal., the sum of $5,000 on account of personal injuries received by him through the explosion of a box of percussion caps while loading the United States Army transport Sherman in San Francisco Harbor on the 22d day of September, 1899.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The Clerk read the following committee amendment:

Strike out, in line 5, figures "$5,000" and insert in lieu thereof the figures "$1,000"; and in line 10, after the word "ninety-nine," insert the following:

"Provided, That no sum of money due or to become due to the said John Brodie under this act shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable processes whatever, but shall inure to the benefit of the said John Brodie."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JOHN M. GRAY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9270) to correct the military record of John M. Gray.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John M. Gray shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged as a private in Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and the Secretary of War is hereby authorized to issue to the said John M. Gray a certificate of honorable discharge as of date December 9, 1863.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:
"That in the administration of any laws, conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, John M. Gray, who was a private of Company K, Eighty-sixth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private of said company and regiment on the 9th day of December, 1863."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The title was amended.

FRANCIS GRAVES BONHAM.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12826) to reinstate Francis Graves Bonham as a cadet at the United States Military Academy.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President be, and he is hereby, authorized to reappoint as a cadet at the United States Military Academy, without regard to age or the existence of vacancies, Francis Graves Bonham.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

H. S. HATHAWAY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7205) to correct the military record of H. S. Hathaway.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing admission to soldiers' homes, H. S. Hathaway shall be held and considered to have been mustered into the United States service in December, 1864, as a private in Company F, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Volunteer Infantry, and to have been honorably discharged at the close of the war: Provided, That no pension shall accrue or become payable prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, there does not seem to be very much information in the report upon this bill.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Illinois that I have with me the report of The Adjutant General, which, if the gentleman will permit me to read, I think will remove all doubt.

Mr. MANN. I hope the gentleman will not take the time to read it now, but I would be very glad to have him state what it is.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Very well. I will insert it as a part of my remarks. On June 27, 1892, Joseph H. Blackburn, aged 50 years, a resident of Dowelltown, Tenn., declared that he was the colonel of the Fourth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry; that he was personally acquainted with H. S. Hathaway, who was a private of Company F of his regiment; that he served 10 months until the regiment was discharged, and did as good service as any member of the company.

Mr. MANN. What does The Adjutant General say about the bill?

Mr. VAUGHAN. He served, but he was not mustered into service.

Mr. MANN. How long did he serve?

Mr. VAUGHAN. Nearly a year. He went into the service on the 1st day of October, 1864.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I know of a case where a man served nearly three years and was not mustered in, and I can not get a favorable report on that sort of a case.

Mr. MANN. He probably did not serve.

Mr. LANGLEY. He did serve. The gentleman did not hear my statement.

Mr. MANN. Oh, yes, I did; but the gentleman is not old enough himself to know whether he served or not.

Mr. LANGLEY. And I suppose the gentleman from Illinois is, of course?

Mr. MANN. Yes; I am old enough myself to have served in the war.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. VAUGHAN. Mr. Speaker, I append herewith the report of The Adjutant General:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
THE ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
January 26, 1911.

The honorable the SECRETARY OF WAR:

No record has been found of muster into service of a man named H. S. Hathaway as a member of Company F, Fourth Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers, nor has this name been found on any of the rolls of that company.

However, the name Henry S. Hathaway (also borne as H. S. Hathaway), appears on the clothing book of said company with entries to the effect that the man who bore the name was enrolled at Liberty, Tenn., November 1, 1864, and that he drew clothing on January 15 and April 15, 1865.

Applying to this department for recognition as a member of the company and regiment mentioned, H. S. Hathaway, in an affidavit executed before the clerk of the county court of Dekalb County, Tenn., May 2, 1892, testified as follows:

"That on or about the 1st day of October, 1864, he enlisted in the United States service under Capt. William F. Hathaway in Company F, of the Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Mounted Infantry, and served 10 months, until the regiment was discharged; but he was not discharged or paid for the reason that he was never mustered in; that when the company was being mustered in he was sick when the first squad was mustered and could not go out, and was off on duty when the second squad was mustered, having been equipped and mounted; that he afterwards got them to appoint a day to muster him, and he met Col. Blackburn and Capt. Hathaway, but they refused to muster him, saying that it would be as much trouble to make out the papers for one man as for a company, and that it made no difference anyway; that he makes this statement and furnishes sustaining testimony in order to have himself mustered in and discharged from said service; that his name was called regular with the company and he was recognized as one of the company and done duty in good faith as any other soldier and expected to share alike the dangers and emoluments of war.

"That he was a soldier and thinks he ought to be recognized as such."

W. B. Cosby, aged 44 years, and William M. Moore, aged 48 years, residents of Smithfield, Tenn., in a joint affidavit dated May 2, 1892, made the following statement:

"That they were members of Capt. Bill Hathaway's company F, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Volunteer Mounted Infantry, in the late War of the Rebellion, and were well acquainted with H. S. Hathaway, who done service in the same company and regiment, and they regarded him as a soldier because he was with them all the time, answered regularly at roll call, and done as any of the company for the whole term of service of the regiment.

"That they believe he done as much and as good service as any member of the company. That they believe he ought to be yet mustered in and discharged if he never was, and they have no account of either. That they are not related to H. S. Hathaway and have no interest whatever in this matter."

On June 27, 1892, Joseph H. Blackburn, aged 50 years, a resident of Dowelltown, Tenn., declared as follows:

"That he was colonel of the Fourth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry in the War of the Rebellion. That he was personally acquainted with H. S. Hathaway, who was a private in Company F of his regiment. That he served 10 months, or till the regiment was discharged, and done as good service as any member of said company. That he was never mustered into the service, and consequently never discharged. The reason he was never mustered was because he was not present on any regular muster day, being either sick or off on duty, and partly through neglect of his officers, not thinking it would ever be of use to him; and he was a good soldier without. That he believes him as much entitled to a discharge and the benefits of the pension laws as any member of said regiment."

James Robinson, aged 47 years, a resident of Dowelltown, Tenn., under date of June 28, 1892, testified as follows:

"He was third sergeant, Company F, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers, and knows the claimant served in Company F, Fourth Regiment Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and made a good soldier. Affiant says he has learned claimant was not mustered or discharged, and claimant was never present at the time to be mustered or discharged, as he was out on duty every time when the mustering officer came."

Joseph H. Blackburn was colonel of the Fourth Tennessee Mounted Infantry, and Cosby, Moore, and Robinson served as members thereof.

Application for the recognition of Hathaway as a member of Company F, Fourth Tennessee Mounted Infantry Volunteers, has been denied by this department, and now stands denied, as it has been uniformly held by the War Department that in the absence of record evidence of muster in or service the department can not accept testimony, no matter how strong or direct, as a basis upon which to establish a record of military service. The department is simply the custodian of the records of disbanded volunteer organizations, and if they fail to show that any particular person was in the military service the department has no authority to alter or amend them so as to make them show that such person was in service.

Respectfully submitted.

F. C. AINSWORTH,
The Adjutant General.

JAMES H. KELLY.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9335) for the relief of James H. Kelly.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws James H. Kelly, late of Company C, Fifth Regiment West Virginia Volunteer Infantry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said regiment on the 6th day of July, 1864.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I think it is usual in these bills to put in a provision that no bounty, pay, pension, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman that that is usual. The gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MCKELLAR], who reported this bill, is generally so careful about that that I supposed it was in the bill. I am sure that he would agree to the amendment, if he were present, and I suggest that the bill be amended as the gentleman from Illinois suggests.

Mr. MANN. I see the gentleman from Tennessee has just come into the Chamber. I will ask him whether or not it is not customary in these bills to insert a provision that no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of the act.

Mr. MCKELLAR. It is. It ought to be inserted in the bill. It is an oversight if it is not. I will offer that as an amendment, and ask the clerk to report it.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 8, after the word "sixty-four," insert the following: "Provided, That other than above set forth no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CHARLES A. COULSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 13698) to correct the military record of Charles A. Coulson.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc. That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to place the name of Charles A. Coulson, late a member of Company H, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, upon the muster-in roll of that company and regiment, and that a certificate of honorable discharge be issued to the said Charles A. Coulson, dating from the day said company was mustered out.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring any rights, privilliges, or benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Charles A. Coulson shall be held and considered to have been mustered as a private in Company H, Twenty-first Regiment Missouri Volunteer Infantry, on February 28, 1862, and to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment on the 1st day of October, 1862: Provided, That other than above set forth, no bounty, pay, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman from Tennessee informs me that the back-pay provision ought to be a little different from what it was agreed to in the former bill. What the Clerk read, the amendment which was agreed to, was taken out of this bill, and probably this ought to be changed, too, while it is under consideration. This reads "that other than above set forth, no bounty, pay, pension, or other emoluments shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act." I think the language probably should be "that other than above set forth, no back pay, bounty, pension, or other emoluments."

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; the word "pension" ought to be left out. The proper wording of it is, "provided that no back pay, bounty, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act."

Mr. MANN That is right. I move to amend the amendment to this bill by striking out "bounty, pay" and insert "back pay, bounty."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment, page 2, line 8, by striking out the words "bounty, pay" and insert the words "back pay, bounty," so as the line as amended will read: "Provided, That other than above set forth no back pay, bounty, pension, or other emolument shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JAMES H. KELLY.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to return to bill (H. R. 9335) for the relief of James H. Kelly.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to return to a former bill. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Now, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the proviso in the bill and insert the following:

Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, the gentleman will have to ask unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which the amendment was agreed to and the bill passed.

Mr. MCKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I expect that would be the proper way.

Mr. LANGLEY. Does not that deprive him of any pension at all.

Mr. MCKELLAR. No; it does not.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman from Tennessee asks unanimous consent to vacate the proceedings by which the bill was passed. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment by inserting, page 1, line 8, after the word "sixty-four," the following proviso: "Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall accrue prior to or by reason of the passage of this act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

THOMAS S. JOHNSON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9703) for the relief of Thomas S. Johnson.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to pay to Thomas S. Johnson, of Beaver Dam, Wis., late chaplain One hundred and twenty-seventh Regiment United States Colored Volunteer Infantry, the pay and allowances of a chaplain of Infantry from November 4 to December 14, 1864, not to exceed $200.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

LEGAL REPRESENTATIVES OF SARAH J. MONTGOMERY, DECEASED.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14479) for the relief of the legal representatives of Sarah J. Montgomery, deceased.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

NELSON D. DILLON, EXECUTOR.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4248) for the relief of Nelson D. Dillon, executor of Harriet A. Dillon, deceased, widow of Robert Dillon, deceased.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOSHUA NICHOLLS.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the resolution (H. Res. 498) for the relief of the heirs of Joshua Nicholls.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOSEPH P. LEITER.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10719) to remove the charge of desertion from the military record of Joseph P. Leiter.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws and the laws governing the National Home for Disabled Volunteer Soldiers, or any branch thereof, Joseph P. Leiter shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a musician of Company A, Fiftieth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on the 23d day of January, 1865: Provided, That no pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. FOSTER. I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that this proviso is not in conformity with the other. Does the gentleman expect to move that no pension shall be allowed prior to the passage of this act?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert after the word "no," page 1, line 10, the words "back pay, bounty, allowance or."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 10, insert after the word "no," the words "back pay, bounty, allowance or," so that the line will read, "Provided, That no back pay, bounty, allowance, or pension shall accrue prior to the passage of this act."

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; was read the third time and passed.

The title was amended so as to read, "A bill for the relief of Joseph P. Leiter."

FREDERICK CITY, MD.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9628) to refund to the corporate authorities of Frederick City, Md., the sum of $200,000, exacted of them by the Confederate Army under Gen. Jubal Early, June 9, 1864, under penalty of burning said city.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

WILLIAM H. SHANNON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 962) for the relief of William H. Shannon.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of William H. Shannon, late of the Seventeenth Battery Indiana Light Artillery, and to grant him an honorable discharge as of the date of May 18, 1865: Provided, That no pay, bounty, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, was it intended that this soldier should not be allowed to draw a pension?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not at all. It is simply intended he should not draw any back pay or pension prior to the passage of the act, or by reason of the passage of the act, which is the same thing.

Mr. MONDELL. Then the language used is unfortunate, because under this language the soldier could never get a pension.

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about that. A great number of soldiers have been constantly receiving pensions under wording exactly like this.

Mr. MONDELL. What the gentleman desires to do is to provide that this soldier shall receive no back pay, no bounty, or allowance?

Mr. McKELLAR. By reason of the passage of this act.

Mr. MONDELL. By reason of the passage of this act, and——

Mr. McKELLAR. The only thing he does is to get a pension from now on.

Mr. MONDELL. If he gets a pension at all, he must receive a pension by reason of this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. Of course, but no back allowance.

Mr. MONDELL. That is what the language says. That is not the statement in the bill. That no back pay, no bounty——

Mr. McKELLAR. No back pay, or bounty, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act. It is perfectly plain. It has been construed time and again.

Mr. FOSTER. Does not the gentleman want in the words "back pension"?

Mr. McKELLAR. That means exactly the same thing. The Clerk has not read the committee amendment yet.

Mr. FOSTER. I thought it was always in that proviso.

Mr. MONDELL. Formerly the language used in all these cases was uniform. Apparently, the language now varies in every case. What is the reason for that?

Mr. McKELLAR. The gentleman is entirely mistaken about the language all being uniform. Several bills have passed this House and have come back here; have passed the Congress, and the Pension Office has held they were absolutely nugatory. Instead of being uniform they were not uniform at all. But this is a form of bill that has been handed to us by the War Department time and time again.

Mr. MONDELL. Several different forms have been proposed this evening on different bills. Has the committee no uniform language which it adopts?

Mr. McKELLAR. Not absolutely so. It never has been so.

Mr. MONDELL. Formerly the committee did have, I will say to the gentleman. I had the honor of serving on the Committee on Military Affairs for a number of years, and had the honor of reporting a number of bills of this kind. Formerly the language used was uniform, and there is no reason why it should not be so now.

Mr. McKELLAR. That was before I had the honor of serving in the House or on the committee.

Mr. MONDELL. The bills that have been passed upon this evening, some of them, had no provision at all of this sort. Some of them had this provision in one form and some in another. Would it not be better for the committee to adopt uniform language in cases of this kind?

Mr. HAY. I would call the attention of the gentleman from Wyoming to the fact that when he was a member of the committee the form of the bill was entirely different than it is now.

Mr. MONDELL. The gentleman is entirely mistaken.

Mr. HAY. And it was changed to the present form by reason of the fact that the President vetoed the bills on the ground that a record can not be corrected, and it was put in the present form about 1907.

Mr. MONDELL. It is not at all material to anyone, I suppose, whether or not bills of this form were reported while I was a member of the Military Committee, but the fact is that bills of this form were reported while I was a member of the Military Committee, many of them, and in every case a uniform statement was made with regard to back pay and bounty. I am somewhat surprised that the committee has departed from that excellent practice.

Mr. HAY. The committee has not departed from that excellent practice at all.

Mr. MONDELL. Why, in some of the bills that have been presented to-night for our consideration there has been no provision whatever with regard to back pay or bounty.

Mr. HAY. In only one case, and that was an oversight.

Mr. McKELLAR. And that has been amended here to conform to that rule.

Mr. MONDELL. It has been necessary for members of the committee to ask to have bills that have already been passed recalled and reconsidered.

Mr. McKELLAR. Why, of course; that is what we are here for, namely, to get them right and to correct the mistakes.

Mr. MONDELL. Would it not be well to have them right in the first instance?

Mr. McKELLAR. That might be so; but, unlike the gentleman from Wyoming, we are not absolutely perfect. [Laughter.]

Mr. MONDELL. That is unfortunate for the balance of you. [Laughter.]

Mr. McKELLAR. I know it is for us. Still there are some of us who, unfortunate as we are, are satisfied that we are not as the gentleman from Wyoming is. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend lines 3 and 4 by striking out the words "That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of" and insert in lieu thereof the words "That in the administration of the pension laws."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend line 7 by striking out the words "and to grant him an honorable discharge" and insert in lieu thereof the words "shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 10, after the word "no," by striking out the word "back."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, it appears to me that in line 11, after the word "allowed," if the words "prior to the passage" were inserted and you were to strike out the words "by reason of," in line 11, there would be no ambiguity at all in the bill. The line then would read in this way:

That no back pay or allowance shall be allowed prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. McKELLAR. What bill is that?

Mr. FOWLER. That is H. R. 962, Private Calendar 203. One of the bills just passed contained that language, and it is apparent that if all these limitations are placed in that languge there will not be any doubt whatever.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman present an amendment?

Mr. FOWLER. I offer an amendment to strike out the words "by reason of," in line 11, and insert in lieu thereof the words "prior to the passage of."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER].

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 11, by striking out the words "by reason of" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "prior to the passage of."

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, will my colleague yield?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Mr. MANN. Of course no back pay, bounty, or allowance can be made prior to the passage of this act.

Mr. FOWLER. We have got the word "pension" in there, too.

Mr. MANN. Where you use the words "by reason of this act," you can not hereafter allow back pay or bounty, but if you take the language which my colleague suggests, they might file a claim for bounty or back pay. Of course it would not be allowed until the act passed.

Mr. FOWLER. I do not think anybody could construe this language to mean that at all.

Mr. MANN. I do not know what the Treasury Department or the War Department would do in the way of construing it, but it would be subject to that construction.

Mr. HAY. It is carried in the bill as it was prepared in the War Department.

Mr. MANN. I so understand.

Mr. McKELLAR. I hope the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. FOWLER] will withdraw his amendment and let the bill pass.

Mr. FOWLER. They might construe it that the soldier never would get any pension.

Mr. MANN. They construe it so that he will not receive any back pay or back allowance. The word "back" is not confined in its adjective meaning to pay.

Mr. HAMILTON of Michigan. The department has suggested this language?

Mr. McKELLAR. Yes.

Mr. TAGGART. Is it not a fact that under the present law no claim for bounty can be made since December, 1912?

Mr. MANN. I keep it in mind that bounty will be paid on claims filed since 1912.

Mr. TAGGART. That has not yet become a law.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Speaker, if the determination of the language has been perfected by the members of this committee, I do not insist upon my amendment, but I offered it for the purpose of making it sure that the soldier could draw a pension hereafter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes. I ask unanimous consent to do so.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Without objection, the amendment will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

EDWARD WHITESIDE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10271) to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Edward Whiteside.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to remove the charge of desertion from the record of Edward Whiteside, late musician, Company C, Fifth Regiment New York Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Edward Whiteside, who was a musician in Company C, Fifth New York Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a musician of said company and regiment on or about the 14th day of May, 1863.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. The proviso that was in the other bill ought to be inserted.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by inserting, after the word "sixty-three," on page 2, in line 4, the words:

Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "sixty-three," insert the following: Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent, the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Edward Whiteside."

ABRAHAM HOOVER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 816) to correct the military record of Abraham Hoover.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Abraham Hoover, late of Company H, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Corps Volunteer Infantry, and grant him an honorable discharge.

With a committee amendment, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:

"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Abraham Hoover, who was a private in Company H, Seventh Regiment Pennsylvania Reserve Infantry Volunteers, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States as a private in said company and regiment on or about the 16th day of September, 1863."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "sixty-three," in line 4, on page 2, the following:

Provided That no back pay, pension, bounty, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 4, after the word "sixty-three," insert the following: "Provided, That no back pay, pension, bounty, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of the passage of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Abraham Hoover."

PATRICK M'GEE, ALIAS PATRICK GALLAGHER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5474) to correct the military record of Patrick McGee, alias Patrick Gallagher.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of the pension laws Patrick McGee, alias Patrick Gallagher, who served as a private in Company H, Tenth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, under the name of Patrick Gallagher, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been honorably discharged from the military service of the United States as a member of said company and regiment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the bill by adding, after the word "regiment," in line 9 of page 1, the following:

Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 9, after the word "regiment," insert the following:
"Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended so as to read: "A bill for the relief of Patrick McGee, alias Patrick Gallagher."

BENJAMIN F. RICHARDSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9615) correcting the military record of Benjamin F. Richardson.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to correct the military record of Benjamin F. Richardson, late of Company B, Second Regiment Eastern Shore Maryland Volunteer Infantry, so that the period from June 11, 1862, to January 1, 1864, will form a part of his actual military service.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following:
"That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Benjamin F. Richardson shall hereafter be held and considered to have been in the military service of the United States as a member of Company B, Second Regiment Eastern Shore Maryland Volunteer Infantry, during the period between June 11, 1862, and January 1, 1864."

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment by adding after the word "64," in line 5, page 2, the following:

Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 5, after the word "64," insert the following:
"Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title of the bill was amended so as to read "A bill for the relief of Benjamin F. Richardson."

ATLANTIC COAST LINE CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (S. 4053) for the relief of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co.

The Clerk read the bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to state and pay the claim, now barred by the statute of limitations, of the Atlantic Coast Line Railroad Co., as successor to the Savannah, Florida & Western Railway Co., arising out of underpayments for freight shipments by the War Department in 1898 from Columbia, Tenn., to Florida point, in accordance with the decision of the Court of Claims in case No. 29908 in said court; and for the purpose of this act a sufficient sum, not to exceed $400, is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury of the United States not otherwise appropriated.

With the following committee amendment:

In line 1, page 2, strike out all of said line after the word "act" and substitute in lieu therefor the words "the sum of $292.45 is."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

SPENCER ROBERTS.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (H. R. 12844) for the relief of Spencer Roberts, a member of the Metropolitan police force of the District of Columbia.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioners of the District of Columbia are hereby authorized and empowered to appoint and promote Spencer Roberts, now a member of the Metropolitan police force of said District in class 2, to the first vacancy that may exist in class 3 of said Metropolitan police force.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I notice the commissioners in reporting on this bill think that it should not be construed to require them to promote Roberts to the first vacancy in class 3. Under the language of the bill, if they did not promote him to the first vacancy, they would not be able to promote him to any vacancy at all. They construe it that they would not be required to promote him to the first vacancy. Does not the gentleman think that, in order to prevent this bill coming before the House again, it having been considered once or twice, that he had better strike out the words "the first" and insert the word "any"?

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I see in the concluding paragraph of the report of the commissioners that they do not wish this to be a command to them, but merely a request to do so. I understand that they do not wish to be ordered to do anything, but they wish to be given discretionary power.

Mr. MANN. Suppose they did not promote him to the first vacancy for some very good reason, then they would not promote him at all.

Mr. O'SHAUNESSY. I think the suggestion of the gentleman is a very good one, and I accept it.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the words "the first," in line 6, and insert the word "any."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 6, strike out the words "the first" and insert the word "any."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the committee amendment.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The question was taken, and the amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

CLIFFORD H. TATE.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 236) to authorize the appointment of Clifford H. Tate as a cadet in the United States Military Academy.

The Clerk read the House joint resolution.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

ABRAHAM KAUFFMAN.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (H. R. 16358) for the relief of Abraham Kauffman.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That in the administration of any laws conferring rights, privileges, and benefits upon honorably discharged soldiers, Abraham Kauffman, late of Company A, Ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, and Company H, Eighth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Cavalry, shall hereafter be held and considered to have been discharged honorably from the military service of the United States in Company A, Ninety-fourth Regiment Ohio Volunteer Infantry, on or about the 18th day of February, 1863.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, in line 12, page 1, of the bill, I move, after the word "three," to insert the words "Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 12, after the word "three," insert the following:
"Provided, That no back pay, bounty, pension, or allowance shall be allowed by reason of this act."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

HERMAN REHN.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14687) to appropriate a sum of money to Herman Rehn for injuries sustained while in the employ of the naval authorities of the United States at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Whereas Herman Rehn was an employee in the electrical department of the United States Naval Academy, at Annapolis, Md., and while in a battery room removing a carboy filled with sulphuric acid, for which no proper machinery for handling had been provided, said carboy fell and broke and the acid splashed into his eyes, from which he has lost his sight in both eyes without any hope of recovering, the said accident having occurred on the 9th day of January, 1905; and
Whereas the said accident would not have occurred if proper machinery facilities had been provided by the United States naval authorities; and

Whereas, had the accident occurred while in the employ of a private individual or a corporation the said Herman Rehn might have maintained an action against such person or corporation and recovered damages for the injuries sustained by him; and

Whereas a private individual can not maintain an action against the United States for any injury received on account of negligence, but as an equitable consideration it is right and proper that the United States should treat its employees in the same way as if they had been working for private individuals or corporations: Therefore

Be it enacted, etc., That an appropriation of $2,500 be, and the same is hereby, made and appropriated to pay to Herman Rehn, of Anne Arundel County, Md., for permanent injuries sustained while in the employ of the United States naval authorities at the Naval Academy, Annapolis, Md.

SEC. 2. That immediately after the passage of this act the Treasurer of the United States is hereby required to pay the said sum to the said Herman Rehn, residing at Annapolis, Md.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I will ask whoever has charge of the bill whether he is willing to reduce the amount carried by the bill, $2,500, to the amount the man would have received if he were covered in under the Government compensation act, which is about $400? He is not a man who is entitled to the benefit of existing law, but he wants to get in under it.

Mr. EDMONDS. Mr. Speaker, the committee went very thoroughly into this matter of the injury sustained by Mr. Rehn, and finding that he was totally blind from the accident, and that it was occasioned by the authorities not supplying proper facilities for handling the acid that fell, we thought he ought to receive compensation equal to the damage sustained by him. We therefore made the sum $2,500.

Mr. MANN. If he received full damages, he ought to have $25,000. Here is a man that is not covered by the law, but he wants to get the benefit of the law, and wants about six times what the law allows. I object.

ERSKINE R. HAYES.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (H. R. 4535) for the relief of Erskine R. Hayes.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

CLYDE ODUM.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 5966) for the relief of Clyde Odum.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Clyde Odum, of Punta Gorda, Fla., the sum of $1,890, the said sum to be in full payment of all claims and demands growing out of or that may result from injuries received by the said Clyde Odum while in the employ of the United States on the dredge Ajax in December, 1907.

With the following committee amendments:

Line 6, strike out the figures "$1,890" and insert "$400."

Line 10, after the word "seven," strike out the period and insert in lieu thereof a colon and the following:

"Provided, That no sum of money due or to become due to the said Clyde Odum under this act shall be liable to attachment, levy, or seizure by or under any legal or equitable processes whatever, but shall inure to the benefit of the said Clyde Odum."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question now is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

AMANDA HONERT.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1089) for the relief of Amanda Honert.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

JOSEPH HUNTER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 2344) granting a pension claim to Joseph Hunter.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

PORT ANGELES CITY DOCK CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 7049) to reimburse the Port Angeles City Dock Co. for damage done to the dock of that company by the United States revenue-cutter Snohomish.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $100 to the Port Angeles City Dock Co., for damage done to the dock of that company in the city of Port Angeles, State of Washington, by the United States revenue-cutter Snohomish.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

W. W. WALL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12681) for the relief of W. W. Wall.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to W. W. Wall, of Henry County, Mo., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $226.31, being the amount stolen from said Wall while postmaster at Prairie Home, Mo., and thus lost by him without fault on his part, and thereafter by him paid to the Government out of his own funds.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

JULIA KLAVINSKI.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16065) for the relief of Julia Klavinski.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That Julia Klavinski, mother of August F. Klavinski, late corporal One hundred and seventieth Company Coast Artillery, shall be regarded as the duly designated beneficiary of the late August F. Klavinski, under the act approved May 11, 1908, as amended by the act approved March 3, 1909.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

MAJ. GEORGE A. ARMES.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 15301) authorizing the appointment of Maj. George A. Armes, retired, to the rank and grade of brigadier general on the retired list of the Army without increase of pay.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

CHARLES A. MEYER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the joint resolution (H. J. Res. 237) to authorize the appointment of Charles A. Meyer as a cadet in the United States Military Academy.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

RACHEL E. DANGERFIELD BOAST.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16192) to authorize the issuance of patent to Rachel E. Dangerfield Boast for the southeast quarter of section 21 and the northeast quarter of section 28, township 1 south, range 57 west of the sixth principal meridian.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cause to be issued to Rachel E. Dangerfield Boast a patent for the southeast quarter of section 21 and the northeast quarter of section 28, township 1 south, range 57 west of the sixth principal meridian.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would inquire of the gentleman from Colorado what objection there is to the substitute recommended by the department?

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. There is no objection. The committee has adopted the substitute recommended by the department.

Mr. MANN. There is no such amendment reported in the bill at the Clerk's desk.

Mr. SELDOMRIDGE. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the language on page 2 of the report, beginning with the words "That the Secretary," and so forth.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior is authorized and directed, in passing upon the proof heretofore submitted, or which may hereafter be submitted, by Rachel E. Dangerfield Boast on her homestead entry covering southeast quarter of section 21 and the northeast quarter of section 28, township 1 south, range 57 west of the sixth principal meridian, to disregard the fact that she has married an unnaturalized foreigner."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

R. G. ARRINGTON.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11840) for the relief of R. G. Arrington.

The Clerk read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to cancel the abandoned entry of John P. Adams case, purchase No. 2067, Lawton serial No. 06454, for the southeast quarter of section 2, township 5 south, range 11 west, Guthrie land district, and sell the same to R. G. Arrington, the present occupant of the land, for the appraised price: Provided, That the permanent and valuable improvements placed thereon by the said R. G. Arrington are not to be considered in the appraisement, and that the said R. G. Arrington shall have preference right to purchase the same for 90 days from and after the date of notification of the appraised price of the land.

The committee amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert the following: "That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cancel the abandoned homestead entry of John P. Adams for the southeast quarter of section 2, township 5 south, range 11 west, Indian meridian, Oklahoma, Guthrie land serial, and for a period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act, sell the same to R. G. Arrington, the present occupant of the land, for the original purchase price of $981.67, and issue a patent to him therefor."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the gentleman from Oklahoma what is the object of this bill? Mr. Adams has lost all his rights, as I understand it, to this piece of property.

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Why should we give a patent or any other right to a man who has lost his right?

Mr. FERRIS. We do not give him anything. We merely give the man who has lived there for five or six years the right to the option the other man had, but which he failed to exercise.

Mr. MANN. He is not entitled to buy it.

Mr. FERRIS. Who?

Mr. MANN. Arrington.

Mr. FERRIS. No; he can not buy it; there is a dead entry, but if Adams's entry was out of the way he could buy it; and there was an amendment——

Mr. MANN. Adams's entry is out of the way.

Mr. FERRIS. It is not canceled.

Mr. MANN. Why?

Mr. FERRIS. It can not be without this proceeding. It is only 80 acres.

Mr. MANN. The gentleman does not mean to tell me Adams bought land and paid one-fifth cash and agreed to pay the balance within a certain time and never made any other payment——

Mr. FERRIS. That is true.

Mr. MANN. Does the gentleman mean to say under those circumstances Adams has any claim to the land?

Mr. FERRIS. Well, it is a long proceeding to cancel an entry.

Mr. MANN. If it is a long proceeding, I do not think we ought to pass a law authorizing entries hereafter——

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman knows——

Mr. MANN. If a man can get a contract to purchase one of these pieces of land, and he makes a small payment on it and refuses to do anything else in the future, and thereby cloud the title to the land for years to come, we ought to have some general legislation from some committee curing that defect.

Mr. FERRIS. It is only due to the actual working of the law. The law is all right, but it takes a good deal of work for the local office to send out the inspector, and so forth, and it is only 80 acres of land.

Mr. MANN. This occurred in 1907, and that is seven years ago, and the man who purchased it paid one-fifth of the purchase price, and he paid no further attention to it and never intended to take it.

Mr. FERRIS. Yes; but the corner stones were out and he missed the tract.

Mr. MANN. The report shows he thought he was buying other land than that which he did buy?

Mr. FERRIS. The gentleman is right about that.

Mr. MANN. Then, when he discovered that, he paid no further attention to it, but let the money go. That is seven years ago. Now, is that to be a cloud upon the title that can not be remedied by the department?

Mr. FERRIS. It is like one of those dead railroad-grant surveys, where you have to cancel it. To show the gentleman how true that is I put an amendment on the Indian appropriation bill providing for the sale to the highest bidder of all these remnants of land, giving preference to those persons who occupied them. This poor fellow Arrington lived there five or six years, and the commissioner sent down Judge Whitten to tell this fellow that we can not sell the land, because there is a dead entry——

Mr. MANN. Why did not they cancel it?

Mr. FERRIS. I do not know; they had not the time——

Mr. MANN. The law authorizes it should be canceled. The law and the contract of sale provided that if a man did not comply with his payments he should forfeit what he paid; that was in the original law.

Mr. FERRIS. Well, I can only say——

Mr. MANN. I can not see the sense in asking Congress to take up its time on matters of this sort which the department can correct.

Mr. FERRIS. All right, let us assume that, but what are you going to do with this poor fellow who lived there for five or six years and who made these general improvements?

Mr. MANN. His life could not be used to better purpose than to demonstrate that the red tape of the department ought to be cut.

Mr. MONDELL. The efficiency of the department. Let me make this suggestion to the gentleman from Oklahoma: Does the gentleman think it a good thing to establish precedents of this sort? We have a very great many entries under the reclamation law where some payments have been made. Some of those entries will undoubtedly be lost. Is it going to be necessary to introduce a bill in every one of those cases and have the entry canceled by an act of Congress?

Mr. FERRIS. Not at all. And that is not the real purpose of this bill, as the gentleman knows. It does that, but the real purpose is to give this man relief, who can not get it in any other way, and the only relief we give him is to pay him the purchase price, which is nearly $1,000.

Mr. MONDELL. There can not be any reason on earth why the department can not cancel this entry.

Mr. FERRIS. If it does not give him relief. It would have to be put up under the rules and regulations and again sold, and this man would have no preference over any other man, and they would have to send an appraiser up there and have it reappraised.

Mr. MONDELL. Why did not the committee introduce a bill doing what the committee desires to do—simply to give the man this opportunity to do what he wants to do?

Mr. FERRIS. You can not do it with the entry there. They struck out this entry and did what the commissioner desired to do.

Mr. MONDELL. It strikes me it is establishing a bad precedent.

Mr. FERRIS. It does not. It merely helps out a poor fellow who wants to get the land.

Mr. RAKER. It can not be filed, and requires an act of Congress or some legislation to open up the filing.

Mr. MANN. It can be sold, but probably is worth two or three times the original price for it.

Mr. FERRIS. That land has no great value, because the other man absolutely walked off and left it. Of course it was worth more, because he had plowed it up, but no person ought to take it away from him.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The question is on the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, let me call the attention of the gentleman from Oklahoma to the peculiar language of this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. Is the gentleman looking at the amendment or the bill itself?

Mr. MONDELL. The amendment.

Mr. FERRIS. That was drawn by the department, assuming it would do the business.

Mr. MONDELL. I want to ask the gentleman if he understands what it means when it says:

The Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized and directed to cancel the abandoned homestead entry of John P. Adams for the southeast quarter of section 2, etc., and for a period of 90 days from and after the passage of this act sell the same, etc.

What they mean is that within a period of 90 days or give him an opportunity within a period of 90 days. You do not intend to authorize him to continue to sell it for 90 days to this man?

Mr. FERRIS. I have no pride in the language at all. The man wants to pay the price and get the land.

Mr. MONDELL. In passing a law it is well to use language that is understandable, is it not?

Mr. FERRIS. I think it is pretty plain. If the gentleman wants to offer an amendment to clear it up I have no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. The Secretary of the Interior is authorized to cancel for a period of 90 days and sell. What you want to do is to give this man a preference right to buy.

Mr. FERRIS. If the gentleman wishes to use language there that will accomplish it more effectively, I have no pride about it. I think they will understand what it means. If the gentleman wants to correct it, I have no objection.

Mr. MONDELL. If the word "for" were stricken out and the word "within" inserted, it would express the intent of the act much better than it is expressed now.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

Mr. MONDELL. I move to strike out the word "for," in line 9, and insert in lieu thereof the word "within."

Mr. FERRIS. I think that is better, myself.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 2, line 9, strike out the word "for" and insert in lieu thereof the word "within."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

E. F. ANDERSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14404) for the relief of E. F. Anderson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title of E. F. Anderson in and to the west half of the northwest quarter of section 30, township 15, range 17, Noxubee County, Miss., as assignee of the conveyance of She-uk-oh be, and the same is hereby, quieted and confirmed, and patent therefor shall issue to the said E. F. Anderson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

C. F. JACKSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 14405) for the relief of C. F. Jackson.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the title of C. F. Jackson in and to the northwest quarter of section 27, township 15, range 16, Noxubee County, Miss., as assignee of the conveyance by McKee Tolsom, be, and the same is hereby, quieted and confirmed, and patent therefor shall issue to the said C. F. Jackson.

With a committee amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, I would like to ask the genial gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CANDLER] whether this land is located near the Tombigbee?

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It is.

Mr. MANN. It must be very valuable land.

Mr. CANDLER of Mississippi. It is; and it adds very greatly to the prosperity of that country, and that fact makes it all the more necessary that the land should be acquired. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend, line 6, by striking out the word "Tolsom" and inserting in lieu thereof the word "Folsom."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. LANGLEY. Mr. Speaker, I think this last bill is all right, but I think a mistake was made in passing the preceding bill, H. R. 14404, calendar No. 229. I think there was an error in that, and I ask unanimous consent to return to it for the purpose of correcting the error.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. LANGLEY]?

Mr. McKELLAR. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Objection is made. The Clerk will report the next bill.

R. B. WHITACRE & CO.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 9362) for the relief of R. B. Whitacre & Co.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to R. B. Whitacre & Co., of St. Paul, Minn., the sum of $942.97, in full payment for 742½ kegs of blasting powder, furnished and delivered by said claimant and used by the United States at and upon the public work at Bellefourche, S. Dak., between the 1st day of February, 1906, and the 4th day of September, 1907, and for which no payment has ever been made.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I move to insert, after the word "any," in line 4, the word "reclamation," so that it will read, "out of any reclamation funds."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "any," insert the word "reclamation."

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I would like to inquire why the gentleman wishes to insert that amendment?

Mr. MANN. This is a payment to the persons who furnished the materials on the Bellefourche reclamation project in South Dakota. Now, the reclamation fund is a fund set aside for the purpose of constructing reclamation projects. Is there any reason, when we have something to pay on account of that, that we should pay it out of the general fund instead of out of the reclamation fund, where it is properly charged as an expense of the project?

Mr. FOSTER. It ought to come out of that particular fund.

Mr. FERRIS. Does the gentleman want it to come out of that particular project?

Mr. MANN. It will have to come out of that project. It shows what it is for. It will have to be charged up.

Mr. FERRIS. The point is that these reclamation people, when they have a project, have authority from time to time to make charges. In some of them, where I think they intend to have land estimated to cost about $40, sometimes it gets up to $60 or $70 per acre. This ought not to be added to that project.

Mr. MANN. I think they will do so, but that is not the material matter here.

Mr. FERRIS. It is material to me.

Mr. MANN. So far as this amount is concerned, I do not think it is material. I do not think we ought to commence to pay the expense of these projects out of the general fund when there is a certain fund segregated for that purpose.

Mr. FERRIS. I agree with that, but each project should stand on its own legs.

Mr. MANN. I have no doubt it will be charged up to some project.

Mr. FERRIS. It will not be done unless you say so. They will take it out of the lump sum.

Mr. MANN. They have to take it out of the lump-sum appropriation, because there is no other fund to take it out of; but when they pay it, I take it that it will be charged up to the Bellefourche project.

Mr. FERRIS. I should not believe it would, unless the gentleman said so. Let the amendment be reported again, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MANN. I can state it to the gentleman better than to have the amendment reported. The language of the bill is:

That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

I have offered an amendment to make it read:

Authorized and directed to pay out of any reclamation funds in the Treasury—

And I expected to offer an amendment to strike out the words:

Not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. FERRIS. Derived from the Bellefourche project.

Mr. MANN. But the money is not derived from the Bellefourche project. The money is derived from the sale of public lands.

Mr. FERRIS. That is the way they get it, and then that fund is finally reimbursed, when the settlers pay off their mortgages and get their title. If you pay that out of the general fund, I think you will find they will take it either out of the $20,000,000 bonds fund or out of the general reclamation fund. At all events, it will not be taken out of that project.

Mr. MANN. At least, it will be charged to the Reclamation Service in some way.

Mr. FERRIS. That may be, but it will not come back to that fund.

Mr. MANN. It ought to be charged up to the Bellefourche project, unless they have got to the point where they can charge it to private owners.

Mr. FERRIS. I do not think they have reached that blissful state.

Mr. MANN. I take it if they have not, it will be charged as an expense to the Bellefourche project.

Mr. FERRIS. Let us be sure about it. I move to amend the amendment——

Mr. MANN. That will come in later.

Mr. FERRIS. Let the amendment be reported again.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection, the Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, line 4, after the word "any" insert the word "reclamation."

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, I move to amend the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois by striking out the words in lines 4 and 5—

Any funds in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated—

And insert in lieu thereof the words—

Out of the reclamation fund, chargeable to the Bellefourche project.

Mr. FERRIS. That will get it.

Mr. MANN. I withdraw my amendment. That is not a substitute, but I am perfectly willing to withdraw my amendment.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. If there be no objection the amendment of the gentleman from Illinois will be withdrawn.

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Wyoming.

The amendment of Mr. MONDELL was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

J. O. MODISETTE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 12780) to provide for the payment of the claim of J. O. Modisette for services performed for the Chickasaw Indians of Oklahoma.

The bill was read as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs is hereby authorized to investigate the claim of J. O. Modisette, of Jennings, La., amounting to $270, alleged to be due as tuition for instructing certain Chickasaw pupils, and, in his discretion, to pay such claim wholly or in part from funds on deposit in the Treasury of the United States to the credit of the Chickasaw Nation.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

J. H. SCHMIDT.

The next business on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 10875) authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay J. H. Schmidt $75 damages for trespass of certain Indian school cattle at Rainey Mountain School in Oklahoma.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to pay to J. H. Schmidt, out of any balances of appropriations for the support and civilization of the Apache, Kiowa, and Comanche Indians, for the fiscal year 1911 or 1912, the sum of $75 in full compensation for damage sustained by him through trespass of cattle belonging to the Rainey Mountain Indian School.

With the following committee amendment:

Page 2, line 1, strike out the word "Rainey" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Rainy."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and was accordingly read the third time and passed.

By unanimous consent the title was amended so as to read: "A bill authorizing the Secretary of the Interior to pay J. H. Schmidt $75 damages for trespass of certain Indian school cattle at Rainy Mountain School in Oklahoma."

IVY L. MERRILL.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 11384) for the relief of Ivy L. Merrill.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of any money in the Treasury of the United States belonging to the Pottawatomie Tribe of Indians in Oklahoma not otherwise appropriated, to Ivy L. Merrill, a quarter-blood Pottawatomie Indian, of Pottawatomie County, Okla., the sum of $1,100, in full compensation for permanent and lasting injuries received, without negligence on her part, while in the employ of the United States Government as a civil-service employee at the Shawnee Indian School in Pottawatomie County, Okla.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Reserving the right to object, would the gentleman from Oklahoma be satisfied if he could get this woman in so that she could get the benefit of the compensation act and get $500, which would be a little more than she would get under the compensation act and a little more than the department recommended?

Mr. FERRIS. In the first place the Federal Government does not have to pay this. It comes out of the tribal money.

Mr. MANN. That does not appeal to me.

Mr. FERRIS. And in the second place——

Mr. MANN. And in the third place, it is almost 11 o'clock, and I do not wish to take much time on this bill.

Mr. FERRIS. I really think that she ought to have more. This is a pitiable case. The girl is a pitiable sight.

Mr. MANN. And there are a thousand girls throughout the country who are pitiful sights. Mr. Speaker, I object.

FRANK E. EVANS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 16514) to transfer Capt. Frank E. Evans from the retired list to the active list of the Marine Corps.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

CONSTANTINE MARRAST PERKINS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (S. 5148) for the reinstatement of Lieut. Col. Constantine Marrast Perkins to the active list of the Marine Corps.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

DAVENPORT FEMALE COLLEGE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was House resolution 524, referring the bill (H. R. 12070) for the relief of the trustees of the Davenport Female College to the Court of Claims.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

FRANK W. TUCKER.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1405) for the relief of Frank W. Tucker.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay, out of the Treasury of the United States, from any money not otherwise appropriated, to Frank W. Tucker, the sum of $95.36, being compensation for loss on May 31, 1902, of his personal effects, baggage, and clothing while en route from Mulanay to Bontoc, Philippine Islands, under military orders, as a corporal in Company K, Second Regiment United States Infantry.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

ARMISTEAD RUST.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (H. R. 2319) to transfer Capt. Armistead Rust from the retired to the active list of the United States Navy.

The Clerk read the bill.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. I object.

CHICAGO, MILWAUKEE & ST. PAUL RAILWAY CO.

The next business on the Private Calendar in order was the bill (H. R. 13) for payment to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co. the $4,583.67 improperly collected under the act of August 5, 1909.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., a corporation organized and existing under the laws of the State of Wisconsin, of Milwaukee, Wis., out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,583.67, the amount of corporation tax improperly collected by the United States under the corporation-tax act of August 5, 1909, for the year ending December 31, 1909.

With the following committee amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to the Chicago, Milwaukee & St. Paul Railway Co., a corporation, the amount of the corporation tax, if any, which has been excessively or improperly collected for the year ending December 31, 1909, by the United States, under the corporation-tax act of August 5, 1909, and the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury, is vested with full authority and power to determine the amount, if any, so excessively or improperly collected, notwithstanding the limitation contained in section 3228 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, and for the purpose of carrying into effect this act there is hereby appropriated, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $4,583.67, or so much thereof as may be necessary to pay the amount due such corporation for the excessive tax so collected."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time, and passed.

FRED A. EMERSON.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 4630) for the relief of Fred A. Emerson.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

ROBERT T. LEGGE.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1513) for the relief of Robert T. Legge.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I object.

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, will not the gentleman withhold his objection for just a short statement from me in regard to this bill?

Mr. MANN. No; I will not withhold the objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the next bill.

JOHN R. NORRIS.

The next business in order on the Private Calendar was the bill (H. R. 1580) for the relief of John R. Norris.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That John R. Norris be permitted to make an additional homestead entry for the southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 19, the northwest quarter of the northwest quarter of section 29, and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 30, all in township 161 north of range 33 west, in the State of Minnesota, upon the payment by him, at the time of entry, to the Government for the timber on the said northwest quarter of the northwest quarter at such price as may be fixed therefor by the Secretary of the Interior, in addition to the price of the land and the usual fees and commissions.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object, I would like to state in regard to this bill that is being considered and in regard to the bill just passed, here was a man who was without money and means, who was in the public service——

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman is not in order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. RAKER. Mr. Speaker, a man has the right to reserve the right to object.

Mr. MANN. Mr. Speaker, I demand the regular order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The Clerk will report the committee amendments.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 1, lines 4 and 5, strike out the words "southeast quarter of the southeast quarter of section 19, the."

Lines 6 and 7, strike out the words, "and the northeast quarter of the northeast quarter of section 30, all."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the committee amendments.

The committee amendments were agreed to.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, was read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly (at 11 o'clock p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow, Saturday, June 13, 1914, at 12 o'clock noon.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, executive communications were taken from the Speaker's table and referred as follows:

1. A letter from the Assistant Clerk of the Court of Claims, transmitting findings of fact and conclusions in the case of Esther Emmart v. The United States (H. Doc. No. 1031); to the Committee on War Claims.
